[4] It seems plain that our holding in the Ruth Case cannot be reconciled with that in the Winters Case. It is true that a writ of certiorari in the former was denied some four months after the decision in the latter. Whatever the grounds may have been for the denial of the writ, we cannot, in the face of the clear and unequivocal statement of the rule in the Winters Case, wholly at variance with the conclusion in the Ruth Case, regard the latter as controlling here. In both cases the employé was injured while working on an engine which was customarily used in both interstate and intrastate traffic, and in both cases it had been withdrawn from such service for repairs. As we said in the Ruth Case:

"No fixed rule for the construction of this statute has been laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States."

But, as we have shown, that court has since had occasion to construe the federal Employers' Liability Act, and we must accept its declarations on the point in question as the settled law.

It follows that at the time of the accident Brizzolara was not "engaged in an act so directly and immediately connected with interstate business as substantially to form a part or necessary incident thereof."

The award is affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; OLNEY, J.; SHAW, J.; LENNON, J.; SLOANE, J.

WILBUR, J. (dissenting). I dissent. It is conceded that the facts of this case bring it squarely within the rule laid down in Southern Pacific Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 782, 151 Pac. 277, L. R. A. 1916E, 916 (which will hereinafter be referred to as the Ruth Case), and that if we follow that case the award should be annulled. The Ruth Case, however, is overruled by the main opinion upon the theory that the Supreme Court of the United States in Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R. Co. v. Winters, 242 U. S. 353, 37 Sup. Ct. 170, 61 L. Ed. 358, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 54 (which will hereinafter be referred to as the Winters Case), has determined the same matter directly contrary to the rule laid down by us in the Ruth Case. This view is entertained, notwithstanding the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States declined to issue a writ of certiorari to review the decision of this court in the Ruth Case, and that this action was had after the decision in the Winters Case. It seems to me that there is a clear distinction between the Winters Case and the Ruth Case. The facts in the Winters Case were stipulated. It appears therefrom that the engine "had been used in the hauling of freight trains over defendant's line, * * * which freight trains hauled both intrastate and interstate commerce, and * * * it was so used after the plaintiff's injury." It will be observed that the stipulation does not cover the customary use of this engine. It had been used before and was used after the accident in hauling intrastate and interstate commerce. It was under this condition of the record that the court said:

"Its next work, so far as appears, might be interstate or confined to Iowa, as it should happen. At the moment it was not engaged in either. Its character as an instrument of commerce depended upon its employment at the time, not upon remote probabilities or upon accidental later events."

Of course when an engine is laid up in a machine shop for repairs it is not actually engaged in interstate commerce, and if its character as an instrument of commerce is to be determined by what it is doing when it is doing nothing, it follows that no engine while undergoing repairs is engaged in interstate commerce. It is clear from the opinion that no such result was intended, for it is expressly inferred that had it been "interrupted in an interstate haul to be repaired and go on," it would have been held that the engine was employed in interstate commerce, and those repairing it engaged therein. Again it is said:

"This is not like the matter of repairs upon a road permanently devoted to commerce among the states."

The inference in this statement is that if the engine had been permanently devoted to interstate commerce, as is a bridge, that those in its repair would be engaged in interstate commerce. In this case we are dealing with a switch engine which, by reason of its construction and the character of its business, is permanently devoted to the handling of freight and passenger cars in the railroad yards in San Francisco, and which is used for both interstate and intrastate commerce. There is no time when it could be said that the engine while in actual operation was not engaged in interstate commerce. Why, then, is it any less an instrumentality of interstate commerce than a bridge in the main line of a railway which most of its time is unused, and when in use is traveled indiscriminately by interstate and intrastate commerce? As pointed out in the main opinion, in Philadelphia, B. & W. R. R. Co. v. Smith, 250 U. S. 101, 39 Sup. Ct. 396, 63 L. Ed. 869, the cook of a construction crew, engaged in repairing a bridge upon a railroad engaged in interstate business, was held to be engaged in such interstate commerce while serving as a cook. The court say:

"The significant thing, in our opinion, is that he was employed by the defendant to assist, and * * * was assisting, the work of the bridge carpenters by keeping their bed and board close to their place of work."

It is further said:

"Taking it to be settled by the decision of this court in Pedersen v. Delaware, Lackawanna & Western R. R. Co., 229 U. S. 146, 152, 33 Sup. Ct. 648, 57 L. Ed. 1125, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 153, that the repair of bridges in use as instrumentalities of interstate commerce is so closely related to such commerce as to be in practice and in legal contemplation a part of it, it of course is evident that the work of the bridge carpenters in the present case was so closely related to defendant's interstate commerce as to be in effect a part of it."

If we turn to the case of Pedersen v. Delaware, Lackawanna, etc., Co., supra, we will see that the repair of engines and cars and the repair of bridges and tracks are placed upon exactly the same footing. It was there said:

"Was that work being done independently of the interstate commerce in which the defendant was engaged, or was it so closely connected therewith as to be a part of it? Was its performance a matter of indifference so far as that commerce was concerned, or was it in the nature of a duty resting upon the carrier? The answers are obvious. Tracks and bridges are as indispensable to interstate commerce by railroad as are engines and cars, and sound economic reasons unite with settled rules of law in demanding that all of these instrumentalities be kept in repair. The security, expedition and efficiency of the commerce depends in large measure upon this being done. Indeed, the statute now before us proceeds upon the theory that the carrier is charged with the duty of exercising appropriate care to prevent or correct 'any defect or insufficiency * * * in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment' used in interstate commerce. But independently of the statute, we are of opinion that the work of keeping such instrumentalities in a proper state of repair while thus used is so closely related to such commerce as to be in practice and in legal contemplation a part of it. The contention to the contrary proceeds upon the assumption that interstate commerce by railroad can be separated into its several elements and the nature of each determined regardless of its relation to others or to the business as a whole. But this is an erroneous assumption. The true test always is: Is the work in question a part of the interstate commerce in which the carrier is engaged? [Citing cases.] Of course we are not here concerned with the construction of tracks, bridges, engines or cars which have not as yet become instrumentalities in such commerce, but only with the work of maintaining them in proper condition after they have become such instrumentalities and during their use as such." (Italics ours.)

In the Pedersen Case the rule adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States applied with equal force to a bridge and an engine. In the Ruth Case we made the application of the principle there stated to an engine. I think that this case was correctly decided, and that the Winters Case was not a departure from the rule laid down by us or the rule laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Pedersen Case, but depends upon its own peculiar facts and the narrowness of the stipulated facts. The whole point of the Winters Case is that the Supreme Court of the United States felt itself unable to say, under the admitted facts, that the engine there involved was permanently used in, or, if I may use the expression, dedicated to, interstate commerce. Here we have an engine which, by reason of its peculiar construction, is and at all times has been as much dedicated to interstate commerce as is a bridge upon the main track of a railroad. In the Pedersen Case it was assumed that engines and cars were obviously instrumentalities used in interstate commerce, and from that predicate it was argued that a bridge was equally such an instrumentality. The main opinion assumes that a bridge is such an instrumentality, but denies that an engine undergoing repairs is such an instrumentality, notwithstanding the fact that it was at all times used in interstate commerce.

I dissent for the further reason that we have expressly decided the very question involved in this case; that the principle involved is well settled and of universal application; that the only difficulty is that of applying it to the specific facts in each case; that we have already made such an application; that the Supreme Court of the United States has never undertaken to change or modify the general rule; that the Winters Case is different in its facts, and that, so far as we can determine from the published opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, they have distinctly approved our decision in the Ruth Case. I think we ought not to assume that the Ruth Case is reversed by reason of the holdings in the later cases of the Supreme Court of the United States, which merely apply the well-settled rule to the peculiar facts of each case, which are in every instance different from those in this case.

HOLMGREN v. MADALENA. (Civ. 2123.)

Appeal and error ⊂=907(3)—Evidence presumed to support verdict on appeal on judgment roll.

Where the appeal is on the judgment roll alone it will be presumed by the appellate court that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by Alex Holmgren against Luis D. Madalena. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. A. Kelley, of Susanville, for appellant.
L. H. Hughes, of Quincy, for respondent.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff upon the judgment roll alone from a judgment in favor of defendant. The action grew out of an alleged assault on plaintiff by defendant, as the result of which he lost the sight of his right eye. The case was tried before the superior court of the county of Plumas, with a jury, and the trial culminated in a verdict for the defendant.

The complaint alleges that the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully committed an assault upon the person of plaintiff, and wrongfully in the commission of such assault struck plaintiff in the right eye, and thereby destroyed the sight of said eye and rendered plaintiff permanently blind in said eye, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $4,000; that by reason of said assault and injury committed as aforesaid plaintiff has incurred an indebtedness of $300 for and on account of medical attention and treatment; that the said assault was wrongful, unlawful, violent, and malicious. Plaintiff demanded judgment for the above-mentioned items, together with the sum of $2,000 for exemplary damages and costs of suit.

A demurrer to the complaint having been overruled, the defendant answered, and denied all the material allegations of the complaint, and set up the affirmative defense that—

"The plaintiff, while crazed from the excessive use of intoxicating liquors, first threatened and assaulted defendant, who thereupon necessarily committed the act complained of in defense of his person and property."

The evidence in the case is not before us, and it must be conclusively presumed on this appeal that the jury did its duty, and that there was ample and sufficient evidence to warrant the verdict.

The case is before us on the judgment roll alone, and there is no error in said judgment roll.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

JONES v. JONES. (Civ. 3419.)

Divorce ⊂=296—Superior court has wide discretion with respect to custody of children of marriage.

Under Civ. Code, § 138, authorizing the court, during pendency, etc., of divorce suits to make orders with respect to the custody of minor children, the superior court has a wide discretion in that matter with respect to the varying conditions for the purpose of doing justice, not only to the parents, but especially to the helpless minor children.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action for divorce by Richard D. Jones against Dora Pauline Jones. From an order with reference to the custody of the minor child of the marriage, entered after an interlocutory decree in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Order affirmed.

Ingall W. Bull and Harold Larson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Wm. G. Griffith, of Santa Barbara, and Robert M. Clarke, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WELCH, Judge pro tem. On May 20, 1918, plaintiff and defendant were husband and wife. On that day the husband commenced this action to obtain a judgment of divorce from his wife. She answered on the same day, and the court thereupon granted an interlocutory decree of divorce in favor of plaintiff. The defendant offered no evidence. Findings were prepared (or already prepared), signed and entered on said May 20th. On that day also, by mutual agreement, in writing, the property rights of the parties were settled, which writing was immediately recorded.

The husband charged desertion—which was not the real cause of complaint, as is so often the case in this class of litigation. In her answer, the wife alleged that she "voluntarily" deserted and abandoned plaintiff, but "did so with good cause." Claiming, however, that she was a fit and proper person to have the care and custody of the minor child of the union, nine years old, she prayed the court for such care and custody. The court granted her prayer "subject to the further orders of the court respecting the minor child, and subject to the right of the plaintiff to visit and to be visited by said minor child at reasonable and suitable times and places."

In October of the same year the plaintiff moved the court for a modification of the interlocutory decree of divorce with respect to the care and custody of the said minor child; and after a full hearing, in which both parties introduced extensive testimony, the court granted the motion, and entered an order to the effect that the minor be sent for his education to the Deane School for Boys in El Montecito, Santa Barbara county (the county in which the parents lived, and in which the trial took place), and giving to each parent the right to visit the child at the school at all times, subject to the rules of the school. The order further provided that during the first half of each school vacation the mother was to have the custody of the minor, and the father during the second half, each parent to have the privilege of visiting the boy while in the custody of the other, all subject to the further order of the court. The father was adjudged to pay all expenses of the child's education. The defendant appeals from this order.

There is no merit in the appeal. A careful examination of the record before us has not disclosed any error of the trial court, and the evidence fully justifies the trial court in modifying its order. For this reason we do not set forth in detail the evidence in the case. In dealing with domestic troubles and the care, custody, and education of minor children of disagreeing parents, the superior court of the state more than ever before should have a wide range of discretion in order to be able to adapt its orders to varying circumstances and conditions for the purpose of doing justice, not only to the parents in their unfortunate differences, but especially to the helpless minor children. Not only in fact but in law was the order now under review modifying the interlocutory decree of divorce justified and authorized. Civ. Code, § 138; Baker v. Baker, 139 Cal. 626, 73 Pac. 469; Nave v. Nave, 35 Cal. App. 27, 169 Pac. 253; Bancroft v. Bancroft, 173 Pac. 582; Simmons v. Simmons, 22 Cal. App. 448, 134 Pac. 791; Crater v. Crater, 135 Cal. 633, 67 Pac. 1049.

Order affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 27, 1920.)

Waters and water courses ⟸156(5)—Deed giving right to use water on another's land did not give property right in pumping plant on the lands.

Where defendant and plaintiffs held parcels of agricultural land by deeds from common grantor, and plaintiffs' deeds gave them a perpetual water right to a specified number of miners' inches of water from a well on defendant's land, such deeds gave plaintiffs no such interest in the pumping plant connected with the well as to support an action of conversion by them against one dismantling or taking possession of the plant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by F. L. Little and another against George Roop. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Guy Knupp, of Porterville, for appellant.

J. A. Chase, of Visalia, and Max B. Jamison, of Porterville, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $540 in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged conversion of personal property.

But one question need be considered, namely, did the plaintiffs have such an interest in the property alleged to have been converted as could furnish a foundation for the present action?

It appears from the record that both of the plaintiffs and the defendant were severally the owners of parcels of agricultural land in a tract known as Grand View Heights Colony, deriving their title directly or through mesne conveyances from a common grantor, the Garden City Bank & Trust Company. The defendant's parcel was described as the south half of lot 3, and upon it was situated a well, together with a pump, engine, and casing used in connection therewith and firmly attached to the realty. The respective deeds under which the plaintiffs each derained title contained the following language immediately after the description of the land conveyed:

"Together with the perpetual water right to * * * miners' inches of water from that certain well now located on lot 3 in block B of Grand View Heights Colony, said miners' inches of water above referred to to be equal to 1/50 part of one cubic foot per second continuous flow; also the right to lay and maintain pipes or conduits to convey water in the most direct course practical over the property of the party of the first part from the well above mentioned to the land herewith conveyed."

(In one case the number of miners' inches of water granted was two and in the other five.)

For several years the plaintiffs and the defendant each took water from the said well, using the pump, engine, and casing for that purpose, and taking it at such times as were mutually convenient. The immediate expense of pumping the water was borne by the party taking it, and the general expense of maintaining said machinery was borne in agreed proportions. On January 16, 1918, the defendant dismantled the pump, engine, etc., and sold them; and the plaintiffs claiming to be the owners of a three-fifths interest in said machinery, brought this action of conversion to recover that proportion of the proceeds of said sale. In support of the judgment in their favor it is their claim that the clause in their respective deeds above quoted should be construed to give them a specific interest in the pump and machinery attached to the well on defendant's land, entitling them to a like proportion of the value of such machinery upon its sale by the defendant. Plaintiff Little further supported his claim by evidence (which the court received over the objection of the defendant that it was incompetent) that at the time he purchased his land from the Grand View Heights Colony Company the defendant, being then an officer and agent of the company, represented and stated to him that in the event of his making the purchase he would be entitled to a two-fifths interest in said pumping plant. This representation was denied by the defendant, but whatever the fact may be as to this episode, we think it clear that Little's right to recover a proportion of the proceeds of the sale of the machinery in an action of conversion must, in the absence of a reformation of the instrument by which he obtained title, be based upon the terms of that instrument. The defendant's claim, of course, is that the pumping plant, being situated upon his land and firmly attached to the realty, was a part thereof, and that the plaintiffs owned by virtue of their respective deeds merely an easement consisting of a right to take the several quantities of water stated in their deeds.

We find it impossible to agree with the contention of the plaintiffs as to the construction of the provision of the deed above quoted. Its effect is plainly to confer the right upon the grantee to take or receive from the well situated on lot 3 of block B the quantity of water designated. Even if we go further and concede for the sake of argument that such clause of the deed, taken in connection with the practice pursued by the parties, was intended also to confer the right to use the pumping machinery attached to said lot 3, such a right would only enlarge the easement granted by increasing the burden imposed upon defendant's tract of land. Any interference by the defendant with such easement would doubtless give to the owner of the dominant tenement a right of action for damages; but there is nothing in the title deeds of the plaintiffs, or in any other evidence received on their behalf, transferring to them any such specific interest in the pumping plant which could give rise to an action in conversion in their favor against one dismantling or taking possession of such plant. The legal situation is no different from that presented in the case of an easement of right of way, upon which right of way might be a bridge used in connection with and forming part of it. If the owner of the servient tenement should tear down the bridge and sell the lumber of which it had been constructed, the owner of the easement could claim no interest in the lumber or the proceeds of its sale, but must pursue his remedy for damages for interference with his easement. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the trial court's finding that the defendant converted the property in question to his own use to the damage of the plaintiffs, the measure of which was three-fifths of the amount received from its sale, is contrary to the evidence, and its judgment, therefore, erroneous.

This defect being fundamental, it is unnecessary to consider other points urged by the respondents in support of the judgment.

CLAYES v. NUTTER et al. (Civ. 2169.)

Wills ⇐619—Bequest held not to create an "annuity," but a gift of income.

Under Civ. Code, § 1357, subd. 3, defining an "annuity" where a will gave testator's estate, with certain exceptions, to trustees to invest, and, out of the balance remaining after paying the expenses of the trust, to pay to testator's sister a certain sum per month during life, the bequest to the sister did not create an annuity, so as to commence, under section 1368, at testator's death, but a gift of income, so that the sister was not entitled to receive monthly payments, or any payments, during the time the estate was in course of administration or prior to the time it was distributed to the trustees.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Annuity.]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by Flora B. Clayes against W. B. Nutter and another, trustees under the last will and testament of Maria S. Hubbard, deceased, and under the decree of distribution in the estate of said Maria S. Hubbard. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Harding & Monroe, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John Hancock and Newton Rutherford, both of Stockton, for respondents.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants who are trustees under the last will and testament of Maria S. Hubbard, deceased, and under the decree of distribution in the estate of Maria S. Hubbard, deceased, to recover the sum of $700 claimed to be due as an annuity from the date of the death of the said Maria S. Hubbard, which occurred on the 30th day of August, 1917, to the 1st day of November, 1919, when the trust estate finally came into possession of the defendants under the decree of distribution in said estate. Judgment was for the defendants in the trial court, and plaintiff appeals from said judgment.

Under the will of said Maria S. Hubbard, all of her estate, after the payment of her debts and expenses of administration (except personal effects, such as jewelry, wearing apparel, ornaments, and bric-a-brac) was given to defendants, as trustees, to invest and manage the same and collect all the profits thereof, and out of the balance remaining, after paying the expenses of the trust, to "pay to my sister, Mrs. Flora B. Clayes, the sum of fifty (50) dollars per month during her natural life." Other specific sums were to be paid to other parties; then the will provides:

"And the remainder of such income they shall pay in equal shares to my daughters. Maria Hubbard Cronise and Eliza Fitch Hubbard Middlecoff, during their natural lives," etc.

It is the claim of the appellant that these provisions of the will make the bequest to Mrs. Clayes an annuity, and therefore that it is payable from date of death. The appellant contends that the question involved in this case is clearly settled by subdivision 3 of section 1357 of the Civil Code, which provides as follows: "An annuity is a bequest of certain specified sums periodically; if the fund or property out of which they are payable fails, resort may be had to the general assets, as in case of a general legacy," and also, that if it be determined that this bequest is an annuity, the conclusion that it was to commence at the date of the testatrix's death is inevitable under section 1368 of the Civil Code, which is as follows:

"Legacies are due and deliverable at the expiration of one year after the testator's decease. Annuities commence at the testator's decease."

It is the contention of the respondents that "the last will and testament of Maria S. Hubbard, deceased, did not create an annuity in favor of appellant in legal contemplation, but created a gift of income," citing Corpus Juris, volume 3, at page 201, as follows:

"There is a distinction between an income and an annuity; the former embraces only the net profits and may be uncertain in amount; the latter is a fixed amount directed to be paid absolutely and generally without contingency. A simple gift of the interest upon a specific principal sum, although stipulated to be paid annually, is not an annuity but merely a gift of income. Much less can the gift of the income of a specified portion of an estate, including real as well as personal estate, be considered an annuity."

That the said Maria S. Hubbard did not intend to create an annuity in favor of her sister, Mrs. Flora B. Clayes, we think is quite apparent from the terms of her will.

As before stated, under the will of said Maria S. Hubbard, all of her estate, after the payment of her debts and expenses of administration (except personal effects, such as jewelry, wearing apparel, ornaments, and bric-a-brac) was given to the defendants, as trustees to invest and manage the same and collect all the profits thereof—

"and out of the interest and income derived from the moneys by them so invested and kept invested, and out of the rents, issues and profits by them received from such real property, they, said trustees, shall pay all taxes levied and assessed upon the trust property either by state, county, city or other duly constituted and established authority, and such premiums for insurance as may be required to be paid in order to afford reasonable protection to any of such property as against loss or damage by fire, and such sums as may be required to be expended in the necessary repair, protection and improvement of any such property, and in the necessary expenses of this trust, including a reasonable sum for their services in the performance of the duties of their trust, and out of the balance of such interest, rents, issues, and profits, they, said trustees, shall pay to my sister Mrs. Flora B. Clayes, the sum of fifty (50) dollars per month during her natural life."

As will be observed it is expressly provided in said will that the trustees shall invest the trust property and "out of the balance," of the rents, issues, and profits, pay to Mrs. Flora B. Clayes the sum of $50 per month during the term of her natural life. Under this will it was necessary for the trustees to receive the trust property and invest the same, so as to obtain an income before it was possible for them to make any payment to Mrs. Clayes under the terms of the will.

It is true that the trustees named in the will of Maria S. Hubbard, deceased, were also the executors of said will and served in that capacity; but they did not qualify as trustees until they as executors had completed the administration of said estate and distributed the same. They did not become trustees under the will and decree of distribution before October 29, 1918, and no part of the estate came into their possession as such trustees prior to said 29th day of October, 1918, and the court found:

"That defendants did not receive nor did there come into the possession of said defendants as such trustees, any rents, issues or profits produced from the property of said estate prior to the first day of November, 1918."

The court further found:

"That the expenses of administration of the said estate, including taxes, state and national, exceeded the sum of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000.00), and that the expenses of said administration consumed all the income arising from rents, issues and profits from said estate during the time of said administration, and that said expenses of administration, including taxes, state and national, also required the expenditure by said executors of a portion of the corpus of said estate."

In the Estate of Brown, 143 Cal. 450, 77 Pac. 160, the testatrix by her will gave to two trustees the sum of $5,000 in trust for the following uses and purposes, and not otherwise:

"(a) To invest the said money in some safe investment, in their discretion, with power, at all times to reinvest the same as they may deem best.

"(b) Out of the income arising from the investment of said fund, as aforesaid, to pay Kate Nowland, * * * monthly the sum of $20 for and during the term of her natural life."

The beneficiary in that case claimed that the testatrix had created an annuity in her favor, and that the same was payable from the date of the death of the testatrix. The court said:

"The appellant cites in support of her claim to payment from date of death section 1366 of the Civil Code, as follows: 'In case of a bequest of the interest or income of a certain sum or fund, the income accrues from the testator's death.' If this section was applicable, of course the appellant would be entitled to the monthly payments from the time of the death of the testatrix. But the bequest in this case was not of the interest or income of a certain sum to be paid by the executors of the estate. The testatrix bequeathed the sum of $5,000 to certain trustees, and the monthly income was to be paid by the trustees, and not by the executors. Necessarily, the trustees could not begin payment until they received the fund and invested it so as to produce an income. The intention of the testatrix must therefore have been that payments were not to begin until the fund from which it was to be produced was distributed to the trustees, who were to make the payments."

The above case is directly in point with the case at bar; for in that case the property from which the payments were to be made was distributed to trustees and the monthly payments were to be paid by the trustees and not by the executors, and the reasoning of the court in that case to the effect that the trustees could not begin payment until they received the fund and invested it so as to produce an income, and that "the intention of the testratrix must therefore have been that payments were not to begin until the fund from which it was to be produced was distributed to the trustees," applies with equal force to the case at bar.

In the Estate of Mackay, 107 Cal. 303, 40 Pac. 558, the testator bequeathed the sum of $15,000 to the executors of his will in trust, with directions that they invest said sum in such securities as they deemed advisable, and to pay the income to the beneficiary, during her life. The Supreme Court held that—

"The legacy in question is, by its terms, made to the executors named in trust for the purposes therein expressed. It is not a legacy payable direct to the respondent, and under no circumstances is she entitled to receive any part of the principal sum bequeathed. That sum is to be received and held by the trustees, and they are the only parties to whom the probate court can order it, or any part of it, to be paid. Such an order would constitute a distribution (partial or final).

"The right of the respondent is merely that of the beneficiary of the trust, and is confined, by the terms of the will, to the receipt of the income to be derived from an investment of the trust fund. This investment is directed to be made by the trustees, and, until the fund is distributed to the latter and an investment of it made, there can be no 'income' to be paid to the respondent. * * * The will, as we have seen, gives her nothing directly from the estate, much less is she to receive anything from the general assets of the estate. All that she is entitled to is payment by the trustees of the income of the specific fund after distribution of such fund to them."

Appellant cites the case of Crew v. Pratt, 119 Cal. 131, 51 Pac. 44, "as determinative of the case at bar." But we do not think that this case sustains appellant's contention. In that case the will of the testator provided that the trustees should hold and manage the trust for seven years from and after the death of the testator, and the will also directed that the trustees should "provide and turn over to Mrs. Lizzie E. Pratt, my wife, the sum of seven thousand five hundred dollars ($7,500) each year for the following seven years, for her maintenance, the same to be paid in semi-annual installments of three thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars ($3,750) each, the first as soon after my decease as sufficient funds for the purpose shall come into their possession, and the remaining ones at the end of every six months afterward." Here it clearly appears from the will itself that the testator intended that the payment of $7,500 yearly to his wife should commence at the time of his death for the reason that the trust created by the will had but seven years to run from and after the death of the testator, and the trustees were directed to pay the first installment of $3,750 as soon after the death of the testator as sufficient funds for that purpose should come into their possession, and the remaining ones at the end of every six months afterward.

It is clear to us that under the will of Maria S. Hubbard the appellant was not entitled to receive monthly payments, or any payments during the time the estate was in course of administration, or prior to the time it was distributed to the trustees.

The judgment is affirmed.

KEENE et al. v. BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE VETERANS' HOME OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 2096.)

Descent and distribution ⇐⇒71(6)—Heirship of claimants not shown by evidence.

In action by alleged heirs of deceased inmate of a veterans' home to recover from the home moneys held by it, claimed by plaintiffs as heirs at law of said decedent, evidence held to support finding of the trial court against the claim of heirship.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Action by Henry Keene and others against the Board of Directors of the Veterans' Home of California and another. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Henry G. W. Dinkelspiel, of San Francisco, and E. L. Webber, of Napa, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank L. Guerena, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondents.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an action by the plaintiffs, claiming to be heirs at law of one George W. Keene, deceased, to recover from defendants certain moneys held by them, that plaintiffs claim to be entitled to as heirs at law of said decedent.

The said George W. Keene died on the 27th day of August, 1916, and was, at the time of his death, a resident of Napa county, and an inmate of the Veterans' Home of California, located at Yountville, in the said county of Napa. Prior to his death, he turned over to defendants 16 pension checks representing $1,029.17 in money. These uncashed checks he left at the time of his death, and, in addition, there was on deposit with defendants belonging to George W. Keene at the time of his death the sum of $260.17. The public administrator of the county of Napa was appointed administrator of the estate of deceased. He administered upon his estate, and the probate court on the 19th day of November, 1917, made and entered its decree distributing the residue. Under the decree of distribution, the residue amounting to $876.23 was ordered paid "to the treasurer of Veterans' Home at Yountville as a trustee to be held in trust and disbursed in accordance with the laws of the state of California governing trust funds paid to the directors of the Veterans' Home at Yountville, or any officer of the Home, and upon filing proper receipts," etc.

Subsequent to the making of this decree of distribution, the plaintiffs demanded of defendants all of the moneys deposited by the decedent, together with the moneys distributed in the decedent's estate, except one-sixth thereof, that plaintiffs alleged belonged to a sister of decedent, Jane Keene, not a party to this action, which demand was refused by defendants upon the ground that, so far as the money distributed to respondents out of the decedent's estate was concerned, the probate court had no power or authority to so distribute said estate to them; that, on the contrary, the estate should have been distributed to the county treasurer, and suggesting that plaintiffs procure an order from the probate court directing respondents to deliver $876.25, so distributed to defendants to the county treasurer of the county of Napa.

The plaintiffs did make such application by petition for such order, and after a hearing by the court the same was denied. No appeal was taken from this order. It is stated in the briefs that the reason for such denial was the fact that more than six months had expired from the date of the entry of the decree, and the same had become final. Subsequent to the denial of said petition the plaintiffs instituted this action, and after a trial judgment was rendered in favor of defendants from which judgment this appeal is taken.

It is admitted by the respondents that the aforesaid sum of $260.17 is money which can be disposed of by the respondents without probate. (Stats. 1897, p. 106; amended 1911, Stats. 1911, p. 1447), but the said sum of $876.25 has not the same status. The latter sum represents the balance of the sum of $1,029.17 remaining after payment of expenses of administration, which sum was obtained upon cashing the check of the Treasury Department of the United States, which check was issued in favor of George W. Keene in place of 16 pension checks theretofore issued to him from the same source and in his possession, but unindorsed at the time of his death. The proceeds of this check were subjected to probate, and the proper procedure in the absence of heirs would have been to have ordered the residue paid to the county treasurer, under the provisions of section 1737 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

This court in construing the statute creating the Veterans' Home of California has decided that the only money belonging to an inmate of said Home which the directors of the institution can distribute to the heirs at law of the decedent directly and without probate is money belonging to the decedent and in the custody of the Home at the time of the death of the inmate. Brownlee v. Board of Directors, 22 Cal. App. 207, 133 Pac. 1158.

The appellants argue that if these moneys are the property of appellants the respondents are not entitled to retain the same merely because the probate court distributed the same to them instead of to the county treasurer. This argument is conceded by respondents to be undoubtedly correct. But it is claimed by respondents that, assuming that the appellants are entitled to said money in this proceeding, it still remained for the appellants to satisfy the lower court that they were the heirs at law to five-sixths of said money as alleged in the complaint. But that they failed to so satisfy the trial court and the court found that they were not the heirs at law of the said George W. Keene.

The proof offered by plaintiffs in support of their claim of heirship consisted mostly of depositions made by the claimants. These are about the same as far as the existence of a George W. Keene in their family is concerned, their relationship to a George W. Keene, their place of residence, the fact that a George W. Keene in their family left home a short time before the Civil War, following a dispute with his father about some money matters, that they received no word from him since the time of his leaving home, that they believe that the George W. Keene whom they knew is dead, and that he died an inmate of the Veterans' Home of California according to a notice published in a newspaper in the city of Utica, N. Y., advising of the death of a George W. Keene at said Home, which notice was seen by the claimant Edmund A. Keene.

The occupation of George W. Keene, according to the records of the Home, was that of a carpenter, while in the deposition of Edmund A. Keene it is stated that the George W. Keene to whom the deponent was related was a locksmith by occupation. That it appears from the records of the said Home, from information furnished by the decedent, George W. Keene had no relatives, that by the said records his birthplace is given as New York and in several of the depositions it is given as England. The army records give his birthplace as New York. Without entering into a full review of the evidence, suffice it to say that there is a sufficient conflict in the evidence upon the question of heirship as to render the finding of the trial court on that question conclusive. We are powerless to disturb said finding under the well-established rule of conflicting evidence, and the record in this case does not warrant us in substituting our judgment of the evidence for that of the trial court.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF DIXON v. SPANGLER et al. (Civ. 2145.)

1. Pleading ⊂⊃406(8)—Objection of misjoinder waived, unless urged by demurrer or answer.

The objection that causes of action are improperly joined must be taken advantage of by demurrer or answer in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. §§ 430, 433, or it is waived; consequently, where there was nothing on the face of the complaint to indicate that plaintiff had joined an individual cause of action with causes of action based on firm notes, the objection of misjoinder not having been presented by answer was waived.

2. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1039(3)—No reversal because of improper joinder of actions, where appellant could secure no different judgment.

Where plaintiff sued partners on three notes, and the court, finding that two of them were firm obligations and the other the personal obligation of the partner signing it, rendered judgment accordingly, the judgment will not be reversed on appeal of the nonsigning partner on account of the misjoinder, regardless of presentation of the matter below, for it would merely result in the striking of the individual cause of action from the complaint, and judgment as previously rendered.

3. Partnership ⊂⊃126—Acts of partner within apparent scope of authority binding, though not in good faith.

Under Civ. Code, § 2429, the acts of a general partner within the apparent scope of his authority are binding on his copartners in favor of third persons, regardless of whether he acts in good or bad faith.

4. Partnership ⊂⊃146(1) — That notes were not signed in firm name does not establish that they were individual obligations.

Though notes executed by general partner bore only his name without the firm name is not conclusive that they were his individual obligations, but is only a circumstance which does not relieve the firm of liability if the partner had power to bind it and the notes were executed with such intent and were so accepted; credit being extended to the firm.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Dixon against N. R. Spangler and Rose B. Spangler. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant last named appeals. Affirmed.

F. E. Boland and Fletcher G. Flaherty, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Elmer W. Armfield and Arthur B. Eddy, both of Woodland, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action is on three promissory notes, for $2,000, $1,000, and $500, respectively—all executed by defendant N. R. Spangler. The theory of the plaintiff is that at the time of the execution of the notes the two defendants were copartners engaged in the butcher business, and that said notes represented the obligation of the firm although signed only by N. R. Spangler. The court found this theory to be true as to the two notes aggregating $3,000 but that the $500 note represents the sole obligation of N. R. Spangler, and judgment was rendered accordingly. The appeal is by Rose B. Spangler from the portion of the judgment against the firm, and she makes two points; one, that there was a misjoinder of causes of action, and the other, that the evidence does not support the finding that the money was borrowed for the use and benefit of the copartnership. As we view the matter, there is no merit in either contention.

[1, 2] In reference to the first, the position of appellant is that a cause of action against N. R. Spangler on the note for $500 was improperly joined with one against the partnership on the other two notes. But such defect must be taken advantage of either by demurrer or answer, or else it is waived. Sections 430, 433, Code Civ. Proc.; Baker & Hamilton v. Lambert, 5 Cal. App. 708, 91 Pac. 340. Nothing appearing on the face of the complaint to indicate that the causes of action were against different parties, it was incumbent upon appellant to present the question by the answer. This was not done. It is not sufficient to say that she could not know until the decision of the lower court that the partnership was liable on two of the notes, and N. R. Spangler alone on the other. There was evidence of that situation and of appellant's knowledge of it. We must assume, therefore, that she had sufficient information on the subject to enable her to set out said objection in the answer. At any rate, it would be preposterous to reverse the judgment on any such ground. If reversed for that reason, the result would be that the complaint would be amended by eliminating the count in reference to the $500 note, and the lower court would try the issue as to the other two notes, and render the same judgment as the one appealed from herein. That would be of no advantage to appellant and would only entail delay and additional cost.

[3, 4] As to the second question, it is sufficient to make the following observations: There is no doubt that at the time said obligations were incurred, a general partnership existed between the defendants for the transaction of said business; that "every general partner is agent for the partnership in the transaction of its business, and has authority to do whatever is necessary to carry on such business in the ordinary manner, and for this purpose may bind his copartners by an agreement in writing" (section 2429, Civil Code); if such partner acts within the apparent scope of his authority, whether he acts in good or bad faith, his acts and declarations are binding upon his copartners in favor of third persons, if said third parties believe in and rely upon his statements, and upon the strength of said confidence extend credit or advance money to said partner for the use and benefit of the partnership; there is substantial evidence in the record to bring the case fairly within the purview of the foregoing principle, it appearing that when N. R. Spangler obtained said loan and executed said notes he represented to the cashier that the money was to buy stock for the use of the firm and the cashier, acting in perfect good faith, believed said statement, and, relying upon it, advanced the money upon the credit of the firm; the fact that the notes were signed, not in the name of the firm but of N. R. Spangler individually, while a circumstance to be considered in determining the intention of the parties, does not relieve the partnership of liability if said Spangler had authority to bind the firm and the note was executed with such intent and was so accepted and credit extended thereto. Miller v. McCord (Tex. Civ. App.) 159 S. W. 159; Mills v. Riggle, 83 Kan. 703, 112 Pac. 617, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 616.

In other words, the evidence, which is set out in the briefs, brings the case clearly within the doctrine of agency as it relates to a general partnership. The principles covering such transactions are well settled, the evidence is ample to show their application to the situation in accordance with the finding of the trial court, and we are satisfied that no reason exists for disturbing the conclusion reached.

KONIG v. LYON et al. (Civ. 3422.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 30, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 27, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸1002—Verdict on conflicting evidence conclusive.

On appeal in personal injury action, a verdict based on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸705(10)—Last clear chance doctrine held to have no application to case.

Where a collision occurred between motortruck and bicycle when one or other was on the wrong side of the street, the doctrine of last clear chance could have no application.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸705(2)—Bicyclist need not turn out for motortruck on wrong side of street.

A bicyclist on the right side of the street, seeing a heavy truck on the wrong side of the street approaching him, need not generally give way to it.

4. Trial ⟸236(3)—Instruction on credibility of defendant's truck driver not erroneous.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1879, 1958, an instruction that jury might consider fact that plaintiff, suing owner of truck for injuries, was interested in case, and that driver of truck colliding with plaintiff was interested "on his side of the case" held not erroneous.

5. Municipal corporations ⟸706(5)—Evidence held to show negligence of driver of motortruck colliding with bicyclist.

In action for injuries resulting to bicyclist in collision with motortruck, evidence held sufficient to show that driver of truck was negligent.

6. Appeal and error ⟸930(2)—Presumed that jury found defendant's negligence proximate cause of injury.

Where, in action for injuries resulting to bicyclist in collision with motortruck, court instructed that if driver of truck was on wrong side of street, it was negligence per se, and if that was the proximate cause of injury, verdict should be for plaintiff, on appeal from verdict for plaintiff court would presume that jury found that negligence the proximate cause.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by Carl Konig, by Evelyn Konig, his guardian ad litem, against Fred T. Lyon and the Magnet Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WELCH, Judge pro tem. For personal injuries received plaintiff by his guardian ad litem brings this action to recover damages for the negligence of defendants. The case was tried before the court with a jury, and plaintiff obtained a verdict. From the judgment defendants appeal.

The plaintiff, a boy of 12 years of age, was on December 28, 1917, riding a bicycle northerly on Fern street in the town of Watts, Los Angeles county, and the truck of the defendants was coming southerly on the same street when a collision took place between the boy and the truck. The boy's left arm was seriously injured, and his face cut. No question is raised as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict as to the negligence of the defendants, but the appellants contend that the evidence shows that "plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, proximately contributing to some extent to the cause of the injury as a matter of law, and that the court erred in instructing the jury."

[1] On the question of contributory negligence the court fairly and correctly charged the jury. It instructed the jury on the law concerning every claim made by defendants as to the contributory negligence of plaintiff. Among other instructions on the subject of contributory negligence, it charged the jury that if it believed that plaintiff's collision with a companion's bicycle was the proximate cause—the efficient cause—of the accident, without which the accident would not have occurred, then the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover. "If the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, no matter how slight, there can be no recovery, even though the defendant was guilty of negligence, because you cannot compare the negligence of the parties." Certainly these instructions cannot be objected to by the defendants and appellants. Under these instructions the jury found against the appellants on a conflict of direct and circumstantial evidence, and therefore the verdict and judgment cannot be reviewed here on that point.

[2] The doctrine of the last clear chance has no application in this case. If it has, the rule would apply with more pertinency to the acts of the driver of the truck than to those of the plaintiff. Each saw the other approaching at a distance of about four blocks, or 800 feet. Each held serenely to his course. If the driver was driving any part of his truck to the left of the center line of the road, in the line of travel of the plaintiff while on his right side of the street, it was his duty under express law to turn to his right and travel wholly on the right side of the road when he was within 300 feet of the plaintiff coming toward the truck. The driver of the truck sounded no alarm or warning of his intention to hold his course. The plaintiff testified that he did not change his course until within about 10 feet of the truck, for the reason that he momentarily expected the truck to turn out of his (plaintiff's) right of way and to get onto its own side of the street. This he had a right to expect. Sections 20a, 20b, Motor Vehicle Act, in force at that time (St. 1915, pp. 406, 407); Harris v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 55, 161 Pac. 1155, L. R. A. 1917C, 477, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 560; Medlin v. Spazier, 23 Cal. App. 242, 137 Pac. 1078; Scott v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 611, 93 Pac. 677. If, on the other hand, according to the version of the driver of the truck, he was driving on his right side of the road, and the plaintiff was coming in the opposite direction in a line of travel 8 or 10 feet to the left of the truck, the doctrine could have no application to such facts. Under no theory or claims of the plaintiff could the driver be to blame for the accident and injury, if he had been driving on his right side of the center line of the street when the collision took place.

[3] The specious argument of counsel for appellants that a bicyclist on his right side of the road, seeing a heavy truck on the wrong side of the street approaching him, should give way to it, is not the law of this state, as a general legal proposition. Of course, there are exceptions to the general rule. Doubtless at times it becomes the duty of any user of the highway to yield his right to a violator of some rule of the road under some peculiar or unusual circumstances or conditions, but such is not the case here. The Legislature may see fit in the future to provide that bicyclists (and possibly trucks) should be more strictly regulated in the use of our crowded public streets and highways, as is the rule in some other jurisdictions. Until then all users of the road must reasonably obey and observe the law as written. Drivers and owners of trucks—even heavy trucks—are equally amenable to these laws, and must respect the rights of other persons on our public highways.

Appellant takes exceptions to some of the instructions of the court and the court's refusal to give a proposed instruction. All these objections except one, which we will now proceed to consider, are more or less involved in what has already been said, and are not deemed of sufficient importance to require specific notice.

[4] The court instructed the jury as follows:

"The plaintiff as a matter of course is interested in the case. You will simply consider that fact, and the same with the driver of the truck. He is interested on his side of the case, and you can consider it in determining his credibility."

It should be noticed that the court did not tell the jury that the truck driver was interested in the case, nor did it infringe on the province of the jury as to deciding the credibility of the witness. It simply told the jury that the driver was interested "on his side of the case," and that they could consider such interest in determining his credibility. As a matter of law, was the driver interested "in the event of the action"? Section 1879, Code Civ. Proc. It was stipulated by respective counsel in the presence of the jury that the driver of the truck was acting in the scope of his employment at the time of the accident. Would it not follow under the admitted facts of this case that any omission of duty or negligent act of the driver proximately causing the injury to the plaintiff would make the driver and the owner of the truck joint tort-feasors? Certainly. That the truck driver was interested on his side of the case "is a deduction which the reason of the jury" could have made from the facts admitted and proved without a statement from the court. Section 1958, Code Civ. Proc. He was accused by the pleadings of plaintiff of violating the laws of the road by negligently driving on the wrong side of the street, thereby causing the accident and the injury to plaintiff. The plaintiff was seriously injured by the alleged act of the driver. The driver could not have been indifferent to the proceedings or the outcome of the case. He was morally interested, even if not financially interested, on the side of the defense of the case, in establishing his blamelessness in mutilating the plaintiff. But, we repeat, the court did not intimate that the interest of the driver on his side of the case discredited such driver. The credibility of the witness was left wholly to the consideration of the jury. On this point the court further charged:

"You are the sole and exclusive judges of their (witnesses') credibility. Their conduct, their character as shown by the evidence, their manner on the stand, their relations to the parties, if any, their interest in the case, their bias and prejudice, if any, their degree of intelligence, the reasonableness or unreasonableness of their statements, and the strength or weakness of their recollection, may be taken into consideration for the purpose of determining their credibility. When I speak of these matters, it applies to both sides of the case. In referring to the interest of witnesses, you will note that I did not say that you are to disbelieve witnesses simply because they are interested. You are simply to take that interest into consideration in determining their credibility."

[5] The appellants complain specially of the instruction under consideration because it tends, they claim, to discredit the only eyewitness on behalf of the defendants to the accident. The court told the jury that plaintiff was interested in the case, and that the driver was interested on his side of the case, and that the jury could consider these respective interests in determining the credibility of these two witnesses. So it would appear that if the instruction discredited the truck driver it also more pointedly discredited the plaintiff. The testimony of the plaintiff was consistent and in accord with the physical facts surrounding the accident. The testimony of the truck driver was inconsistent, and not in accord with such physical facts. He discredited himself. The road was 32 feet wide from curb to curb, 8 feet of the street on each side next to the curb being rough, and consisting of sand and gravel. There remained 8 feet of smooth road on each side of the center line of the street. The driver of the truck testified that he was driving on the right side of the street, his right-hand wheels being about 3½ or 4 feet from the curb "right in the sand"; that he heard the contact clash of the wheels of the two bicycles about 8 or 10 feet to his left and about opposite him; that the plaintiff's wheel described a circle, coming towards his truck, whereupon he immediately turned his front wheels sharply to the right towards the curb, away from the on-coming boy; that the plaintiff first struck the front or corner of his radiator with the right side of his face; that he did not fall from his bicycle until he hit the truck; that the distance between his truck and the boy when he collided with his companion's bicycle was 8 or 10 feet "anyhow." With the truck going 8 miles an hour and the boys in an opposite direction, 5 miles, the position in reference to the truck in which this testimony placed the plaintiff at the time of the collision with the companion's bicycle makes witness' version of the accident most improbable in view of the physical facts. The plaintiff would have had to turn completely around and travel at least 10 or 12 feet in a circle, overtake the truck with its front turned from him going toward the curb, and then have fallen from his wheel against the corner of the radiator, striking the radiator with the right side of his face. The jury evidently believed that the truth of the matter is that the truck was not 4 feet to the left of the center line of the street, but that its left wheels were about 4 feet over the line on the wrong side of the street at the time of and before the accident; that the plaintiff was riding on the right side of the street in a line about 4 feet east of the center line of the street on or near a line being traveled by the left wheels of the truck; that the boy, thinking that the truck would turn out on its right side of the street at any moment, for this reason kept on his course until, realizing that the truck did not intend to give him the right of way which he was legally entitled to, and when within about 10 feet of the truck, suddenly swerved to the right to avoid being hit by the truck; that because of his being compelled to turn quickly to the right his front wheel caught on a nut of the rear wheel of his companion's bicycle, thereby unbalancing him and throwing him in front of the truck, from which collision he received his injuries.

[6] The court properly instructed the jury on the question of proximate cause of the injury. It told them inter alia that if they believed that the truck was on its right side of the street when the accident occurred, then the plaintiff could not recover, but if they believed that the truck was on the left-hand side it was guilty of negligence per se; and in such event it would be for them to determine whether such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. It defined the meaning of proximate cause to the jury. The court having submitted the question of proximate cause to the jury, calling to the attention of the jury the theory of plaintiff and the theory of the defendants and directing it to determine the question of fact between them, this court must presume that the jury determined that the proximate cause of the injury was the negligence of the defendants' truck being on the wrong side of the road, and its persisting in maintaining its course without warning to plaintiff that it did not intend to change its course, as required by law. Counsel for appellants, in commenting on the position of the truck in the street in their opening brief, say:

"It was a large truck and on or near, and perhaps a little to the left of, the center of the road, as it proceeded south."

The judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 30, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 26, 1920.)

1. Evidence ⟸178(2)—Secondary evidence of contract admissible, where originals had been lost or destroyed.

A letter press copy of a contract of partnership was properly received in evidence, where it was shown that plaintiff was unable to discover his copy, that defendant's copy had been destroyed, while a memorandum left with the bank could not be discovered, secondary evidence of the contents of an instrument being admissible, where reasonable search for the instrument fails to produce it, as does inquiry of the persons most likely to have its custody or to have some reason to know its whereabouts.

2. Partnership ⟸84—Expense of fencing not within the scope of the partnership agreement.

Where partnership agreement provided that defendants should look after and care for all buildings and improvements on or connected with the ranch which was being operated by the firm, and should place fences and buildings in repair, the materials to be purchased in joint account, but the labor of fencing to be done by or at the cost of defendants, defendants cannot recover for the expense of labor of replacing a worn-out fence with a fence of a different kind.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; James F. Lodge, Judge.

Action by John W. Ulm against Clarence M. Prather and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Taylor & Tebbe, of Yreka, for appellants.

Tapscott & Tapscott and B. K. Collier, all of Yreka, for respondent.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an action brought by plaintiff for an accounting, and thereby a determination of the amount to which the parties to this action are respectively entitled by reason of a certain agreement of copartnership entered into by and between the plaintiff and defendants on June 1, 1909.

The said agreement was to run from the said 1st day of June, 1909, to the 30th day of September, 1913, and provided for the operating and farming on joint account, the premises known as the "Shasta View Ranch," situated in Siskiyou county, and containing about 2,600 acres of land.

The complaint alleges that the defendants did not farm the land as provided for by the said contract, and that plaintiff was damaged thereby in the sum of $6,780.70; that plaintiff advanced money to the copartnership in the sum of $3,289.70, and that the defendants owed the copartnership $3,850 for money drawn from the copartnership. The complaint further alleges that defendants removed from the property a large portion of the joint property of the parties to said agreement, without the consent of plaintiff, and that plaintiff, by reason of the failure of the defendants to render monthly statements as provided in said contract, was unable to ascertain the true condition of affairs of the respective parties to said agreement on September 30, 1913, or since said date. The plaintiff asked for the appointment of a receiver, and a receiver was appointed, who sold the property belonging to the copartnership.

The defendants answered and filed a cross-complaint, and upon the issues presented by the pleadings the case was tried and the court found that the plaintiff and defendants entered into the contract as described in the complaint; that on June 1, 1909, the plaintiff contributed to said copartnership property of the value of $3,729.72; that defendants at that time contributed property to the value of $1,212.10; that plaintiff on said date became a creditor to the copartnership in the sum of $2,517.62, which bore interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from June 1, 1909; that at the time of the commencement of the action plaintiff had made loans to the partnership, which had not been repaid, and that defendants had removed from the Shasta View Ranch a large portion of the joint property of the parties to said agreement without the consent of plaintiff; that the amount received by defendants, being $75 per month, was $3,850, which together with interest at 6 per cent. per annum amounted to $5,260.50; that by reason of the neglect of defendants the plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $500; that the net amount received from the receiver's sale totaled to $2,096.78.

The court rendered judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $3,021.49, and decreed that plaintiff have the money received from the receiver's sale of the property. The defendants by their answer admitted entering into a written contract, but denied that such agreement was the agreement described in plaintiff's complaint. The defendants claimed:

"That the said written agreement referred to in plaintiff's complaint, and a copy of which is attached to said complaint and marked 'Exhibit A,' is not the legal and true agreement which was entered into between plaintiff and defendants for the care and custody and management of said property, and in this regard these defendants show that they had an original of the true agreement entered into between plaintiff and defendants, but that the same was destroyed by fire on or about the month of July, 1913."

Appellants contend that the evidence was insufficient to sustain findings 6, 7, 9, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19; their claim being that none of these findings can be upheld, unless the contract as set out in the plaintiff's complaint be proved. It appears from the evidence that the original contract that the plaintiff had was lost, and could not be produced, and a duplicate original which defendants had was destroyed in a fire which consumed their home and household goods; plaintiff was therefore compelled to resort to secondary evidence, and appellants' contention is that plaintiff failed to make the proof required by law.

[1] The plaintiff offered in evidence a letter press copy of the agreement as set out in plaintiff's complaint, to which defendants objected upon the ground "that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, secondary evidence, not the proper way to prove the loss of a document." The objection was overruled, and this ruling is claimed to be error.

It appears from the evidence given at the trial that the original agreement which was signed by plaintiff and the defendants, and which was kept by plaintiff, was lost, and could not be found; that the plaintiff John W. Ulm and his wife, Mrs. Susan J. Ulm, had made diligent search for the same, and neither of them was not able to find it; that the duplicate of the original agreement signed by all the parties, and which was kept by the defendants, was burned on the 6th day of July, 1913, and that the copy that was left with the Montague Bank, which was unsigned by the parties, disappeared, and could not be found by the bank authorities.

It appears that the agreement was typewritten at the plaintiff's office in the city of Chicago, and that a letter press copy of the same was taken. This letter press copy was identified by the plaintiff at the trial, and under the showing made by the plaintiff we think the defendants' objection to the said letter press copy was properly overruled. This ruling of the court is clearly within the rule as announced in Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 34, 73 Pac. 803, and Morison v. Weik, 19 Cal. App. 139, 124 Pac. 869.

In the case of Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 34, 73 Pac. 803, secondary evidence was received to show the contents of a lost deed, and the Supreme Court, in passing upon the question of the amount of proof required in such matters, said:

"The general rule concerning proof of a lost instrument is, that reasonable search shall be made for it in the place where it was last known to have been, and, if such search does not discover it, then inquiry should be made of the persons most likely to have its custody, or who have some reason to know of its whereabouts.

"The party must show that he has in good faith, and to a reasonable degree, made an effort to discover the instrument and to that end has exhausted all sources of information and means of discovery which were open to him, and which in the nature of the case were possible. No fixed rule as to the necessary proof to establish loss, or what constitutes reasonable search, can be formulated. The terms 'reasonable search' and 'in good faith,' applied to proof of lost instruments, must be construed and defined under the facts in each particular case; there is no inflexible definition under which they can be applied to all cases. The sole object of such proof is to raise a reasonable presumption merely that the instrument is lost, and this is a preliminary inquiry, addressed to the discretion of the judge. On this subject it is said: 'The rigor of the common law * * * has been relaxed in this respect, and nonproduction of instruments is now excused for reasons more general and less specific, and upon grounds more broad and liberal than were formerly admitted. If any suspicion hangs over the instrument, or that it is designedly withheld, a rigid inquiry should be made into the reasons for its nonproduction. But where there is no such suspicion, all that ought to be required is reasonable diligence to obtain the original—in fact, courts in such cases are extremely liberal. And as far as the sufficiency of the proof so offered is concerned, the rule in questions of this character is that the trial judge is to determine the sufficiency of the proof. Under the facts and circumstances developed in the case, if they are sufficient to reasonably satisfy the mind of the court that the original is lost, and that it cannot be found after search made at the proper place, that is all that is necessary, and the sufficiency of the proof of the search being, in general, left to the discretion of the trial judge, this court will not review its rulings in that respect, unless the proof is manifestly insufficient to have warranted the secondary evidence.' "

In Morison v. Weik, 19 Cal. App. 139, 124 Pac. 869, secondary evidence of a lost deed was received over plaintiff's objection, and the court in affirming the judgment said:

"Without entering upon a full discussion of the evidence, suffice it to say that it was sufficient to satisfy the mind of the court that the instrument was unintentionally mislaid or lost, and that after a diligent search made therefor it could not be found. Such preliminary proof is left to the discretion of the trial judge, and, unless manifestly insufficient to warrant the introduction of secondary evidence, his ruling will not be disturbed on appeal."

See, also, King v. Samuel, 7 Cal. App. 55, 93 Pac. 391; California National Bank v. Weldon, 14 Cal. App. 765, 113 Pac. 334.

[2] Complaint is made by appellants that the finding, "That all fence material used, and all fencing constructed upon the aforesaid property during the term of said agreement was under the provisions thereof a partnership expense," is not sustained by the evidence. The contract provides:

"That the parties of the second part will look after and care for all of the buildings and improvements on or connected with the ranch, and will proceed, at once, so soon as the present crop is cared for, to place fences and all the buildings in repair, the materials for such repair shall be purchased in joint account, but the labor of placing said fences and buildings in repair shall be done by or at the cost and expense of said parties of the second part."

Under this provision defendants argue that there was no agreement by which defendants should build new fences, and that they should have been allowed a credit of $1,100, the amount that it cost them to put in a Page wire fence, and that said $1,100 should not be a charge against the copartnership.

The defendant C. W. Prather testified that when he took the place in 1909, the fences had been built a long term of years; that the posts were rotted off, and the boards would not hold nails, and that while he was there he put in about a mile and a half of Page wire fence; that he thought it was in 1911; that the fences were in that condition that they would not hold large bodies of stock cattle; had to keep a rider with them all the time; sometimes had as high as 900 head of cattle, and one time he had 1,000 head of cattle on the ranch, and had to rent some land outside.

Because defendants put in Page wire fencing in place of posts that were rotted off and boards that would not hold nails does not take this matter out of the terms of the said agreement, and the said finding, in our opinion, is supported by the said contract and the evidence.

The matter of the granting of a receiver in this case was before this court in Ulm v. Prather, 29 Cal. App. 92, 154 Pac. 611, and the order appointing a receiver was there affirmed.

We think the evidence is sufficient to sustain finding No. 16, to the effect that—

"By reason of the failure, neglect, and refusal of said defendants to render to said plaintiff the statements and reports contemplated by said agreement, said plaintiff was unable, at the date of the commencement of said action, to ascertain the true condition of the affairs of the respective parties to said agreement on September 30, 1913, or thereafter."

The plaintiff testified that at the expiration of the contract he made an effort to have a settlement with Mr. Prather at the ranch, but he was not successful. He also, prior to bringing the action, caused a letter to be directed to the defendants, by which he sought information in regard to the accounts, and by this letter demanded from defendants a full and complete statement, showing the true status, on September 30, 1913, of the business transacted under the agreement.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

TEXTILE NAT. BANK v. LAWRENCE.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 27, 1920.)

Limitation of actions ⊂=149(1)—Letter in evidence held insufficient to renew obligation by unconditional promise.

A letter in evidence held not to make such an unequivocal acknowledgment of an obligation or an unconditional promise to pay it as would be sufficient to keep the obligation alive beyond the time when it was otherwise barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Jerome, Judge.

Action by the Textile National Bank against V. O. Lawrence. Judgment for plaintiff upon first count, and for defendant upon second, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Charles C. Boynton, of Oakland, for appellant.

R. S. Norman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action brought to recover upon two certain promissory notes executed by the defendant in the year 1909 in the state of Pennsylvania. The complaint in two counts sets forth these two obligations, one in each count, and prays judgment for the aggregate sum alleged to be due thereon. The complaint as to each of these obligations also alleges that at various dates between the 30th of December, 1913, and the 15th of May, 1916, the defendant acknowledged his said indebtedness in writing and promised to pay the same. The answer of the defendant denies his indebtedness upon each of those obligations and denies his acknowledgment and agreement to pay the same as set forth in said complaint, and further pleads that both causes of action are barred by various provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the statute of limitations. Upon the trial of the cause the court gave judgment in the plaintiff's favor upon the first count in his complaint, and in the defendant's favor upon the second count thereof. The defendant appeals from the judgment rendered against him upon said first count.

The evidence presented on the trial of the cause showed that the defendant had removed to the state of California in the month of June, 1912, and thereafter and up to the time of the institution of said action resided therein, and that his several letters, six in all, with relation to these obligations were dated and written respectively on December 30, 1913, January 24, 1914, June 2, 1914, November 21, 1914, January 4, 1915, and May 15, 1916, while the defendant was so residing in the state of California. The sole question involved in the case upon this appeal is as to whether the defendant has by these letters or any of them sufficiently acknowledged his indebtedness to the said plaintiff upon the obligation set forth in the first count of its complaint as to take the same out of the bar of the statute of limitations.

As to the first five of these letters it is not necessary to set forth herein their contents in full, for the reason that in our opinion they do contain a sufficient acknowledgment of the existence of said obligation to keep alive the original obligation during the period between the date of the first of said letters and a date two years after the last of said five letters so written. This action was therefore properly brought upon the original obligation, and had the same been instituted at any time during the above period it would not have been subject to the bar of the statute of limitations. The date of the commencement of this action, however, was April 6, 1917, which, as will be seen, was more than two years after the date when the last of the five letters above referred to was written; and it follows, therefore, that while the plaintiff may have been entitled to rely upon this series of acknowledgments for its right to bring this action upon the original obligation, it was not entitled to rely upon them for its right to maintain this action against the bar of the statute of limitations, for the reason that subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it read at the time of the institution of this action, required that action founded upon instruments in writing executed out of the state of California must be brought within two years after the right of action accrued in this state. This being so, the plaintiff's sole reliance for its right to maintain this action and to sustain the judgment rendered in its favor therein must depend upon the construction to be placed upon the sixth letter, written by the defendant to the plaintiff on May 15, 1916. This letter reads in full as follows:

"Mr. H. Brockelhurst, c/o Textile National Bank, Philadelphia—Dear Sir: I fully realize your position, but also know my own. I agreed to pay the Jones note at the rate of $25 a month, and did so until I received a peremptory demand from Mr. Darling to pay the collateral loan, advised that if not paid the bonds would be sold and you would immediately proceed against me for the difference.

"I want to pay you one hundred cents on the dollar, unless you destroy my ability to make the hundred cents, and a suit for either item would cause just as much damage as for both of them. I am perfectly willing to make a monthly payment of $25 now, and can do so. My prospects are getting better all the time, and my business has been developed by me from nothing to the point where it may interest outside capital. There is a project now to form a Bush terminal here, if so, my present plant is the natural nucleus. In any event, if you and your associates can see your way clear to accept a monthly payment at this time, you can depend upon it that my account will be eventually balanced without a penny of loss. I do not want any lawsuit at any time, as it can do only harm and cannot hasten matters.

"I am going to be in Cincinnati as a delegate in July, and expect to be in Philadelphia for a few days. I will be glad then to state to you frankly how I am situated.

"Yours truly, V. C. Lawrence."

It is the respondent's contention herein that the foregoing letter contains a sufficient acknowledgment of the obligation sued upon in the first count of its complaint to take the case out of the statute of limitations. We are unable to give our assent to its contention, since we cannot find in the terms of this letter any such unequivocal acknowledgment of said obligation or unconditional promise to pay the same as would suffice to keep alive said obligation beyond the time when it was otherwise barred by the provisions of section 339, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The case of Rodgers v. Byers, 127 Cal. 531, 60 Pac. 43, would seem to be squarely in point sustaining this view. In that case the court held that such promises contained in a defendant's letters as "I will liquidate that note as soon as I can get the money," and "I wish it was in my power to send you money at this time, but it is not. Will send you some as soon as I can get it. I hope to get money soon. Will sell cattle at the first good offer," and "I have no intention of not paying the note, and will as soon as I can, but can't now"—do not constitute absolute and unconditional promises to pay. In reference to these the court says:

"In none of these letters is there an absolute and unconditional promise to pay. The promise in each case is made conditional upon the promisor's financial ability."

In the case of Snyder v. Dederichs, 39 Cal. App. 628, 179 Pac. 535, the defendant's purported acknowledgment was in the following terms: "Your letter received in regard to the money I did get from Willard. * * * Still if I would make money, and see my way through, I would send you some money, and I will the first chance that I make something I will help you. * * * I loaned a party some money which he promised sure by next month I would get $300 of it. Should I succeed in this I will send you sure $150 or $200 of this. At the present time I cannot do anything on account I have not it. * * * You know if I got it I would help you, but it is impossible to do so at the present time."

In commenting upon the foregoing language, the court holds that it contains no such distinct, unqualified, and unconditional recognition of the obligation as would be sufficient to satisfy the provisions of section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

In the case of Nixon v. Ramsey, 180 Pac. 649, the acknowledgment relied upon was in the following terms:

"It is impossible right at the present time for me to pay any part of the above amount—I hope to be able some time soon to hole thing up—I am not making any promises—I hope to be able to pay the whole thing up some day."

This, the court held, was not a sufficient acknowledgment to take the case out of the terms of the statute.

Each of the two last-cited cases referred to the case of Powell v. Petch, 166 Cal. 329, 136 Pac. 55, as authority for the conclusion arrived at. In that case the defendant wrote: "What is the status of my indebtedness to you regarding the lot you bought?" The Supreme Court held that the use of the term "my indebtedness" was not a sufficient acnowledgment to avoid the bar of the statute, and in so doing referred to the case of Bullion, etc., Bank v. Hegler (C. C.) 93 Fed. 890, in which case section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state was under review, and in reference to which two letters of a defendant were relied upon to take his note out of the statute of limitations. In the first of these letters the defendant, after referring to his notes, said:

"Beg to say that I cannot pay the note or interest time, nor until I can turn some realty or other property into cash, which seems impossible to do at present" —and in the second of his letters wrote:

"Referring to the notes, I do not see any chance for me to pay anything on them just now, nor for certain until I can sell some realty. When I can do this, I can pay you at least a part."

In commenting upon these letters Judge Morrow said:

"There is an acknowledgment in both of these letters that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff; but in neither case is it an acknowledgment from which a promise to pay the debt can be inferred. In other words, it is not an unqualified acknowledgment, since it is accompanied with the condition that he cannot pay, or he does not see any chance to pay, unless he can turn some realty or other property into cash."

It seems clear to us that the promise of the defendant in the case at bar as contained in his letter of May 15, 1916, cannot be held to be such a distinct, unqualified, and unconditional recognition of the obligation set forth in the first count of the plaintiff's complaint as to take the same out of the bar of the statute of limitations, and hence that the judgment of the trial court so holding must be held to have been erroneous. It follows that the judgment must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: WASTE, P. J.; WELCH, Judge pro tem.

QUONG HAM WAH CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 9090.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 5, 1920.)

1. Constitutional law ⊜42—Employer can attack Workmen's Compensation Law as discriminating against nonresident employé.

In proceedings for compensation for injury to a resident employé received outside the state, the employer can raise the objection that Workmen's Compensation Act, § 58, authorizing such proceedings is void, under Const. U. S. art. 4, § 2, cl. 1, because it does not authorize similar proceedings by nonresident workmen.

2. Master and servant ⊜369—"Resident" injured outside state, within Compensation Act, includes only citizens and resident aliens.

Within Workmen's Compensation Act, § 58, authorizing compensation for injuries received outside the state, where the employés were residents of the state and the contract of employment was made therein, the term "resident" applies only to citizens or to aliens domiciled within the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Resident.]

3. Courts ⊜8—Statutes have no effect as law beyond state boundaries.

Though other states may give effect to statutes outside the borders of the state enacting them, a state statute cannot have any effect as a law beyond the borders of the state which enacts it.

4. Action ⊜3—State can create right or obligation based on act occurring outside borders.

A state can by statute create a right or obligation enforceable within its borders, which is based on an act occurring outside its borders.

5. Master and servant ⊜347 — Compensation Act provision for injuries outside state within state's powers.

Workmen's Compensation Act, § 58, authorizing compensation to an employé for injuries received outside the state, where the contract of employment was made within the state, merely attaches an additional incident to a contract made within the state, and is within the powers of the state to enact.

6. Constitutional law ⊜207(1) — Compensation to residents only for injury outside state discriminates against citizens of other states.

The provision of Workmen's Compensation Act, § 58, allowing compensation for injuries outside of the state, where the contract was made within the state, only to residents of the state, gives citizens of the state a privilege denied to the citizens of other states, contrary to Const. U. S. art. 4, § 2, cl. 1.

7. Constitutional law ⊜207(1)—Equal privileges clause applies, unless regulation indirectly discriminates.

The provision of Const. U. S. art. 4, § 2, cl. 1, giving citizens of every state all privileges of citizens of the several states, applies without exception to all privileges, unless there is reasonable ground for restricting privileges to those acquainted with conditions in the state, as in the practice of law and in some other professions and occupations, in which case the restrictions can be imposed, though indirectly discriminating against citizens of other states.

8. Constitutional law ⊜207(1)—Statute discriminating against citizens of other states not invalid, but extended to such citizens.

Workmen's Compensation Act, § 58, authorizing compensation for injuries received outside of state, is not invalid because it authorizes such compensation only to resident employés, contrary to Const. U. S. art. 4, § 2, cl. 1: but that provision of the Constitution merely operates to extend the privilege to nonresident employés.

9. Constitutional law ⟸207(1)—Discriminating burdens invalidated by federal Constitution, but not discriminating privileges.

Const. U. S. art. 4, § 2, cl. 1, giving citizens of each state rights and privileges of citizens of the several states, makes invalid a state statute imposing a burden on citizens of other states not imposed on its own citizens; but, in case of a statute giving benefits to the citizens of the states, the constitutional provision merely extends benefits to noncitizens.

Proceeding by Owe Ming under the Workmen's Compensation Act against the Quong Ham Wah Company. Compensation awarded by the Industrial Accident Commission, and the Quong Ham Wah Company brings certiorari against the Commission and others. Award affirmed.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

LENNON, J. Certiorari to review the action of the Industrial Accident Commission in making an award pursuant to the terms of section 58 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act. Stats. 1917, p. 870. Upon the first hearing in this court, the award was annulled upon the theory that said section 58 of the Workmen's Compensation Act granted to citizens of this state a privilege which it denied to noncitizens, and was, therefore, violative of section 2, cl. 1 of article 4 of the federal Constitution. Quong Ham Wah Company v. Industrial Accident Commission, 59 Cal. Dec. 18. Upon petition for rehearing, the judgment of this court in the first instance was set aside, and the cause set down for a hearing for the purpose of considering the following questions:

"(1) To what extent may the state give extraterritorial effect to its laws fixing the incidents of the relation of employer and employé, when such relation has its inception within the state?

"(2) Assuming that the state has the power to give extraterritorial effect to its laws in such a case, and assuming that a discrimination is made between residents and nonresidents of the state by the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act extending the incidents of the relation of the employer and employé therein provided for to residents, but not to nonresidents, when the relation has its inception within the state, but the injury to the employé occurs elsewhere, is such discrimination contrary to the federal Constitution, and, if so, does the federal Constitution have the effect of rendering invalid that portion of the Workmen's Compensation Act providing for such extension in the case of residents, or (a point not made in the original briefs) does it have the effect of allowing this portion of the act to stand as effective and valid, but of extending the incidents of the relation under similar circumstances to nonresidents, although there is no provision in the act for such extension to nonresidents?"

Minutes of the Court, 59 Cal. Dec. No. 3111.

In keeping with the order granting a rehearing, counsel for the respective parties briefed the case anew, painstakingly directing their efforts, in addition to a discussion of the points originally made, to an exhaustive exposition of the law appertaining to the subject-matters designated in the order granting the rehearing. Therefore, aside from the recognition due the commendable efforts of counsel to facilitate the avowed purpose of the order, a discussion, not only of the points originally made, but also of those designated in the order, would seem to be necessary to a decision of the case as now presented, even though the latter points were not necessarily involved in the case as prepared and presented in the first instance.

Section 58 of the Workmen's Compensation Act reads as follows:

"The commission shall have jurisdiction over all controversies arising out of injuries suffered without the territorial limits of this state in those cases where the injured employé is a resident of this state at the time of the injury and the contract of hire was made in this state, and any such employé or his dependents shall be entitled to the compensation or death benefits provided by this act." Stats. 1917, p. 870.

[1] Petitioner, the employer of the injured workman, attacks the validity of this statute on the ground that it violates section 2 cl. 1, art. 4, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that—

"The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states."

At the outset we are confronted again, as we were in the first instance, with the contention that the petitioner cannot be heard to question the constitutionality of the statute in controversy, because it is not one of the class claimed to be discriminated against by the statute. The provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act now under attack is identical in phraseology with that considered by this court in Estabrook Company v. Ind. Acc. Comn., 177 Cal. 767, 177 Pac. 848. In that case this court expressly declared that it was not required to pass upon the constitutional question sought to be raised, and declined to discuss that question upon the merits, because, as was held:

"A contention that a statute denies equal rights and privileges by discriminating between persons and classes of persons 'may not be raised by one not belonging to the class alleged to be discriminated against.'" Estabrook v. Ind. Acc. Comn., supra.

Such, undoubtedly, is the general rule; but the Estabrook Case is fundamentally wrong, if it is to be taken as definitely deciding that there are no exceptions to the general rule enunciated therein, and, if that be its purport, it should be flatly overruled, as was done by a majority of the court in the opinion rendered in the first instance in the instant case. Quong Ham Wah Company v. Ind. Acc. Comn., supra.

Apparently, however, the court in the Estabrook Case did no more than declare and apply the general rule that a statute purporting to make an unconstitutional discrimination between persons or classes of persons cannot be assailed on the ground of unconstitutionality by a person not belonging to the class discriminated against. This general rule, however, is not a hard and fast rule which must be arbitrarily and inflexibly applied to every situation involving the constitutionality of a statute, regardless of contingencies which may extend its operation beyond the confines of the classes which it was aimed to cover and control and which ultimately culminates in a grievance against persons not originally within the contemplation of the statute. In other words, the general rule under discussion and decision in the Estabrook Case must necessarily be subject to certain well-defined exceptions which, in so far as a persual of the record in the Estabrook Case shows, were not, in that case, pressed upon the attention of the court. Clearly the petitioner in the instant case has brought itself within the scope of one or more of the recognized exceptions to the general rule enunciated in the Estabrook Case.

Thus, where no member of a class alleged to be unlawfully discriminated against by a statute is in a position to raise the constitutional question, then any person affected by the application of the statute can urge its unconstitutionality In Greene v. State, 83 Neb. 84, 119 N. W. 6, 131 Am. St. Rep. 626, the plaintiff in error was convicted under a statute making it a penal offense to commit "blackmail" against citizens or residents of the state of Nebraska. On appeal he urged that the statute was unconstitutional by reason of the fact that it operated to protect only citizens and residents of the state of Nebraska, and therefore unlawfully discriminated against the citizens and residents of all other states. In upholding this contention the court said:

"We have not overlooked those cases which hold that a court will not listen to an objection made to the constitutionality of an act by a party whose rights it does not affect, and who has, therefore, no interest in defeating it. Where the constitutional objection is that the penalties of the law are directed against a certain class without any just reason for such discrimination, it is safe to leave the question of the constitutionality of such laws to be raised by the parties against whom the discrimination is made; and such have been the facts in all the cases we have examined laying down this rule. It is inapplicable to a case where the vice of the law consists in an unwarranted discrimination between the individuals against whom the aggression thereby forbidden is committed. In such cases there is no way by which any person within the jurisdiction of the state denied the protection of its criminal law could bring the question before a court for its determination. If the Legislature should enact a law amending our Criminal Code, so that the crimes therein specified should be crimes only when committed against citizens or residents of the state, such an act would be absolutely void; but its invalidity could never be brought before the court by any person belonging to the classes thereby denied the protection of the criminal law. If we apply to such a law the rule that its constitutionality would only be considered when the objection was made by a party discriminated against, there could be no objection to its validity. When such a law is sought to be enforced against any person, whether belonging to the classes discriminated against or not, it should be declared void."

Respondents suggest that the reasoning of this case is based upon an inaccurate conception of the nature and effect of an unconstitutionally discriminatory statute. Such statute is, they contend, not merely presumptively valid until it is set aside by the courts; but, unlike other statutes which offend against the Constitution, it is actually and legally valid until set aside. Were this view of the nature of a discriminatory statute to be accepted, the doctrine of Greene v. State, supra, might be paraphrased thus: That such a law is in fact valid as to all classes except the class discriminated against, unless that class is precluded from making a complaint, in which event the law is invalid as to every class. Such a doctrine would assuredly be strange and indefensible. The truth of the matter is, however, that a discriminatory law is, equally with the other laws offensive to the Constitution, no law at all. Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 72, 38 Sup. Ct. 16, 62 L. Ed. 149, L. R. A. 1918C, 210, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 1201. Whatever validity it may be said to possess, it has such validity merely by virtue of the presumption of validity attaching to the acts of the legislative branch of the government. This presumption, being rebuttable, may be attacked by a litigant whenever it is material to his case, unless he is prevented from doing so by some special exception. Such exceptions possess no peculiar sanctity, and invest the law with no actual validity; they should naturally be confined by the limits of the reasons which occasioned their adoption, and should give way to considerations of policy paramount to those reasons. Such an exception exists in the matter of attack upon the presumptive validity of a discriminatory statute, and is to the effect that only a member of the class discriminated against can attack the presumption. The reason for the exception is to be found in the rule that the courts will consider questions of the constitutionality of statutes only when such consideration is a necessity in the determination of a real earnest and vital controversy between individuals. The exception, if literally accepted in its general form, is broader than the reason upon which it is based; but, independently of this consideration, it must yield to a policy paramount to the reason itself where no member of the class discriminated against can raise the question.

The reason for the exception is in the nature of a rule developed for the regulation of the ultimate and supreme function of the courts to declare unconstitutional statutes to be void and of no effect; and such a regulatory rule must itself be subject to exception where it would otherwise operate to prevent altogether the exercise of this function, a function which it is the most solemn duty of the courts to exercise in a state governed under a written Constitution which is the supreme law of the land. Where no member of a class discriminated against could ever attack the constitutionality of the discriminatory statute, the rule reserving to such persons the right to raise the constitutional question would totally prevent the exercise by the court of its function of passing upon that question, and would place it in a position where it would for all time enforce rights and obligations created by an obviously void enactment. In such case any litigant to the determination of whose claim the constitutional question is fairly relevant should be permitted to raise the constitutional question. In the instant case, the Compensation Act does not give the commission jurisdiction over controversies arising out of injuries sustained abroad by workmen who are not residents of California. It is clear, therefore, that a nonresident would have no standing before the commission or before any court to make a claim under the act; and, not having jurisdiction over his injury, neither the commission nor the courts could entertain or adjudicate his claim for compensation, nor the constitutional question involved. Since, therefore, no member of the class discriminated against can ever raise the constitutional question, the petitioner is entitled to assail the constitutionality of the statute, since a determination of that question is clearly relevant in determining its rights herein.

Moreover, the fact that the constitutional rights of petitioner are directly affected by the statute here in question shows that the determination of the constitutionality of a discriminatory statute may be a necessity in the determination of a real and vital controversy between parties, neither one of whom is a member of the class discriminated against, and that, therefore, the general rule that only members of the unfavored class may attack the enactment is broader than the reason upon which it is based. In this behalf respondents suggest that the cases indicate that the constitutionality of a discriminatory statute can be raised only by one injured by the discrimination, and in no case by one whose constitutional or other rights are injured by the legislation. A careful analysis of the cases presented fails to support this theory.

Moreover, the Supreme Court of the United States has announced and acted upon the contrary rule in Buchanan v. Warley, supra, a decision which is precisely in point in the instant case. In that case a vendor of land, a white man, sued to compel the vendee, a colored person, to receive and pay for a certain parcel of land which he had agreed to buy. Defendant had judgment in the lower court solely because of the effect of an ordinance making it illegal for colored persons to reside upon the property in question. Plaintiff contended that the ordinance was unconstitutional, for the reason that persons of color were unlawfully discriminated against. His right to assail the statute on the ground stated was questioned, on the theory that he was not a member of the class discriminated against. The court clearly recognized, as it has done both in earlier and in subsequent cases, that in general one cannot assail the constitutionality of a statute in reliance upon the grievance of another; but it pointed out that, while plaintiff had no grievance by reason of the discrimination, he had a grievance by reason of the legislation, which by narrowing the market for his land deprived him of property; such deprivation being without due process of law in event the statute was for any reason unconstitutional. The court proceeded, therefore, to consider the merits of the constitutional question of discrimination.

That case is precisely in point here, for, in the instant case, while petitioner has no grievance by reason of any discrimination, it has a grievance by reason of the legislation, which, by imposing upon it the liability of an insurer for certain classes of its employés, operates to deprive it of property; such deprivation being without due process of law in event the statute is for any reason unconstitutional. The constitutional question of discrimination must therefore be discussed and decided.

[2] Section 58 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917 restricts the right to claim the benefit of the act in the case of injuries suffered abroad to employés who are residents of California at the time of the injury. Since the act assumes that at the time of the injury the employé will be beyond the boundaries of the state, the word "residents" must necessarily have been used to designate "persons domiciled in" California. Citizens of the United States domiciled in California are citizens of the state. Pol. Code, Cal. § 51. The benefits of the act are therefore extended solely to citizens of California and to aliens domiciled within the state. It follows that there is a direct discrimination against aliens not domiciled in California, with which we are not concerned, and against citizens of other states of the Union, which, if without legal justification, renders the statute unconstitutional. Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 247, 19 Sup. Ct. 165, 43 L. Ed. 432; Id., 176 U. S. 59, 67, 20 Sup. Ct. 307, 44 L. Ed. 371.

Respondents contend that the discrimination is justified upon the ground that the obligation imposed upon employers by the act is created as an incident to the status of master and servant, and is therefore an obligation which can be created only by the law of the place of injury or by the law of the place of the servant's domicile. Were this reasoning sound, it would follow that, in making the discrimination in section 58 of the act upon the basis of domicile, the Legislature was merely recognizing a jurisdictional limit upon its power. Respondents' theory is based, however, upon a misconception of the nature of the statute and of the meaning of the term "extraterritorial," as that term is used in describing the operation of the statute.

[3, 4] The theory of territorial sovereignty has been too long established as a principle of international law to admit of question at this time. Rights created by one state may be recognized and enforced by another state at its pleasure, and likewise a status attached to a person by one state may be recognized by another state, into which that person may travel, at the pleasure of the latter state; but as law the mandates of the sovereign of a given state can have no effect beyond the territorial limits to which his rule is extended. When, therefore, it is said that a statute, such as the Workmen's Compensation Act, has an extraterritorial effect, it cannot mean that the law does, or attempts to, create rights abroad; it can only mean that an act occurring beyond the geographical limits of the state is recognized as the basis for the creation, or condition for the enforcement, of a right created and enjoyed within this state. The power of an absolute sovereign to thus sanction the enforcement, within the territory subject to the jurisdiction of that sovereign, of rights based upon acts occurring abroad cannot be questioned upon the ground of any inherent deficiency. It is therefore a power which may be exercised by this state, subject only to the restrictions of the state and federal Constitutions.

We may assume, in accordance with the contention of respondents, that if the imposition of the obligation to compensate a servant, not domiciled within the state, for injuries sustained without the geographical limits of the state, were an attempt to create an obligation merely as an incident to a status, such legislation would conflict with well-defined legal principles. Whether such a law would amount to a mere regulation of status, or to an expression of a positive duty, the breach of which would be tantamount to a tort, it may be conceded that a law of that nature would not lie within the law-making province of a state which was neither the domicile of the servant nor the locus delicti. The effect and purpose of the act now under consideration, however, cannot be held to be the regulation of a status or imposition of a tort liability. It is true that the extension of the liability imposed by the act to acts occurring beyond the territorial limits of the state cannot be supported on the simple theory that the obligation so imposed is, strictly speaking, purely a contractual liability, for the proposition that a compulsory statute is a contract has been definitely repudiated by this court. North Alaska Salmon Co. v. Pillsbury, 174 Cal. 1, 162 Pac. 93, L. R. A. 1917E, 642.

[5] But the statute which is now before us assumes to extend its effect only to those cases where the contract of hire was made in this state. It is therefore not an attempt to create an obligation merely as an incident to a status, but is, in form and substance, a genuine regulation of contracts subject to the sovereignty of the state. The liability which it imposes is, so as to speak, in a class by itself, being neither strictly contractual nor delictual, and it may, for want of a better term, be described as quasi ex contractu. Post v. Burger, 216 N. Y. 544, 550, 111 N. E. 351, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 158; Berton v. Dry Dock Co. (D. C.) 219 Fed. 763. The contract creates a relationship under the sanction of the law and the same law attaches as an incident thereto an obligation to compensate for injuries sustained abroad, amounting to a sort of compulsory insurance. The Legislature may lawfully impose that right and duty upon those operating under a contract subject to the legislative power, and no principle of law is defeated by attaching to such contracts the same duties and rights as incidents to acts abroad that are lawfully imposed as incidents to the same acts occurring within the geographical limits of the state. Angell on Recovery under Workmen's Compensation Law for Injuries Abroad, 31 Harvard Law Review, 16; Smith v. Heine Safety Boiler Co., 224 N. Y. 9, 119

N. E. 878, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 316; Jenkins v. T. Hogan & Sons, 177 App. Div. 36, 163 N. Y. Supp. 707.

It is at once apparent that the Legislature has equal power to provide for the creation of a compulsory obligation to compensate for injury suffered elsewhere as a regulation of contracts subject to the sovereignty of the state whether the contracting employé be domiciled in this state or not. Story on Conflict of Laws (8th Ed.) p. 375; Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 416, 156 Pac. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390. Since, therefore, the right is created only in favor of citizens of the state and domiciled aliens, there is a direct discrimination against citizens of sister states.

[6] The right of the Legislature to impose reasonable regulations upon contracts subject to its sovereinty is unquestioned. When, however, the Legislature attempts to provide that a substantial privilege shall be incident to certain contracts of employment when entered into in this state by citizens of this state, and that that privilege shall not be incident to identical contracts of employment when entered into in this state by citizens of other states of our Union, the enactment is clearly in contravention of section 2, cl. 1, art. 4, of the federal Constitution.

"Different states may have different policies, and the same state may have different policies at different times. But any policy the state may choose to adopt must operate in the same way on its own citizens and those of other states. The privileges which it affords to one class it must afford to the other. Any law by which privileges to begin actions in the courts are given to its own citizens and withheld from the citizens of other states is void, because in conflict with the supreme law of the land." Chambers v. B. & O. R. Co., 207 U. S. 142, 28 Sup. Ct. 34, 52 L. Ed. 143.

It is true that many procedural discriminations between citizens and noncitizens have been upheld, but the rule applied in such situations has no application where a substantial substantive right is granted to citizens and under like circumstances is denied to citizens of other states. The statute here in question provides for the creation within this state of a right to accident insurance as an incident to certain contracts of employment in favor of citizens, and opens the doors of its courts and commissions to citizens to enable them to enforce that right. This right is not accorded to citizens of other states. A privilege and protection of the laws of a substantial nature is thereby accorded to citizens of this state and denied to citizens of other states. This is forbidden by the federal Constitution. Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 19 Sup. Ct. 165, 43 L. Ed. 432.

[7] The Constitution provides that—

"The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states."

The provision appears without qualification. Its effect is not limited to those cases where its operation will not interfere with the internal policy of the state or with considerations which appear to affect the general welfare. Its mandate is absolute. It is true that a state may, in the valid exercise of its police power, limit the right of individuals to engage in certain professions or callings. Such regulations will be upheld, even though their effect is indirectly to place noncitizens at a disadvantage, but the regulation must be inherently reasonable. Ex parte Spinney, 10 Nev. 323; La Tourette v. McMaster, 248 U. S. 465, 39 Sup. Ct. 160, 63 L. Ed. 362. The principles applied in these cases cannot be invoked under the facts presented here. No reasonable ground can be found for the classification.

Respondents make the contention that the court should uphold the right of the state to require compulsory compensation for its citizens alone, inasmuch as it is only citizens or their families who are likely to become a public charge upon the state as a result of injuries sustained abroad. The argument expresses a very excellent reason for requiring compulsory compensation for citizens, but it expresses no reason at all for denying the same right to citizens of other states. In the cases of which Ex parte Spinney and La Tourette v. McMaster, supra, are examples, restraints upon engaging in certain occupations which bore more heavily upon citizens of other states were upheld, upon the ground that the public good required that the occupations in question be opened only to those having had business or professional experience within the state; the general safety and welfare necessitating the exclusion of others. In none of these cases was the rule sanctioned that a privilege could be granted to a citizen of one state and denied to citizens of other states, for the reason that public policy did not require that the privilege be entended to the latter class of persons. Such a rule would be manifestly unsound, and altogether in conflict with the constitutional provision here in question. No consideration of public policy requires that citizens of sister states be excluded from the benefits of the act here under consideration. The fact that considerations of public policy do not affirmatively require the extension of the benefits in question to citizens of sister states as strongly as they require their extension to citizens of this state furnishes absolutely no sound reason for the exclusion of the former, and affords no reasonable basis for the discrimination.

It follows that the discrimination made in section 58 of the Workmen's Compensation Act contravenes the provisions of the federal Constitution.

[8] It is contended, however, and correctly, that the provisions of the federal Constitution do not have the effect of rendering invalid that portion of the Workmen's Compensation Act providing for an extension of its benefits to residents who are injured abroad, but that it allows this portion of the act to stand as effective and valid, and automatically and without regard to the intent of the state Legislature extends the benefits created by the act to nonresidents, or rather to such nonresidents as are citizens of sister states. In support of this contention respondents rely upon Estate of Johnson, 139 Cal. 532, 73 Pac. 424, 96 Am. St. Rep. 161. No good reason has been advanced for departing from the doctrine therein declared as follows:

"It will be noted, not only that the constitutional provision is not restrictive, but that it is neither penal nor prohibitory. It nowhere intimates that an immunity conferred upon citizens of a state, because not in terms conferred upon citizens of sister states, shall therefore be void. Some force might be given to such an argument, were the constitutional provision couched in appropriate language for the purpose. If, for example, it had said, 'No citizen of any state shall be granted any immunity not granted to every citizen of every state,' or had it begun its declaration by saying that 'it shall be unlawful to grant to citizens of any state any privilege or immunity not granted to citizens of every state,' it might then have been argued that a legislative attempt so to do would be declared violative of the express mandate of the Constitution, and therefore void. But such is neither the scope, purpose, nor intent of the provision under consideration. It leaves to the state perfect freedom to grant such privileges to its citizens as it may see fit, but secures to the citizens of all the other states, by virtue of the constitutional enactment itself, the same rights, privileges, and immunities. So that, in every state law conferring immunities and privileges upon citizens, the constitutional clause under consideration, ex proprio vigore, becomes an express part of such statute. * * * The Constitution itself becomes a part of the law. And this, in giving operation to that constitutional provision, is what the courts have always done. They have never stricken down the immunity and the privilege which a state may have accorded to its own citizens. They have never annulled the exemption. They have always construed the law so as to relieve the citizens of other states, and place all upon equal footing."

This is in harmony with and declaratory of the principle laid down by the United States Supreme Court in the Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 77 (21 L. Ed. 394) in the following words:

"The constitutional provision there alluded to did not create those rights which it called privileges and immunities of citizens of the states. * * * Nor did it profess to control the power of the state governments over the rights of its own citizens. Its sole purpose was to declare to the several states that whatever those rights, as you grant or establish them to your own citizens, or as you limit or qualify, or impose restrictions on their exercise, the same, neither more nor less, shall be the measure of the rights of citizens of other states within your jurisdiction."

[9] The discrimination complained of in the instant case is to be found in the fact that the state statute under consideration confers upon the citizens of the state privileges and immunities which are not extended by the terms of the statute, either expressly or impliedly, to nonresidents of the state, and clearly the statute in question does not impose nor attempt to impose upon noncitizens of the state burdens or exactions not imposed upon citizens of the state. This difference is all important in controlling the construction and application of that provision of the federal Constitution which declares that—

"The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states."

For, where a state endeavors to place a burden upon noncitizens of the state which is not put upon citizens of the state, obviously the effect of the federal constitutional provision is to abort the endeavor of the state. On the other hand, however, where a state by statute endeavors to confer and does confer upon its citizens privileges and immunities not accorded by the statute to citizens of other states, the federal Constitution operates, by the very force of its own language, to place citizens of other states in the same category and upon the same footing as citizens of the state, in so far as concerns the right to have and enjoy the privileges and immunities conferred by the state upon its own citizens. In other words, the federal constitutional provision was designed for the protection of noncitizens, and therefore, in any given case calling for its application, the case and the application must be considered from the viewpoint and in the light of the welfare of the noncitizen.

Viewed in this light, it is clear that, when a state statute imposes a burden on a noncitizen which is not imposed on the citizen of the state, the noncitizen may have relief from the burden thus imposed by invoking the provision of the federal Constitution for the nullification of the discriminatory legislation. But, when a privilege is granted to a citizen and withheld from a noncitizen, the latter finds relief in the provision of the federal Constitution which, by operation of law, so to speak, extends the privilege to him. The obvious resulting difference in the operation and effect of the federal constitutional provision under discussion, is the paramount point of the decision in the Estate of Johnson, supra, and it cannot be said that the extension to noncitizens of a statutory privilege granted only to citizens is judicial legislation, for clearly it is the federal Constitution itself, and not the courts, which declares that, if citizens of a state are by statute granted privileges and immunities, noncitizens of the state shall likewise be "entitled" to them. The case of Spraigue v. Thompson, 118 U. S. 90, 6 Sup. Ct. 988, 30 L. Ed. 115, which enunciates the principle that the courts cannot eliminate a discriminatory statutory exception, and thereby make the statute effective as to a class which the Legislature did not have in mind, has application only to that class of cases where it is attempted by the state to put a burden upon nonresidents. That case has no application to the extension to nonresidents of a privilege granted to residents, and, apparently, has never been applied to the latter situation.

The very recent case of Travis v. Yale & Towne Mfg. Co., 252 U. S. 60, 40 Sup. Ct. 228, 64 L. Ed. ——, is relied upon in support of the contention that Estate of Johnson, supra, has been overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States. At first blush this case would seem to weaken the ruling of this court in Estate of Johnson. However, upon a close analysis of the Travis Case, it will be found that it in no wise affects the doctrine of Estate of Johnson. The facts of the former case, substantially stated, were that the state of New York had imposed an income tax upon residents and nonresidents, but granted an exemption to residents of the state on the first $1,000 of their incomes, and further provided that every "withholding agent" (including employers) should deduct and withhold 2 per centum from all salaries, wages, etc., payable to nonresidents, where the amount paid to any individual equaled or exceeded $1,000 in a year, and should pay the tax to the state comptroller. The court held, in affirmance of the judgment of the District Court of New York made in the first instance, that in granting to residents exemptions denied to nonresidents the statute violated the provisions of section 2, cl. 1, art. 4, of the federal Constitution; but a careful reading of the decision in that case reveals the fact that the court did not hold that the entire statutory scheme involved in that case was altogether void and nugatory. That is to say, the court did not declare that the statute was invalid in so far as it related to the imposition of a tax which, when freed and cleared of the attempted unwarranted discriminations, operated uniformly upon residents and nonresidents alike. True it is the court did not, in holding the attempted discrimination unwarranted, declare in terms that the exemptions granted to residents should by the conjunctive operation of the state statute and the fundamental law of the land be extended to nonresidents; but in this behalf it is important to note that neither did the court decide that the statute was wholly invalid—that is to say, that residents and nonresidents entirely escaped the burden of taxation because of the attempted discrimination. That it was not the purpose of the court to so declare is manifest, we think, by the decree rendered in the first instance by the United States District Court of New York and affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

That decree, although not set out in the opinion of the Supreme Court, is before us by the courtesy and consent of counsel for the respective parties in the instant case, and may therefore, we take it, be rightly referred to in aid of the ascertainment of the scope and effect of the opinion of the Supreme Court. The decree mentioned does not, as counsel for the petitioner here contend, enjoin the state of New York from in any way collecting all or any part of the tax in question from nonresidents. While it does enjoin the collection of the state tax from the complainants, who were the "withholding agents" and the source of the income upon which the tax was levied, nevertheless it does not purport to enjoin the collection of the tax, with the discriminations eliminated, directly from resident and nonresident taxpayers. In short, the decree and its affirmance indicate that the court intended to do no more than declare that the discrimination in the granting of exemptions to residents and denying them to nonresidents was, in the language of the Supreme Court itself, "an unwarranted denial to the citizens of Connecticut and New Jersey of the privileges and immunities enjoyed by the citizens of New York." (Italics ours.) In other words, it was the denial to residents of other states of exemptions provided in the statute for residents of the state of New York which was declared to be invalidated by the provision of the federal Constitution. Inasmuch as the court did not strike down the exemptions in so far as they applied to residents, it follows by necessary implication that, if the exemptions could not be denied to nonresidents, and were still extant as to residents, they must be available to nonresidents. This conclusion is confirmed by a perusal of the opinion rendered in the first instance by the District Court, where it was carefully said that—

"Nothing herein * * * is meant to be decided as to the validity of the statute so far as it relates to residents of the state of New York." Yale & Towne Mfg. Co. v. Travis, 262 Fed. 576.

This can mean but one thing, and that is that the act was valid as to residents, and binding to the same extent, and only to the same extent, upon nonresident citizens of other states. While the opinion of the District Court cannot, of course, control the interpretation to be put upon the opinion of the Supreme Court, nevertheless it is illuminating and persuasive when considered in conjunction with the unqualified affirmance by the court of last resort of the decree of the lower court, despite the limitations which the latter court explicitly put upon its judgment.

In any event, it cannot be said from anything contained, either expressly or impliedly, in the Travis decision, that the court there went so far as to say that the act in its entirety was invalid and could not be enforced against residents of the state of New York. Therefore it seems that the Travis Case in no way contravenes the rule and the reason for the rule enunciated in Estate of Johnson, supra, and, bound as this court is by the authority of the decision in that case until definitely overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States, it must apply the rule thereof to the instant case. It follows that, despite the invalidity of the discrimination, the statute itself is valid, and may be made to apply uniformly to citizens of California and the citizens of the other states.

The award is affirmed.

We concur: LAWLOR, J; SLOANE, J.

OLNEY, J. I concur. I agree, for the most part, with the main opinion, but I am not in accord with its discussion of Estabrook Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 177 Cal. 767, 177 Pac. 848, and I would prefer to state as briefly as possible my own views for concurring in the result reached.

The law under discussion extends the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Act to citizens of this state, but not to others, who are injured abroad in the course of their employment, when the employment was originated by contract within the state. The general questions are as to the power of the state to pass such a statute, and, if its power is limited, the exact effect of the limitation upon the statute. These general questions resolve themselves into a series of more particular questions:

First. Has the state any power whatever to prescribe the incidents of the relation of employer and employé, when the employment —that is, the actual rendition of services by the employé—is without the state? If the state has no such power, then the present law is wholly void. That a state has no power to prescribe what the law of another sovereignty shall be is, of course, plain. In this sense, and the true sense, a state can give no extraterritorial effect to its laws whatever. But the present law does not attempt to do this. What it attempts to do is to prescribe what shall be the incidents within this state and according to its own law of a relation existing without its boundaries. So far as I know, an independent sovereign state has the power to prescribe what incidents it pleases shall attach within its own boundaries to any relation, or to any set of facts or happenings, whether existing or occurring within or without its own boundaries. This is nothing more than saying that it has the power to determine what shall be the law within its boundaries. As to this, there is no one to say it nay as a matter of legal right. There is a decided practical limitation, that of the comity of nations; but this is not a limitation imposed by superior law and binding upon the state, but is only a limitation by way of policy, which the state may or may not observe.

The present law, therefore, does not transcend the power inherent in a wholly independent sovereign, and if the state of California has no right to prescribe what shall be the incidents within its borders of an employment abroad, it must be because of some limitation upon its sovereignty. The only limitations of this character are those imposed by the federal Constitution upon it as a constitutent member of the Union, and, so far as I know, there is no general limitation in the federal Constitution upon the power of a state to prescribe the incidents which shall attach within its boundaries and by its own laws to happenings or events occurring elsewhere. I conclude, therefore, that the state had the power to pass the law in question, subject only to such special limitations as the federal Constitution may contain.

Second. Is the law in conflict with any special limitation of the federal Constitution? The only limitation of the federal Constitution which it is claimed the law transcends is that which provides that a citizen of one state shall be entitled to have within another state all the rights and privileges of citizens of the latter. Putting it in a negative way, this constitutional provision means that no state shall discriminate in favor of its own citizens as against those of other states. By the present law our state extends the benefits of its Workmen's Compensation Act to employés who are its own citizens and are injured abroad in an employment originating here, but not to the citizens of other states injured under similar circumstances. It is apparent at once that there is present just the discrimination which the federal Constitution seeks to prevent, unless:

(1) There is valid reason for making in this case a distinction between citizens of this state and those of other states, or

(2) The state was without power to pass such a law effective as to citizens of other states.

As to the first of these alternatives, the only reason advanced to justify the distinction is that it is only in the case of injuries to citizens that they or their families are likely to become public charges. There might be some ground, possibly, for this contention, if the primary object of the law were to prevent injured employés or their families from becoming public charges. But this is not its purpose, except in a very remote degree, and, since it is not, the argument entirely fails.

As to the second alternative, it seems to me clear enough from what has already been said that the state has the power to prescribe what shall be the incidents within its own borders and according to its own laws as to every one within it, citizens or noncitizens, of the relation of employer and employé, whether that relation be engaged in abroad or not. Certainly our attention has been called to no provision of the federal Constitution to the contrary, and in the absence of such provision I can see no reason why the inherent sovereign power of the state to make what laws it chooses respecting the rights and obligations of those within its jurisdiction should be limited in this particular. The necessary conclusion, or rather the statement in a slightly different way of what has already been said, is that since, so far as the objects of the act are concerned, there is no reason for making a difference between citizens and noncitizens, and since it was within the power of the state to make the law apply to the latter as well as to the former, the act purports to make a discrimination which is not permitted by the federal Constitution. This leads to the third question, which is:

Third. What, under these circumstances, is the effect of the provision of the Constitution upon the act? Does it destroy it, so that neither citizens nor noncitizens shall have its benefits, or does it operate to extend the benefits to noncitizens, so that they, as well as citizens, are "entitled" to its privileges, and the unlawful discrimination is thus removed? Upon this point I agree thoroughly with both the discussion and the conclusion of the main opinion, and with the Estate of Johnson, 139 Cal. 532, 73 Pac. 424, 96 Am. St. Rep. 161, to which it refers, and upon which it relies. The constitutional provision is couched in the affirmative, that—

"The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states."

When a state endeavors to place a burden upon noncitizens, but not upon citizens, the necessary effect of the provision is to strike down the burden, to nullify the law which imposes it. But when the state endeavors to confer upon its citizens privileges or benefits not conferred on others, the effect is just the opposite. The citizens of other states become "entitled" to those privileges or benefits, not by the operation of the statute, but by operation of a superior legislative enactment, the federal Constitution, which declares in so many words, that they shall be so entitled. The constitutional provision, in other words, is a declaration that, whatever rights or privileges the citizens of a state may enjoy, the same rights or privileges shall likewise be extended to and enjoyed by the citizens of other states, regardless of the desire of the state that they shall or shall not enjoy them. The result is that employés, both citizens of this state and those of other states, are entitled to the benefits of the act.

Fourth. In the answer just given to the third question lies, it seems to me, the true explanation of such decisions as those of Estabrook v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra. It is there said that an employer may not question the validity of such a law as the present, because he does not come within the class discriminated against, to wit, noncitizen employés. Now, it cannot, in the very nature of things, be true that, when it is attempted to charge a man, an employer for example, with liability under an invalid statute, a statute void because unconstitutional, he cannot question the validity of the statute upon which his liability depends, simply because he is not one of the class discriminated against. If the law is a nullity and void, he of necessity is not liable, and is entitled in all reason so to claim and show. If there are decisions to the contrary, nothing can be said of them, except that they are fundamentally wrong. But the point in such instances as the Estabrook Case is that the statute is not void. It is perfectly valid. It is true it contravenes the federal Constitution in attempting to withhold its benefits from noncitizens. But it is its attempt to withhold, not to confer, that alone contravenes the Constitution, and is therefore invalid and ineffective. The law stands as a valid enactment as to citizens, and the Constitution operates to destroy its attempt to withhold its benefits from noncitizens and to extend those benefits to them. This being the true operation of the Constitution upon the law which attempts to contravene it, it is plain that it is properly said in such a case that one not a member of the class discriminated against may not raise the question of constitutionality. It does not affect his liability in the slightest if the law is unconstitutional in the respect claimed, for the effect of the unconstitutionality is not to destroy the law, but to extend it. As to him, the constitutional question is purely moot.

The recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Travis v. Yale & Towne Co., referred to in the main opinion, is an exceedingly good illustration of this. New York passed an income tax law allowing certain exemptions as to citizens, not allowed to others. Plainly, no citizen of New York could complain of this discrimination, because it was in his favor. The law was valid as to him. It was invalid as to noncitizens only, and as to them only to the extent of the discrimination. This much, and nothing more, was held in that case, and to this the decree was carefully limited, as the main opinion shows.

SHAW, J. I concur on the ground that the statute merely confers upon employés residing in this state the privilege of resorting to the Workmen's Compensation Act of this state to obtain compensation for injuries received while in the course of their employment, in all cases where the contract of employment was made in this state, whether the injury was received within or without this state, and that the provision of the Constitution of the United States, ipso facto, carries this privilege to and confers it upon every citizen of any other state whose contract of employment is made in this state, and thus prevents the statute from being discriminatory in effect. It must be observed that the statute does not purport to withhold this privilege from citizens of other states; it is merely silent with regard to them. If it had contained a clause withholding it from others than residents, such clause would be void. But, as it does not, the result is that the federal Constitution prevents the statute from having the effect of withholding the privilege to citizens of other states. Estate of Johnson, 139 Cal. 532, 73 Pac. 424, 96 Am. St. Rep. 161.

To the objection that the statute in effect withholds the privilege from persons who are neither citizens of any state nor residents of this state, the answer is that no provision of the federal or state Constitution contains any limitation upon the power of the state Legislature to make such discrimination, and that, unless it is so limited, the power is plenary. Const., art. 4, § 1; Mitchell v. Winnek, 117 Cal. 525, 49 Pac. 579; Sheehan v. Scott, 145 Cal. 686, 79 Pac. 350; Mendenhall v. Gray, 167 Cal. 236, 139 Pac. 67.

I am also satisfied that it is within the legislative power of the state, by appropriate laws, to attach to any personal relation created in this state, such as that of employer and employé, or master and servant, liabilities upon one party to such relation to the other, and corresponding rights relating thereto, in addition to the mutual liabilities and rights arising from such relation at common law. The provision of the Workmen's Compensation Law extending its benefits to employés injured outside of this state, where the contract of hire is made in this state, merely attaches to the relation created by such contract rights and liabilities additional to those arising under the common law, and it is therefore valid. This was decided by this court in Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 698, 699, 151 Pac. 398; and Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 415, 156 Pac. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390.

I agree with the conclusion that the petitioner has the right to attack the validity of section 58 of the act. These propositions are in my opinion decisive of the case.

Upon other matters stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice LENNON in his argument upon these questions I prefer to express no opinion.

I concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.

WILBUR, J. (concurring). I adhere to the views expressed in Estabrook v. Industrial Accident Commission, 177 Cal. 767, 177 Pac. 848. I do not, therefore, agree with that portion of the opinion of Mr. Justice LENNON discussing that case and the rule of law which it announces. I concur with what is said by Mr. Justice LENNON in reference to the jurisdiction of the state of California. I concur in that portion of his opinion in which he bases the constitutionality of the statute upon the principle announced in Estate of Johnson, supra. I agree with the majority of the court in holding that, notwithstanding the language of the statute with reference to residents, by virtue of the federal Constitution a nonresident of California, if a citizen of the United States, is entitled to the same remedies as a resident, and for that reason the Industrial Accident Commission had jurisdiction of the complaint of a resident of California, and would also have jurisdiction of a similar complaint by a nonresident, and that there is therefore no such discrimination as is prohibited by the federal Constitution.

JOHNSON v. NELSON et al. (Civ. 3424.)

1. Mortgages ⊂⊃491—Claim against mortgagee on foreclosure could not be made lien against land.

In a mortgage foreclosure proceeding, a claim by defendant, in a cross-complaint, for money promised by the mortgagee, but not advanced, could not have been made the basis of a lien upon the property in favor of the mortgagor, but could at most have only taken on the character of a personal judgment against the plaintiff.

2. Mortgages ⊂⊃491—Agreement by plaintiff in foreclosure no basis for lien on land in favor of defendant.

In a mortgage foreclosure, where defendant filed cross-complaint and obtained a judgment for a certain amount of money against plaintiff, an agreement whereby plaintiff agreed, "in case of a deed or redemption of said property, said P. will pay to said H. and her attorneys one-half the amount of her judgment, without interest," could not be the basis of a lien upon the premises in favor of the defendant, being merely a personal agreement to pay defendant a certain sum of money.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants in an action to quiet title, wherein the trial court undertook to hold that, while the plaintiff had title to the property in question, it was subject to a certain judgment lien, which the defendants held by virtue of a judgment in a prior action between certain of the parties to this suit. The facts of the case, in so far as they can be extracted from the very unsatisfactory record before us, appear to be these:

The defendant and cross-complainant Hedvig Nelson at one time owned the premises in question, upon which she desired to construct an apartment house. She applied to the plaintiff herein for a loan of money for the purpose of such construction, and executed to him two notes and mortgages, one for the sum of $7,200, and the other for the sum of $9,000; the said mortgagee agreeing that he would advance the amount of these two loans as needed in the construction of the building. He failed to make certain payments for labor and material as they fell due, and in consequence mechanics' liens were filed against the building, which were in due course foreclosed, and the property bought in at the foreclosure sale by one C. A. Decoo, who was the trustee of the lienholders. Thereafter the mortgagee brought an action to foreclose upon his two mortgages against Hedvig Nelson, making all of the lienholders parties to said foreclosure suit. In that action Hedvig Nelson filed a cross-complaint against the plaintiff therein, Peter Johnson, seeking to recover from him the amount he had failed to pay over to her, or the materialmen, according to the agreement in said mortgages. That cause went to trial, and upon the trial the plaintiff therein, Peter Johnson, was awarded a judgment of foreclosure of said mortgages for the full amount of his two notes, with interest and costs, amounting to $22,429.93; but the court, in passing upon the cross-complaint of Hedvig Nelson, rendered the following judgment thereon:

"And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendant and cross-complainant, Hedvig Nelson, have judgment against the plaintiff, Peter Johnson, for any sum which he may receive from out of the proceeds of said sale in excess of the costs and expenses of said sale, his costs of suit herein, and the sum of $22,429.93, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the date of entry of judgment herein to the time of said sale, such judgment for said defendant and cross-complainant, Hedvig Nelson, however, not to exceed the total sum of $2,582.65, together with interest on said sum of $2,582.65 at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from and after the date of entry of judgment herein to the time of said sale."

The order of sale was issued upon the general judgment of foreclosure in that action, and at the sheriff's sale conducted in pursuance of said order the said plaintiff, Peter Johnson, bid in the property for the sum of $25,854.70, and the same not having been redeemed from such foreclosure sale, a deed in due course was issued to Peter Johnson as the purchaser at said sale. Upon obtaining said deed Peter Johnson brought the present action to quiet his title to the property, making Hedvig Nelson, and also C. C. McWhinney and R. C. Noleman, to whom she had assigned certain interest in her aforesaid judgment, parties defendant thereto. These defendants to this action filed their cross-complaint therein, wherein it was asserted that by virtue of the aforesaid conditional judgment rendered in favor of Hedvig Nelson in the foreclosure suit she had acquired and measurably assigned to her codefendants a judgment lien upon the premises in question, which she was entitled to have protected by the judgment in this case. The trial court undertook to recognize and establish such lien in its judgment herein, and from such judgment so doing the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

[1] We are unable to comprehend upon what possible theory the trial court in this action could hold that the judgment attempted to be rendered in favor of Hedvig Nelson in the former foreclosure suit could constitute a judgment lien affecting the premises in this action. It does not upon its face purport to create such a lien, and it could not well do so, for the reason that it was apparently founded upon a personal claim which the defendant, Hedvig Nelson, in that action, had against the plaintiff, Peter Johnson, in that action, for money to which she claimed to be entitled, and which he had failed to pay over to her or for her benefit; but, even conceding such claim to be well founded, it could not possibly in that action have been made the basis of a lien upon the property in question, but could at most have only taken on the character of a personal judgment against Peter Johnson, which might be satisfied by an execution issued against any property which he might own. No such method, however, was ever pursued by Hedvig Nelson; and it is plain from the nature of her so-called conditional judgment that no such method ever could have been pursued, for the reason that the condition contained in such judgment was such that the judgment could never ripen into an absolute one. The condition was that Hedvig

Nelson should have judgment against Peter Johnson—

"for any sum which he may receive out of the proceeds of said sale in excess of the costs and expenses of said sale, his costs of suit therein and the sum of $22,429.93, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the date of entry of judgment herein to the time of said sale."

How it would be possible for Peter Johnson to receive out of the proceeds of said foreclosure sale any sum whatever in excess of the full amount of his judgment, with accrued interest and costs to the time of the sale, passes our comprehension, since if any sum was bid at said sale, either by Peter Johnson or any other bidder, in excess of the full amount due upon Peter Johnson's judgment, it would be the sheriff or commissioner conducting such sale who would receive such excess, and who would upon the satisfaction of the Peter Johnson judgment pay the same over in due course of law to Hedvig Nelson, or to which of the other defendants in said action who might be entitled thereto. The only possible way in which Peter Johnson could ever receive any sum whatever in excess of his judgment would be in the event of a redemption of the property by some one or other of the defendants or their assigns in said foreclosure proceeding; but even in that eventuality (which never in fact occurred) Hedvig Nelson would be entitled to no portion of the redemption money, either under the terms of her so-called judgment or under the law relating to redemptions of property from foreclosure sales. For these reasons it is clear that the so-called conditional judgment of Hedvig Nelson could never ripen into an absolute judgment, so as to be the basis of a lien upon the premises in question. When, therefore, Peter Johnson received title thereto through the deed issued to him as a result of said foreclosure sale, he became the owner thereof free and clear of any such lien as the defendants and cross-complainants attempt to assert in this action.

[2] In their cross-complaint herein the defendants and cross-complainants, however, set forth an additional set of facts out of which they claim their asserted lien arose. They contend, and the trial court found, from the evidence adduced before it, that on the day on which the foreclosure sale in said former action was to occur one of the attorneys for Hedvig Nelson caused to be prepared and presented in triplicate for the signature of Peter Johnson an agreement whereby Peter Johnson agreed that at the time of said sale he would bid an amount sufficient to cover his judgment, together with the judgment awarded said Hedvig Nelson, upon the following terms and conditions:

"In case of a deed or redemption of said property said Peter Johnson will pay to said Hedvig Nelson and her attorneys one-half the amount of her judgment without interest."

There was some controversy before the trial court as to the identity and terms of said agreement, one of which triplicate copies only was offered in evidence, and which Peter Johnson claimed differed in certain respects from the original which he had signed. The court resolved this controversy in favor of the cross-complainants, but we are entirely at a loss to see how such an agreement, assuming the same to have been made by Peter Johnson, could be the basis of a lien upon the premises in question, since at most it could be nothing more than a personal agreement of Peter Johnson that in the event of his receiving a deed to the premises, or of the redemption of the same, he would pay to Hedvig Nelson or her assigns a certain sum of money. These cross-complainants might have enforced such an agreement in a personal action against Peter Johnson after the receipt by him of his deed to the property, but they could not enforce it in this suit to quiet title.

The foregoing views indicate the proper disposition of this case, and render unnecessary a consideration of the matters involved in the plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

TILLMAN v. GIBSON. (Civ. 3431.)

Brokers ⊂=44—Commissions cannot be recovered where proposal to broker was revoked before acceptance.

In a real estate broker's action for commissions based on the production of a purchaser in answer to a written offer made by defendant to plaintiff, there could be no recovery where it appeared without contradiction that before defendant's proposal had been accepted defendant had revoked it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by O. S. Tillman against R. H. Gibson to recover commissions on the sale of real estate. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Minor Moore, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Willis I. Morrison, Ward Chapman, and L. M. Chapman, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WELCH, Judge pro tem. Plaintiff is a real estate broker, and the defendant the owner of an orange grove in the San Fernando valley, Los Angeles county. This action for commissions is based upon a letter from defendant to plaintiff, of which the following is a copy:

"November 1, 1918.

"Mr. Tillman, Of San Dimas Realty Co., Huntley Hotel, City—Dear Sir: As indicated in my conversation with you the other day, it was my intention to give to your firm the sole handling of my orange grove located at San Fernando, which I have decided to sell. Unfortunately, every one in the state of California apparently considers himself a real estate agent, and the night previous to my meeting with you I mentioned in the presence of two or three men that I intended putting price and terms on my property such as would be certain to insure a sale; and as a result of my indiscriminate talking I have already had not less than a dozen would-be purchasers, two or three of whom have, as I understand it, actually visited the grove. This situation is rather unpleasant, and I have decided to absolutely withdraw the same from sale, always, however, recognizing the fact that you and your associates of whom you spoke to me, may consider that you have an option on the property for a few days. This must be limited to a very short period, as in addition to would-be buyers I have an offer to rent the grove which will pay me more money per annum than I advised you I would sell it for. For this reason I must limit your option to Monday, November 4th, which I realize is altogether too short to enable you to do business, but at the same time if you indicate a desire to close it does not mean that it must be closed by that date.

"The price, as indicated by me to you, is $1,250.00 per acre, and in figuring up my different purchases I find that I own 67.691 acres, which at $1,250.00 per acre would come to $84,615.00, out of which you are to receive a commission of 5%. I also indicated to you that the payments for this property might be strung out on the basis of $5,000 per annum, with 7% on deferred payments, always provided that the would-be purchasers would either give me additional security or that their notes were of such unquestionable character as to eliminate the necessity of this.

"Yours truly, [Signed] R. H. Gibson."

At the close of the trial the court gave defendant judgment for his costs. From the judgment the plaintiff appeals upon the judgment roll and a transcription of the proceedings of the phonographic reporter.

The record contains no specifications of insufficiency of the evidence to support the decision of the court. However, we have taken the time to read the pleadings, evidence, findings, and judgment, and find that the decision is not only supported by the evidence in the case, but is founded upon evidence with little or no conflict.

The court found that on November 4, 1918, plaintiff produced a prospective purchaser to defendant, who signed and delivered to defendant "what purported to be a written acceptance of defendant's proposal to sell said property on the terms set forth in the letter hereinbefore set forth; but the court finds that, before said written acceptance was signed and delivered to defendant as aforesaid, the said proposal had been revoked, withdrawn, and was not binding upon defendant or in force, nor in effect." There were other findings just as fatal to appellant's cause of action as the one just quoted. The four points made by appellant in his opening brief are all on the theory that there is a valid authorization of his agency to sell the land. His premise being false, it could serve no useful purpose to review his argument.

The judgment is affirmed.

FARWELL v. SAN JACINTO & PLEASANT VALLEY IRR. DIST. (Civ. 3425.)

1. Waters and water courses ⟸230(5)—Irrigation district bonds held negotiable.

Irrigation district bonds and coupons in the form provided by the Wright Act (St. 1887, p. 29), as amended by St. 1891, p. 147, being negotiable instruments, a condition in the bonds and in the law that an assessment be levied and collected by the board of directors sufficient to meet the annual and maturing obligations is not one destroying negotiability, especially where the act makes the instruments negotiable by express language.

2. Limitation of actions ⟸48(6)—Nonexistence of fund for payment does not excuse conversion of irrigation district bonds to judgment.

A holder of irrigation bonds will not be excused as against a plea of the statute of limitations for not converting his claim into judgment merely because there was no fund in the treasury or because the directors of the district had failed to provide a fund out of which the bonds could be paid.

3. Limitation of actions ⟸48(6) — Statute runs from maturity of irrigation bonds and coupons.

The statute of limitations begins to run from the maturity of irrigation district bonds.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Hugh H. Craig, Judge.

Action by Flora Farwell against the San Jacinto & Pleasant Valley Irrigation District to recover on irrigation district bonds. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. E. Gleason, of El Centro, for appellant.
O. I. Kennedy and C. C. Haskell, both of San Bernardino, for respondent.

WELCH, Judge pro tem. The plaintiff is the owner and holder of certain bonds issued by the defendant corporation. She instituted this action September 7, 1917, to recover about $83,000, principal and interest owing to her on said bonds. The defendant and intervening landowners of the district made two principal defenses to the cause of action of plaintiff, namely, that the cause was barred by the limitation of subdivision 1, § 337, Code of Civil Procedure, and that by a judgment of the superior court in and for the county of Riverside given, made, and entered on June 17, 1899, in a quo warranto proceeding, the defendant corporation was adjudged to have no existence, and that it was never duly organized or brought into being, and further that it was usurping the rights and franchises of a public corporation. The court decided the cause herein in favor of the defendant and the interveners. The appeal is from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone. For the facts of the case we must look to the pleadings and findings of the court.

Under what is known as the Wright Act, approved March 7, 1887 (St. 1887, p. 29), and an act amendatory thereof (St. 1891, p. 147), defendant in the early part of the year 1892 organized itself into an irrigation district, comprising land then wholly within the county of San Diego, but now entirely within the county of Riverside; said Riverside county having since been created out of a portion of San Diego county. It thereupon began to and did transact business as a public corporation, and in good faith held itself out to the public as such. It issued bonds to the amount of $350,000 in various denominations, with interest-bearing coupons as provided by said act. The plaintiff purchased certain of such bonds, and at the commencement of the suit was the owner and holder thereof. There was then due and owing her the amounts claimed by her above mentioned. The bonds bore date July 1, 1892. Two months before this date the board of directors of the defendant irrigation district commenced an action in the superior court in and for the county of San Diego to determine the validity of such bonds. (The law provides that the action should be commenced after the issuance of the bonds). In due time a judgment was made and entered on June 22, 1892, adjudicating that the said district was duly organized; that all the proceedings had and taken for the issuance of said bonds were approved and confirmed.

The unpaid coupons herein of said bonds were presented to the defendant for payment on January 2, 1897, July 1, 1897, and July 3, 1898, and January 3, 1899, and demands made on these respective dates for the payment of same. In each case payment was refused, and the treasurer stamped upon the back of each presented coupon these words, "Not paid for want of funds," giving the date of each respective presentation.

Since the year 1899 defendant has not maintained any office within the boundaries of said district, and plaintiff, since said year, has been unable to find any office or officer to which or to whom to present said coupons for payment. At no time since the presentation of said coupons for payment or since the maturity of said bonds have there been any funds in the treasury of said corporation defendant to pay said bonds and coupons, and there is now due and owing and unpaid to plaintiff the principal sum of $51,500 together with interest in the sum of $31,447.50, the amount of unpaid coupons.

The parties on the trial stipulated that the San Jacinto and Pleasant Valley irrigation district carried on business as an irrigation district, issued bonds, levied and collected taxes, distributed more or less water within the district for a period of about three years, during which time the coupons of said bonds were paid as they fell due down to the year 1899. While stipulating that during this period of time when the district functioned the defendant was a de facto corporation, it "was not the intention of such stipulation to concede that the district was a de jure corporation, and that subsequent to July 11, 1899," the district ceased to perform the functions of an irrigation district or corporation. When this action was commenced, the board of supervisors of Riverside county appointed a board of directors of defendant for the purposes of this suit.

For reversing the judgment of the trial court, it is maintained that the statute of limitations is not available to the defendant corporation for the reason that said corporation has failed since the year 1899 to provide a particular fund out of which said bonds and coupons could and should be paid as provided by law, and because of such failure of the defendant corporation to provide such fund it will not be permitted to set up the statute in support of its own dereliction of duty. Greer County v. Clark & Courts, 12 Okl. 197, 70 Pac. 206. Section 33 of the Wright Act provides that such bonds as are here under consideration, together with the interest thereon, shall be paid by revenue to be derived from an annual assessment upon the real estate of the district, which shall be and remain liable to be assessed therefor. By the act the board of directors of such district corporation is directed to levy an assessment sufficient to pay the annual interest on said bonds and the bonds themselves as they may become due. The bonds themselves contain this sentence:

"All of said bonds and the interest thereon are to be paid by revenue derived from an annual assessment upon the real estate of the district, and the assessment upon real property is by said act of the Legislature made a lien upon the property assessed."

All the bonds herein sued upon matured on different dates between July 1, 1903, and July 1, 1912. Every bond and coupon therefore matured more than five years before the commencement of this action. Hence the defense of the four-year limitation is squarely presented on the theory of appellant.

[1] The bonds and coupons herein sought to be collected are in the form provided for in said Wright Act as amended. Stats. 1891, p. 148. Such bonds and coupons, by statute and by decision of the Supreme Court (Ham v. Grapeland Irrigation District, 172 Cal. 611, 158 Pac. 207), are negotiable instruments. It follows that, since the bonds and coupons are negotiable instruments, the provisions in the law and in the bonds themselves that an assessment be levied and collected by the board of directors sufficient to meet the annually maturing obligations of these instruments is not a condition such as to destroy the negotiability of the bonds and their coupons especially since the particular act providing for these bonds makes the instruments negotiable in form by express language. The special provisions control the general statute as to their negotiability.

While it is true that the Wright Act laid upon the board of directors of the district a duty to levy assessments upon the realty of the district and collect the same for the purpose of paying the bond liability of the corporation, nevertheless it cannot be held that the board was limited exclusively to this mode or means of payment. Section 41 of said act authorized the board to call a special election and submit to the qualified electors of the district the question whether or not a special assessment should be levied for the purpose of raising money to be applied to the payment of such bond indebtedness.

The payment of the bonds by a special assessment is quite a different mode or means of payment than that provided for by an annual assessment. Said section 41 does not require this special levy to be paid into the "bond fund" as in the case of the annual assessment.

[2] Such bonds and coupons are general obligations of the district. They are unconditional promises to pay money and money only. They are made payable to bearer and in gold coin of the United States, as provided in the act, and are payable, not when a fund is provided for their payment, but at a time and place certain, fixed in each instrument. Just because there was no fund in the treasury or because the directors of the district had failed to provide a fund out of which these general obligations could be paid furnished no sufficient excuse to the holders of such bonds for not converting their claims into judgments against the corporation. The want of funds with which to pay such judgments is a question of execution, and not of indebtedness alone.

[3] Both our state Supreme Court and the federal courts have decided that the statute of limitations begins to run from the maturity of bonds and coupons such as are involved in this action. Stowell v. Rialto Irrigation District, 246 Fed. 294, 159 C. C. A. 24; Cal. Safe, etc., Co. v. Sierra, etc., Co., 158 Cal. 690, 112 Pac. 274, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 729. And more than four years have run from their maturity before the commencement of this action.

The conclusion we have reached on the question of the bar of the statute makes it unnecessary to consider what effect, if any, the judgment of the superior court in and for the county of Riverside, before mentioned, in the quo warranto proceeding, may have had on the legal existence of the defendant district.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 25, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 21, 1920.)

1. Nuisance ⊂=85—Red Light Abatement Act, providing that court "may" reopen premises gives court discretion as to so doing.

Under Red Light Abatement Act, § 9, providing that the court, if satisfied of the good faith of the applicant, may order the premises reopened, the entry of such order is in the trial court's discretion; the word "may," as used, not being intended to be construed to mean "must."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, May.]

2. Nuisance ⊂=85—Red Light Abatement Act requires proof of good faith of applicant for reopening premises.

Under Red Light Abatement Act, § 9, the burden rests on applicants, seeking an order to reopen the premises, to establish good faith.

3. Mandamus ⊂=28—Issued only on violation of duty, and not in discretionary matter, in absence of abuse.

Before the Supreme Court is authorized to issue a writ of mandamus, it must appear that the lower court has violated a duty imposed by statute; but it will not issue upon a matter in which the trial judge had a discretion as to being satisfied of a party's good faith, where the judge did not act capriciously, arbitrarily, or without reason.

4. Mandamus ⇐154(2)—Petition should not allege conclusion, but basic facts.

In petition for mandamus, it can avail nothing to allege that the lower court's action "was and is without good or sufficient reason, or any good or any reason," etc., since this constitutes a mere conclusion, without value when independent of its basic facts.

5. Mandamus ⇐14(1)—Facts entitling to relief denied must have been presented in court sought to be coerced.

On application for mandamus, before it can be claimed the trial court acted contrary to law or abused its discretion, it must appear that all facts entitling petitioners to the relief denied were presented and proved in the trial court, or that it refused to permit such showing.

6. Nuisance ⇐85—Party seeking cancellation of order of abatement must show good faith.

To justify a demand for cancellation of an order of abatement under the Red Light Abatement Act, it was incumbent on the owner to show that he "had not been guilty of any contempt of the court in the proceedings," and satisfy the court of his good faith.

7. Mandamus ⇐168(4)—Evidence held insufficient for relief sought.

On petition for mandamus for failure to cancel an order issued under the Red Light Abatement Act, evidence held insufficient to satisfy the court that the order should be canceled.

8. Mandamus ⇐40—Error of trial court in considering evidence not reviewable on mandamus.

Even if the trial court was in error in considering, on petition to cancel an order under the Red Light Abatement Act, evidence given on the original trial, such error could not be reviewed on application for mandamus.

9. Mandamus ⇐14(1)—Necessity of showing situation requiring order denied.

The extraordinary writ of mandamus is "to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust or station" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1085), and before it may be ordered it must clearly appear that the situation was such before the inferior tribunal, and that the facts were so presented and proved or admitted that the law demanded a certain course of action from the tribunal, which it declined or failed to pursue.

On Application for Citation for Contempt.

10. Contempt ⇐9—Facts held to require denial of petition.

Where an open letter was sent to a court regarding a pending red light abatement proceeding, and before petition in contempt was filed, the party stated that there was no thought of attempting to influence the court, but merely to petition for decision as soon as possible, although such act may have been ill advised, where the court believes no useful purpose will be subserved by further proceedings, the contempt petition will be denied.

Petition by Ella Ryan, as executrix of the estate of Mary Sweeney, deceased, and another, for mandamus to the Superior Court of Sacramento County and C. O. Busick, as Judge thereof, to require delivery of property and cancellation of order of abatement upon giving bond. Petition dismissed.

Meredith, Landis & Chester and White, Miller, Needham & Harber, all of Sacramento, for petitioners.

Hugh B. Bradford, Dist. Atty., and J. R. Hughes, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Sacramento, for respondents.

PREWETT, Presiding Judge pro tem. The people of the State of California, on the relation of the district attorney of said county, brought an action against said petitioners under the provisions of the "Red Light Abatement" Act (St. 1913, p. 20) to enjoin the maintenance of a nuisance on certain premises known as the "Casino Dance Hall." The court, on the trial, found that the nuisance existed and in due course entered its decree for the abatement thereof. This decree was subsequently affirmed on appeal. Thereafter the petitioners made application to said superior court for an order directing the delivery to the owners of the property affected by the decree and canceling the order of abatement. The petitioners offered to execute the bond required by said act and to pay the costs theretofore incurred.

[1] Section 9 of said act provides that the court, if satisfied of the good faith of the applicant, "may" order the premises reopened. The entry of such an order is in the discretion of the trial court. While it is true that the word "may" is sometimes construed to mean "must," where it is evident that the Legislature so intended it, still, in view of the purposes of the "Red Light Abatement" Act, the character of the evil to be dealt with, and the difficulty in establishing evasion of the decree, it is evident that the Legislature intended to vest discretion in the trial court in granting or refusing an application to reopen.

[2] Moreover, the trial court must be satisfied of the good faith of the applicant. No showing of such good faith was attempted. Indeed, no evidence was offered upon the point. The burden rests upon the petitioners to show their good faith. The court is required to determine the existence of this good faith, the same as it would determine any other question of fact.

The demurrer is sustained and the petition dismissed.

BURNETT, J. (concurring.) I concur in Judge PREWETT'S opinion and in the conclusion reached by him, but as the matter is of considerable importance I desire to express my views a little more fully.

An action was brought in the superior court of Sacramento county under the provisions of the so-called Red Light Abatement Act to enjoin the maintenance of a nuisance on the premises known as the "Casino Dance Hall" and to abate the use of such property for any purpose. The action was tried in said court, Hon. Charles O. Busick presiding, and judgment was rendered in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. The cause was carried through the higher courts and the judgment was affirmed. The remittitur was received and filed by the clerk of the trial court, and a few days thereafter petitioners herein made application to said court: (1) To fix and establish the full value of the property involved; (2) to accept the payment of all the costs as taxed in said action; (3) to accept a bond, conditioned as in section 9 of the Red Light Abatement Act provided, with sureties satisfactory to said judge; (4) thereupon to order the cancellation of the abatement portion of such judgment so as to permit the use of the premises involved for all lawful and legitimate purposes.

Petitioners base their claim upon the provisions found in section 9 of said act (Stats. 1913, p. 22), as follows:

"If the owner of the building or place has not been guilty of any contempt of court in the proceedings, and appears and pays all costs, fees and allowances which are a lien on the building or place and files a bond in the full value of the property, to be ascertained by the court with sureties, to be approved by the court or judge, conditioned that he will immediately abate any such nuisance that may exist at such building or place and prevent the same from being established or kept thereat within a period of one year thereafter, the court, or judge thereof, may, if satisfied of his good faith, order the premises, closed under the order of abatement, to be delivered to said owner, and said order of abatement canceled so far as the same may relate to said property."

The petition herein alleges that neither of said petitioners has been or is now guilty of any contempt of court in said matter. It sets out the amount of costs, etc., which is a lien upon said building, the full value of the property involved herein, avers that no nuisance, as the same is defined in said Red Light Abatement Act, now exists on said premises or property, and proceeds:

"That heretofore, and on the 10th day of May, 1920, the petitioner, Ella Ryan, as executrix of the estate of Mary Sweeney, deceased, appeared in said superior court, and before the said Hon. Charles O. Busick, judge, in said proceeding No. 22797 hereinbefore more particularly referred to, and offered to pay all costs, fees, and allowances which were then or are now a lien on the building and property hereinbefore described, and tendered the said court and judge the sum of $77, which the said court and the said Hon. Charles O. Busick, judge thereof, then and there refused to accept; that thereupon and then and there said petitioner paid the said sum of $77 to the clerk of said court in said proceeding in full payment of all the costs, fees, and allowances in said action; that thereafter, and on the said 10th day of May, 1920, in said proceedings and in said court and before said judge thereof, the said petitioner, Ella Ryan, as executrix of the estate of Mary Sweeney, deceased, requested and demanded of said court and judge" that he ascertain and fix the full value of said property, and promised that thereupon said petitioner would execute a bond in such sum with sureties satisfactory to and to be approved by said judge, "conditioned that she would immediately abate any nuisance, as defined in said Red Light Abatement Act, that might exist at said building or property hereinbefore described, and would prevent any nuisance, as the same is defined in said Red Light Abatement Act, from being established or kept thereat or thereon within a period of one year thereafter; that said petitioner did at said time and place petition said court, in the event of said bond, in the amount to be specified by said court and with the sureties satisfactory to and to be approved by said court, being presented to said court, to order the said order of abatement cancelled, so far as the same related to the said property hereinbefore described and in said action involved; that the said application of said petitioner to said court was and is made in absolute good faith, and with the full and true intention and desire to prevent the establishment or maintenance of any nuisance, as the same is defined in said Red Light Abatement Act, on said premises for the term of one year."

Then follows an allegation that said petitioner at the same time and place offered in open court to furnish a watchman or watchmen to be approved by said court and to be paid by petitioners to see that the conditions of said bond were observed. The petition herein proceeds:

"That no evidence, oral or documentary, was offered or received by the court, other than is herein set forth, and there was no evidence, oral or documentary, offered or received, tending to show any lack of good faith on the part of said petitioner in said proceedings had and done by her as hereinbefore set forth."

It is further alleged that said judge refused and still refuses to ascertain and fix the value of said property, or to accept any bond in said matter, or to order said premises delivered to said petitioner, or to cancel said order of abatement as far as the same relates to said property, but, on the contrary, has ordered the sheriff to sell the personal property and to close said building against its use for any purpose for the term of one year; that said action of the court and of the judge thereof—

"was and is without good or sufficient reason, or any good or any reason, and was and is willful, capricious, and without any authority of law, and in direct violation of the plain provisions of the statute in such cases made and provided."

[3, 4] The principles that control the issuance of the writ of mandate have frequently been considered by this and other reviewing courts, and there is no need herein for a full exposition of them. It is sufficient to say that, before we are authorized to issue the writ, it must appear that the lower court has violated a duty imposed upon it by statute. That duty may consist in obedience to a plain mandatory direction of the law, wherein there is no room for discussion or option, or the statute may be formulated and projected in such terms as to confer upon the officer facultative or discretionary authority. Herein it is manifest that the trial judge is called upon to exercise his conscientious judgment in each particular case. This follows from the use of the term "may" and also the provision that the court "must be satisfied" of the good faith of the owner. Unquestionably this does not mean that the judge may act capriciously, or arbitrarily, or without reason; but it contemplates what the law recognizes as a just discretion, and if the decision of the court upon the case presented may be justified upon any reasonable ground, then the court's action is not subject to successful attack, at least by writ of mandate. However, if there has been what is denominated in the law an "abuse of discretion," that is, if it appears clearly that the court has decided arbitrarily and without reason, the decision may be undone through the office of this writ. But, to reach this result, facts must be presented to the higher tribunal from which the inference necessarily follows that the lower tribunal has so acted capriciously and without reason. It can avail nothing to allege that the action of the lower court "was and is without good or sufficient reason, or any good or any reason," etc., as this constitutes a mere conclusion, and is without value independent of the facts upon which it is based.

[5, 6] The particular vice of the petition herein is in assuming that the precedent facts upon which the right of petitioners to have said property restored to their use for lawful purposes must be alleged and shown in this court rather than in the court below. The truth is, however, that before it can be claimed that the trial court has acted contrary to the law, or has abused its discretion, it must appear that all the facts entitling petitioners to such relief were presented and proved in the court below, or else that said court refused to permit such showing to be made. There is no allegation of such refusal; therefore we look to the petition to see what facts were presented to said court. We have already set them forth, and it is clear that they are utterly insufficient to show that it was the trial court's duty to grant the relief that was asked by petitioners. To justify a demand for the cancellation of the order of abatement, it was incumbent upon the owner to show that he "had not been guilty of any contempt of court in the proceedings." It is true that such allegation is made in this court, but there is no specific averment that he either made such allegation in the court below or offered any evidence to prove it. Again, the court below must be "satisfied of the good faith" of the owner. How can the court be satisfied without a showing? It is difficult to say just what proof should be offered to produce that result, but at least it should have appeared by suitable averment and been established by proof that the owner was then conducting a lawful business in a lawful manner. Nothing of the kind occurred, judging from the allegations of the petition herein. The presumption is, of course, that they have stated their case as strongly as possible, and if such showing had been made we would be apprised of it. Moreover, they have expressly negatived any such condition, by alleging, as we have seen:

"That no evidence, oral or documentary, was offered or received by the court other than is herein set forth."

[7, 8] The fact is that, if we may look to the transcript of the proceedings before the trial court, which was submitted at the oral argument herein, we find that the only evidence on these important questions considered in the court below was the showing made at the trial of the main action. As to that the court said:

"The evidence was very strong showing that the place was openly conducted in violation of the Red Light Abatement Act, and the testimony taken, offered in behalf of the defense, was, openly presented in court, perjured testimony" —and further that the witnesses who thus perjured themselves did so with the knowledge and acquiescence of the proprietors; that these witnesses testified to many things that were conclusively established in the action to be false and it must have been within the knowledge of the owners of said property. Even if it were conceded that it was an error for the trial judge to consider in this proceeding such testimony as was received in the original trial such error could not be reviewed on an application for this writ. The fact remains that the only evidence offered or considered as to the good faith of the owners could hardly be said in the most charitable view to be likely to make a favorable impression upon the mind of a judge disposed to enforce the law.

[9] In a word this extraordinary writ is issued "to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust or station." Section 1085, Code Civ. Proc. Before it may be ordered, it must clearly appear that the situation was such before the "inferior tribunal"—in other words, that the facts were so presented and proved or admitted that the law demanded a certain course of action on the part of such tribunal, which it declined or failed to pursue. Such is not the case here, as has been shown. Said omissions from the petition are vital, and, as all intendments and presumptions are in favor of the regularity and validity of the proceedings in the court below, petitioners have utterly failed to make out a case herein.

I am authorized by Justice HART, who is temporarily absent, to state that he concurs in this conclusion.

On Application for Citation for Contempt.

PER CURIAM. [10] A verified petition had been filed herein by the said Ella Ryan, wherein it is claimed that certain parties, who are officers of a certain corporation known as the Sacramento Church Federation, have by an open letter attempted to influence improperly this court in the determination of the above-entitled cause, and have in an unwarranted manner aspersed the integrity of the justices thereof. Before said petition was filed the justice of this court, to whom said open letter was addressed, received from said federation a written communication in which it disclaimed any intention or desire to treat the court or members thereof contumaciously or disrespectfully, stating that "there was not a thought of attempting to influence the court in any way, merely a petition for a decision as soon as possible"; and, believing that no intentional wrong was contemplated by said federation, although its said action may have been ill advised, the court is of the opinion that no useful purpose would be subserved by any further proceeding in the matter, and the petition is therefore denied.

ALBERTSEN v. ALBERTSEN. (Civ. 3550.)

Appeal and error ⇐640—Appeal from order dismissed where notice to clerk was applicable to appeal from judgment and record was insufficient.

An appeal in a proceeding to annul a marriage from an order allowing alimony and expenses pendente lite will be dismissed, where it appears that appellant, after giving notice of appeal, served on the clerk the notice required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, in the form applicable to a final judgment, and failed to enumerate the particular papers and records to be incorporated in the transcript, so that the certificate of the judge as to the transcript was rendered uncertain in meaning.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Suit by Lauritz Albertsen against Hansine Albertsen for annulment of marriage. From an order allowing alimony, counsel fees, and costs pendente lite, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

F. W. Sawyer, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Leon A. Clark, of Oakland, and M. J. Clark, of Livermore, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This case is presented to us for determination upon the preliminary objection made by the respondent that there is no sufficiently authenticated record of the proceedings before us to enable us to pass upon the merits of the appeal. In our opinion this objection must be sustained. The appeal is from an order allowing alimony, counsel fees, and costs pendente lite in an action brought to annul or declare void a marriage between the parties to the action. The appellant, after giving notice of appeal, served upon the clerk the notice required by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure for the purpose of having a transcript on appeal prepared as required by that section. This, however, not being an appeal from a judgment, but from an order, and being therefore an appeal in a case in which there is no judgment roll, the appellant was required by the express provisions of section 953a to insert in his notice to the clerk an enumeration of the particular papers and records which he desired incorporated in the transcript. This the appellant did not do, but only gave to the clerk the notice in the form required by section 953a in cases where the appeal is from the judgment—cases, consequently, in which there is a judgment roll. The record leaves us somewhat in doubt as to whether the certificate of the judge appended to the end of the bound transcript herein is a certificate merely to the reporter's transcript, which appears to be a part of this volume, or is a certificate to the entire transcript, but in either event it merely amounts in form to the certificate which is required by section 953a to be appended to reporter's transcripts, and does not in form or substance include in its terms the certificate which is required to be made in a case where there is no judgment roll, in which case the judge is required to certify as to the papers used upon the hearing of the motion. This certificate does not purport to be of that character.

In the case of Thompson v. American Fruit Co., 21 Cal. App. 338, 131 Pac. 878, this question was considered, and it was there said:

"If it was appellant's purpose to present his appeal to this court under the original method of appeal he should have prepared and presented to the judge of the lower court for settlement a bill of exceptions, showing the papers, evidence, pleadings, and proceedings used and had upon the making of the order appealed from. That this was not his purpose, however, is apparent from the record before us, which does not purport to be an authenticated bill of exceptions as required by the rule of the Supreme Court. Apparently it was the purpose of appellant to take his appeal under the alternative method; but he failed to prepare and perfect the record in the manner and to the extent required by the Code provisions creating that method. After filing his notice of appeal under the provisions of section 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure, the appellant neglected to do any of the things required by section 953a of the same Code. In order to avail himself of the alternative method of appeal it was incumbent upon appellant, in addition to giving the notice of appeal, to file with the clerk a request for a transcript as provided by the section last mentioned, which would have consisted of copies of the moving papers, the evidence taken upon the hearing of the motion, and the rulings of the court thereon. Upon the completion of such a transcript it would have been the duty of the judge of the lower court to examine the same and certify its correctness to this court. * * * Inasmuch as we have not before us under either method of appeal a duly authenticated record of the proceedings had in the lower court upon the making of the order appealed from we are precluded from considering the matter upon its merits."

In a later case in the same volume (Pouchan v. Godeau, 21 Cal. App. 365, 131 Pac. 879) this court, again passing on the same question, held that the record there presented did not measure up to the requirements of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, and hence that the appeal in that case should be dismissed.

We regard these two cases as conclusive as to the sufficiency of the record before us, and our conclusion therefore and order is that the objection which the respondent makes to the sufficiency of this record be sustained, and the appeal dismissed. It is so ordered.

GENTA v. ILLINGWORTH & DUNNELL.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 28, 1920.)

1. Negligence ⟸136(9)—Question of fact.

Not every case involving negligence wherein the facts are undisputed presents simply a question of law, but only cases wherein the facts which are undisputed are those from which reasonable minds can rationally draw but one conclusion on the issue.

2. Warehousemen ⟸34(9) — Negligence of lessors of safety vaults held question of fact.

Defendants' negligence in failing to keep safely a vault containing rented safety deposit boxes, from which the contents were stolen when defendants' store was burglarized, held a question of fact for the trial court, so that its conclusion in favor of defendants was not reviewable on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; W. W. Kaye, Judge.

Action by John Genta against Illingworth & Dunnell. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. J. Emmons, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Charles L. Chandler, of Los Angeles, and W. A. McGinn, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in the defendants' favor. The facts out of which the case arose are these: The defendants on and for some time prior to May 10, 1916, had been doing a general mercantile business in the town of Randsburg, county of Kern, and some time previous to said date had installed in their store a large concrete vault containing a safe, and within said safe a series of 16 safety deposit boxes. These they had advertised for rent and had rented to a number of persons, who had deposited their private papers and various sums of money therein. On the night of May 10, 1916, the store of said defendants was burglarized, the vault broken into, the locks upon these safety deposit boxes also broken, and the contents of the boxes stolen. The renters of these boxes demanded reimbursement from the defendants, which being refused, they assigned their claims to the plaintiff herein, who was one of the largest losers through the burglary, and he brought this action on behalf of himself and his assignors to recover from the defendants their total loss, amounting to $5,333.

The appellant here contends that upon the facts of the case the defendants had so negligently and carelessly conducted themselves in relation to the said safety deposit boxes that the amounts of money contained therein had been taken and lost by the burglary of their said store. The trial court found against this contention, and from its judgment, based upon such finding, the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

[1, 2] The appellant here contends that upon the facts of the case the defendants were guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and that the trial court was in error in not so determining. It is true that the facts of the case are in the main undisputed; but it does not necessarily follow that the question as to whether or not the defendants were negligent became thereby a question of law which it is the duty of this court to review and resolve upon this appeal. It is not every case involving negligence wherein the facts are undisputed that presents simply a question of law; but it is only those cases wherein the facts which are undisputed are those from which reasonable minds could rationally draw but one conclusion upon the issue in respect of the negligence of the party charged. Walgren v. Market Street Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 656, 62 Pac. 308, 64 Pac. 993; Hampton v. Occidental S. S. Co., 139 Cal. 706, 73 Pac. 579; Loftus v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 166 Cal. 464, 137 Pac. 34; Henderson v. Northam, 176 Cal. 493, 168 Pac. 1044. We are of the opinion that this is not such a case, but that upon the facts of this case, as shown before the trial court, the question of the defendants' negligence was one concerning which reasonable minds might rationally disagree, and hence that the conclusion arrived at by the trial judge, with the parties before it and dealing directly with the testimony educed at the trial, cannot be made the subject of review upon this appeal.

No other error being urged by the appellant, the judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 1, 1920. Rehearing Denied Oct. 1, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 28, 1920.)

1. Courts ⟸202(1)—Statutory notices given by probate court binds parties interested whether they appear or not.

The proceeding for the probate of an estate being in the nature of a proceeding in rem, the giving of a notice as directed by the statute calls the entire world before the court, which thereby gains jurisdiction over the estate and over all persons for the purpose of determining the rights to any portion of the estate, and any person who may assert any right or interest therein is required to present his claim, and the court's determination is conclusive upon him whether he appears or not.

2. Courts ⟸202(1)—Where constructive notice is defective, subsequent proceedings subject to attack.

Where there is any defect in the constructive notice to persons interested in a decedent's estate to appear, given by the issuance of the statutory notices, and parties interested fail to receive such constructive notice, all subsequent action of the court based thereon is subject to attack either in that or in a later equitable proceeding.

3. Courts ⟸202(1)—Probate court acquired jurisdiction over nonresident heirs by constructive notice regardless of fraud of administrator.

Where an administrator caused the necessary statutory notices of administration to be given, the probate court acquired full jurisdiction over nonresident heirs and their interest in the estate, notwithstanding that the administrator falsely pleaded and testified that he and his sister were the sole heirs to the exclusion of such nonresidents.

4. Courts ⟸202(1)—Duty of administrator as to notice of proceedings of probate court stated.

All an administrator is required to do in giving notice to heirs and others interested in the estate is to give the requisite statutory notices.

5. Executors and administrators ⟸315(4)—Fraud in enumerating heirs held not ground for relief against decree for distribution.

That an administrator falsely represents to the court that he and his sister are the sole heirs of decedent, and thereby procures a decree of distribution to be made on that basis, does not entitle omitted heirs to relief in equity; the fraud being intrinsic merely.

6. Trusts ⟸102(2)—Fraud of administrator procuring decree for distribution justified imposition of trust in favor of omitted heirs.

Where an administrator, by falsely representing to the court that he and his sister were the sole heirs of decedent, procured a decree of distribution to be made on that basis, and it appeared that, by sending a remittance to a third person according to a custom of decedent, he prevented other heirs living in the vicinity of such third person from discovering the fact of death and administration, his act constituted such extrinsic fraud as to justify a decree imposing upon the decedent's property in administrator's hands a trust in favor of such omitted heirs.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Suit by Emma Monk and another against George Morgan and another to impose a trust upon certain property distributed to defendants by a decree of distribution of the estate of Henrietta M. Cox, deceased. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank J. Murphy, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Maurice R. Carey, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in an action brought by them against the defendants to impress a trust in plaintiffs' favor upon certain property which had been distributed to the defendants by a decree of distribution in the matter of the estate of Henrietta M. Cox, deceased; the basis of said action being certain alleged fraudulent acts and conduct on the part of said defendants during the course of probate of said estate.

The averments of the plaintiffs' complaint in that regard may be summarized as follows: Henrietta M. Cox died intestate on April 3, 1915, at Long Beach, Cal., where she had resided for a number of years, leaving an estate consisting of real and personal property and having for her sole surviving heirs her first cousins, the plaintiffs and defendants in this action. The defendants at the time of the death of said Henrietta M. Cox were living in California and at or near the place of her decease. The plaintiffs then and for many years prior thereto lived at several places in or near the city of Brooklyn, state of New York. Shortly after the death of Henrietta M. Cox the defendant George Morgan filed a petition for letters of administration upon the estate of said decedent and for his appointment as the administrator of said estate, and in his said petition asserted that his sister and codefendant, Louisa Arnold, and himself were the sole surviving first cousins, next of kin, and heirs at law of said decedent. Having been appointed such administrator, he proceeded with the administration of said estate up to and including the distribution thereof, in his petition for which he again alleged that his said sister and himself were the sole surviving next of kin and heirs at law of Henrietta M. Cox, and as such entitled to distribution to themselves of the whole of said estate. At all times during the progress of the administration of said estate, whenever it was requisite so to do, the said defendant, George Morgan, testified in support of these averments of his several petitions, and during all of said times suppressed and concealed from the probate court wherein such administration of said estate was being had the fact that the plaintiffs herein were also first cousins, next of kin, and heirs at law of said decedent, and as such were entitled to have distributed to them their proportionate share of her estate. The plaintiffs allege that these various acts of fraud and concealment and perjury on the part of said defendant George Morgan were committed in the course of a conspiracy and agreed collusion between himself and his codefendant, having for its purpose the perpetration of a fraud upon said court and upon the plaintiffs herein, as a result of which said plaintiffs were defrauded out of their just share in said estate.

The defendants demurred to the plaintiffs' complaint setting up the foregoing averments as to the defendants' conspiracy, fraud, and concealment in connection with the administration of said estate, and the complaint was several times amended. In their second amended complaint the plaintiffs for the first time inserted averments to the effect that during the course of the administration of said estate the said defendant, George Morgan, had caused to be sent to one Henrietta Morris at Southampton, Long Island, state of New York, a certain remittance in the sum of $60 in the form of a draft, which did not disclose on its face from whom it came, but which appeared to be the last of a course of annual remittances of a like amount which the decedent, Henrietta M. Cox, had been accustomed to send during the month of September of each year to said Henrietta Morris, who was her second cousin; and said plaintiffs alleged that the sending of said remittance by said George Morgan was done in such a manner as to induce said Henrietta Morris to believe that said Henrietta M. Cox was still alive, and was sent with intent to induce such belief, and that the same did induce said Henrietta Morris to believe that Henrietta M. Cox was still alive, and was sent with the intent of keeping and did keep said Henrietta Morris in ignorance of the death of said Henrietta M. Cox, thereby preventing her from communicating or causing to be communicated to the plaintiffs herein, who resided in her vicinity, any knowledge or notice of the death of said Henrietta M. Cox and of the fact that her estate was being administered upon, until such time as a decree of distribution therein had been made and had become final.

To the averments of the plaintiffs' pleading as finally amended the defendants made their specific denial, and the cause proceeded to trial upon the issues thus presented. Much testimony was produced on both sides in relation to the alleged fraudulent acts of the defendants; and upon the conclusion of the trial and the submission of the cause the trial court made its findings of fact in favor of the plaintiffs substantially sustaining the averments of their second amended complaint with respect to the several acts of collusion, conspiracy, fraud, and concealment alleged to have been committed by them during the course of the probate of said estate. In respect to the averments of the plaintiffs' second amended complaint concerning the sending of said remittance to said Henrietta Morris, the court made the following finding of fact:

"That it is true that after the death of Henrietta M. Cox, deceased, and prior to the 1st day of October, 1916, defendant, George Morgan, did voluntarily and without any request, order, or claim of any kind being made therefor, make a remittance in the sum of $60 to Henrietta Morris at Southampton, Long Island, state of New York; that said defendants, George Morgan and Louisa Arnold, at the time said remittance was made as aforesaid, did each know that said Henrietta Morris was a surviving second cousin of said Henrietta M. Cox, deceased, and related as a second cousin to each of the plaintiffs above named and defendants, George Morgan and Louisa Arnold; that said remittance was made by said George Morgan as aforesaid in such a manner and with the intent and design to induce and which did induce said Henrietta Morris to believe that said Henrietta M. Cox was still alive, and to keep and which did keep said Henrietta Morris in ignorance of the death of Henrietta M. Cox, and thereby preventing and which did prevent said Henrietta Morris from communicating or causing to be communicated to plaintiffs above named or either of them notice of the death of said Henrietta M. Cox, deceased, until after said decree of distribution had become final, and such remittance was so made and said defendant George Morgan did conduct himself and affirmatively act for the purpose of keeping each of said plaintiffs in ignorance of the death of said Henrietta M. Cox, deceased, and that her estate was being administered upon and distributed, as well as all proceedings taken or resorted to in connection with the administration of said estate. * * *"

Judgment of the trial court following said findings of fact was in favor of the plaintiffs decreeing that the defendants, George Morgan and Louisa Arnold, took and held the property of the estate of Henrietta M. Cox awarded to them by the decree of distribution therein charged with a trust in favor of the plaintiffs, Emma Monk and Lydia Y. Wallwork, to the extent of a one-fourth interest in favor of each in said estate, and for an accounting thereof and in relation to the properties affected thereby, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof, to said plaintiffs. From such judgment the defendants have prosecuted this appeal.

The contention of the appellants herein is threefold: First, that the second amended complaint of the plaintiffs herein upon which said cause went to trial failed to make out a cause of action based upon extrinsic fraud, and hence that the demurrer to said complaint should have been sustained; second, that the findings of the court show that the defendants' fraud, if any such was proven, was intrinsic, and that such findings were for that reason insufficient to support the judgment; and, third, that the evidence in the case is insufficient to sustain the findings of the court. For these several reasons the appellants contend that the judgment should be reversed, and that a judgment in favor of the defendants should be rendered and entered herein.

[1, 2] Before entering upon the discussion of the questions raised by the foregoing contentions, it may be well to touch upon certain matters discussed by respective counsel in their briefs and arguments before this court, since these have their bearing upon the application of certain cases cited by respective counsel in support of their respective contentions. In entering upon this preliminary discussion it is to be noted that the plaintiffs do not assert in their pleadings nor attempt to show by their proof that any or all of the probate notices required to be given in the course of the probate of the estate were not duly and regularly given in accordance with the law relating to the giving of the same. The proceeding for the probate of an estate is, under our statutes, in the nature of a proceeding in rem; and, this being so, it has been frequently held that by the giving of the notices directed by the statute the entire world is called before the court, and the court acquires jurisdiction thereby over the estate and over all persons for the purpose of determining their rights to any portion of the estate, and that by virtue thereof every person who may assert any right or interest in said estate is required to present his claim to the court for its determination, and that, whether he appear and present his claim or fail to so appear, the action of the court is equally conclusive upon him. William Hill Co. v. Lawler, 116 Cal. 359, 48 Pac. 323; In re Griffith, 84 Cal. 113, 23 Pac. 528, and 24 Pac. 381; Estate of Aldrich, 147 Cal. 343, 81 Pac. 1011; Lynch v. Rooney, 112 Cal. 279, 44 Pac. 565; Estate of Leonis, 138 Cal. 194, 71 Pac. 171; Estate of Allen v. Elliott, 176 Cal. 632, 169 Pac. 364; Cunha v. Hughes, 122 Cal. 111, 54 Pac. 535, 68 Am. St. Rep. 27; In re Maxwell, 74 Cal. 384, 16 Pac. 206; Warren v. Ellis, 39 Cal. App. 542, 179 Pac. 544; Beltran v. Hynes, 180 Pac. 540; Mulcahey v. Dow, 131 Cal. 73, 63 Pac. 158. On the other hand, it has been held that where, by reason of any defect in the procedure attending the issuance or giving of such constructive notice as is required to be given, either in probate or other cases, to give the court jurisdiction, the parties affected did not receive such constructive notice, all subsequent action of the court based thereon is subject to attack either in that or in a later equitable proceeding. Such are the cases of Dunlap v. Steere, 92 Cal. 344, 28 Pac. 563, 16 L. R. A. 361, 27 Am. St. Rep. 143, Parsons v. Weis, 144 Cal. 420, 77 Pac. 1007, and Doyle v. Hampton, 159 Cal. 733, 116 Pac. 39, in each of which cases the procedure for acquiring jurisdiction over the parties affected by such constructive notice as was required to be given was defective.

[3] In the instant case, however, it cannot be contended on the part of the respondents that the probate court did not acquire full jurisdiction over them and over their interest in said estate through the giving in due form of the probate notices required to be given by posting during the several stages in the probate of said estate in which, through the false and fraudulent pleadings on the part of the administrator and the false testimony given by him in support thereof, the probate court was misled and the interests of said plaintiffs were injuriously affected.

[4] It may be further stated in limine that the defendant George Morgan, either in his capacity as a coheir with said plaintiffs in said estate or in his capacity as administrator thereof, owed to the plaintiffs herein no further duty in the way of informing them either of the death of Henrietta M. Cox or of the fact of his appointment to be the administrator of her estate, or of the various steps taken by him as such administrator or by the court in such administration up to and including the entry of the decree of distribution therein, other than that which would have been afforded to them and each of them through the giving of the notices required by law to be given during such administration, and which, having been duly given, constituted constructive notice to said plaintiffs as to the death of the decedent and as to all proceedings taken and had in the course of the administration of her estate. Mulcahey v. Dow, supra; Beltran v. Hynes, supra.

These preliminary matters having been thus disposed of, we are brought face to face with the main questions which have been presented and strongly urged by the appellants in their elaborate and very well presented briefs upon this appeal. The first of these questions is as to whether the defendants' alleged acts and conduct in presenting to the probate court the petition of the defendant Morgan to be appointed administrator of said estate, and the subsequent acts and conduct of said Morgan, concurred in by his codefendant, during the course of administration of said estate, wherein it was repeatedly and falsely asserted and repeatedly and falsely testified to by said Morgan that he and his sister were the sole heirs of Henrietta M. Cox, deceased, by which continuous course of false and fraudulent assertions and concealments the said court had kept from it all knowledge of the existence and rights of the plaintiffs as heirs of said decedent and as persons equally entitled with said defendants to have distributed to them the undivided one-half of said estate, constituted such extrinsic fraud as would have entitled the trial court, sitting as a court of equity in the instant case, to render the decree which it did render in favor of the plaintiffs herein.

[5] This question is not free from difficulty; for, while it must be conceded that the defendants herein owed to the plaintiffs herein no further duty in relation to the probate of said estate than that which was fully performed by the administrator thereof in causing to be given from time to time the probate notices required by law, it must also be conceded—or at least must be held to have been sufficiently supported by the evidence in the case to justify the court's finding—that the plaintiffs at no time during the probate of said estate had any actual knowledge either of the death of Henrietta M. Cox or of the fact of said probate proceedings or of any of the steps being taken therein, and that their first actual knowledge of these facts was of a date after such decree had become final, and that by reason of their total lack of such notice or knowledge they had no opportunity to present themselves in the probate court and to there resist the fraudulent designs of said defendants to secure to themselves the whole of said estate. The respondents contend that upon the showing and finding of this absence of actual knowledge in respect of the foregoing matters, and of the necessary absence, therefore, of any opportunity on their part to appear in court during the various stages of the probate of said estate to resist the defendants' fraudulent claims and to expose to the court their false and fraudulent assertions and concealments therein, there was at no time an actual issue, contest, or trial before said probate court as to the respective rights of the parties to this case in and to the estate of Henrietta M. Cox, deceased; and they therefore urge that the case of Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 25 Pac. 970, 27 Pac. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159, and the other cases in the main above cited, upon which the appellants strongly rely, are not to be given application to the case at bar. While there is much cogency in this contention, we are constrained to hold, in the light of the foregoing cases so relied upon by the appellants herein, that were the respondents to place their reliance solely upon the fact that the defendants herein, in seeking and proceeding with the probate of said estate, indulged in the various acts and assertions and engaged in the giving of the false testimony attributed to them, and thereby so far imposed upon the court as to induce it to make and enter its decree of distribution giving to said defendants the whole of said estate to the exclusion of the plaintiffs herein equally entitled to an undivided one-half thereof, they could not be held to have made a sufficient showing herein to have justified the judgment in their favor, since all of the aforesaid acts and conduct of the defendants must be held, in the light of the foregoing authorities, to have constituted intrinsic fraud from the effect of which the plaintiffs cannot have relief in a court of equity.

The respondents herein, however, do not rely solely upon the foregoing facts in relation to the false and fraudulent pleadings and proofs of the defendants during the progress of the probate proceedings; but they set forth and rely upon the additional facts to which we have above adverted in relation to the sending of the remittance for $60 to Henrietta Morris while the estate was in process of probate, and which it is claimed had the purpose and effect of concealing from Henrietta Morris and from these plaintiffs the fact of the death of Henrietta M. Cox, and hence the fact that any proceedings in probate were pending, thereby beguiling these Eastern relatives and heirs of Henrietta M. Cox into the belief that she was still living, and thus preventing them from appearing in the probate court to contest the defendant's false and fraudulent assertions and to claim their rightful share in her estate. We are satisfied, from a careful examination of the record herein, that the finding of the trial court upon this episode which is above set forth in part finds full support in the evidence in the case, from which it appears that the draft in question was sent to Henrietta Morris at just that time of the year at which remittances in similar amounts had been theretofore regularly and annually transmitted by Henrietta M. Cox while alive. It was sent by the defendant George Morgan while he was administrator of the estate, and its amount was charged by him against the estate in his final account. The draft, however, upon its face did not purport to come from him as such administrator, nor from him at all in fact, nor was there anything about it to indicate that it was not a bank draft procured and sent by Henrietta M. Cox while still living, nor was the remittance accompanied by any letter or other indication showing that she was dead or that it was being sent by the administrator of her estate. The receipt of this draft by Henrietta Morris resulted in the sending of a letter by her addressed to Henrietta M. Cox, which in both its direction and substance showed that Henrietta Morris believed that Henrietta M. Cox was still living and in conformity with her annual custom had transmitted to her said remittance. To this letter, which George Morgan received in his capacity as administrator, he made no reply. These facts, taken in connection with the additional facts that Henrietta Morris lived in such propinquity to the plaintiffs herein and to other of the Eastern relatives of Henrietta M. Cox that, had the sending of this remittance been attended by any letter or other indication showing the fact of her death and of the pending probate of her estate, such facts would have been transmitted to the Eastern relatives of Henrietta M. Cox and to these plaintiffs, who, having thus received actual notice and knowledge of the death of Henrietta M. Cox, would have been in a position to make their timely appearance in the probate court and set forth their claims to an interest in her estate.

[6] The trial court has found, as we have seen, that the acts and conduct of George Morgan in relation to the sending of this remittance were undertaken with the fraudulent design on his part of concealing the fact of the death of Henrietta M. Cox and of the pending proceeding in probate for the administration of her estate from her Eastern heirs, and of thus preventing them from making their timely appearance in the probate court to contest his false and fraudulent representations being made therein, and to claim and prove their right to receive in distribution an undivided one-half of the decedent's estate. There can be no question but that such acts and conduct on the part of the defendant herein, done with the knowledge and concurrence of his codefendant, and having the effect which they are thus found by the court to have had, would constitute extrinsic fraud within the definition of that term found in the case of Pico v. Cohn, supra, and in the long line of later decisions, most of which are above cited and which follow and restate the doctrine declared in that early case. We are therefore of the opinion that the contention of the plaintiffs in relation to the matters last above considered was sufficiently pleaded, amply proven, and correctly found by the trial court, and that the same constitutes such a sufficient showing of extrinsic fraud on the part of the defendants herein as to justify and uphold the judgment entered herein and from which this appeal has been taken.

The judgment will therefore be affirmed.

WELCH, Judge pro tem., concurs.

WASTE, P. J. I concur. The defendant Morgan, as administrator of the estate of Henrietta M. Cox, deceased, occupied a trust relation towards the plaintiffs, who were entitled to share in the estate. Robins v. Hope, 57 Cal. 497. Other than the plaintiffs, he and his sister, the defendant Louisa Arnold, were entitled to distribution to themselves of the whole of the estate. That was what they were seeking. Whatever they could withhold from the plaintiffs was so much gained to them. The action of Morgan, fully described in the majority opinion, was a device intended to prevent the plaintiffs from submitting their claims to the probate court for determination. It was extrinsic fraud which entitled the plaintiffs to the intervention of a court of equity to set aside the decree, or, as is being sought here, to impress the property with a trust in plaintiffs' favor. Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 483, 489, 89 Pac. 317.

MOORE et al. v. FRANKLIN et al.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 30, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⊜731(5)—Sufficiency of evidence will not be considered where not specified particularly.

In an action to construe an escrow agreement, where appellants in their bill of exceptions failed to specify wherein the findings were unsupported by evidence, the question of sufficiency of evidence cannot be raised on appeal, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 648.

2. Appeal and error ⊜732—Rule that insufficiency of evidence must be specified particularly applies to order denying new trial.

The rule that, under Code Civ. Proc. § 648, when the exception is to the verdict or decision upon the ground of insufficiency of evidence to justify it, the objection must specify the particulars in which such evidence is alleged to be insufficient, applies to an order denying a new trial.

3. Appeal and error ⊜724(5)—Failure to specify insufficiency of evidence not cured specifications on new trial.

Where the bill of exceptions fails to specify the particulars of insufficiency of evidence as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 648, a specification in appellant's notice of motion for new trial as to wherein the evidence preponderated in favor of certain allegations of their complaint against which the court found does not remedy the defect; such notice being no part of the bill of exceptions nor incorporated therein nor referred to thereby.

4. Trusts ⊜284—Evidence sustaining finding that beneficiary under trustee's deed owned certain part of realty under escrow agreement.

In a suit to construe an escrow agreement involving an interest in real estate devised to trustees and by them conveyed to the beneficiary to extinguish the trust, wherein the amount of the interest of such beneficiary was in issue, evidence held to support a finding that the beneficiary received under the deed and owned an undivided one-fifth part in the property involved.

5. Evidence ⊜415—Parol evidence held admissible to support written instrument to relieve grantor from charge of fraud.

In a suit to construe an agreement whereby certain conveyances were held in escrow and to determine the shares to be apportioned to each of certain distributees on the distribution of the estate which formed the subject of the escrow, wherein it appeared that a trustee who was also a distributee had conveyed to the beneficiary his interest, and that charges of fraud had been made against such trustee as to representations concerning the ownership of the property involved, parol evidence was admissible to explain the whole transaction; a fiduciary relation existing between the trustee and the other distributees.

WELCH, Judge pro tem. Action concerning an escrow agreement involving an interest in real estate and in the proceeds of sales under said agreement. The facts had better be stated chronologically.

In December, 1893, Agnes B. Oglesby died testate in the city of Santa Barbara. She left a large estate, a part of which was block 70½ of land in the city of Santa Barbara. She had five children, three daughters and two sons. To each of the three daughters she gave an undivided one-fifth interest in and to said block of land, and the other two-fifths she willed to two of her daughters in trust for her two sons, D. F. Oglesby and A. A. Oglesby. The names of the trustees were Belle O. Franklin, a defendant, and Frances W. Oglesby, since deceased. Each of the sons was to have an undivided one-fifth interest in the residue of said estate, which included said block. The terms of the trust are not stated, and the will is not brought up in the record. The block was distributed "in accordance with the ninth paragraph of said will" in September, 1895.

Just before the mother's death she called the two trustees, her daughters, to her and told them that she was going to dispose of her property by deeds instead of by will, and that the trust features in the will regarding her two sons must be released. She instructed her attorney to draw up deeds to that effect. She died, however, before her purpose was consummated. A. A. Oglesby was then city attorney of Santa Barbara. This fact was stated by the mother as a reason for releasing the trust. Soon after the distribution of the mother's estate, under the terms of the will, the trustees and beneficiaries agreed to deed back and forth like they had done in the matter of the estate of their father and thereby straighten out the title and do away with the trust.

On November 6, 1895, two months after the distribution of their mother's estate, the trustee sisters and their brothers agreed orally to end the trust according to their mother's wish. D. F. Oglesby, unskilled in conveyancing, drafted the two deeds with the aid of his brother, A. A. Oglesby. These two deeds are dated November 6, 1895. They are grant, bargain, and sale deeds and each recites a consideration of $2,000. Both of these deeds are signed by the sisters. They contain no recital of the trust. One deed is to Gideon E. Franklin, Jr., and described some of the residue of the property distributed to the grantors to be held by them in trust for A. A. Oglesby under his mother's will, but not all of it. Nor does the deed correctly describe the interest which he was to receive in some of the property. It did, however, describe an undivided one-fifth part in block 70½ of the city of Santa Barbara. This deed was acknowledged November 9th and recorded at the request of A. A. Oglesby December 3d. The other deed is to Edwards Franklin and describes some property that does not appear in the decree of distribution of the mother's estate, but does contain a description of a block which was distributed to the grantors in trust for D. F. Oglesby. Like the other deed above mentioned, the interest in some of the property therein described did not correspond to those of the decree of distribution in said estate. This deed, however, contained a description of an undivided one-fifth interest in said block 70½, but differed slightly from the description of the deed to Gideon from the trustees. This deed to Edwards was not acknowledged until March 23, 1896, and was recorded at the request of D. F. Oglesby April 10, 1896, three months after the transaction herein involved. These are the only deeds of conveyance shown to have been made by Belle O. Franklin and Frances W. Oglesby. It is evident on its face, taken in connection with the decree of distribution creating the trust, that the deed recorded by D. F. Oglesby was intended by the grantors and beneficiaries as an execution of the trust in favor of D. F. Oglesby. The grantors had no interest in some of the property therein conveyed, and neither had A. A. Oglesby. It should be stated that by the agreement of all the parties these deeds were to be made to Franklin, a relative, for the purpose of his conveying to the brothers the respective properties conveyed to him. Gideon E. Franklin, Jr., and Edwards Franklin is one and the same.

On December 3d, the day A. A. Oglesby recorded the deed above mentioned from the sisters to Gideon E. Franklin, Jr., he also recorded another deed from Gideon to himself of the same property. Again on December 9th Gideon, by and in the name of Edwards Franklin, made another deed to A. A. Oglesby, in which deed the same property which the trustees had conveyed to him and which he had deeded to A. A. Oglesby by deed dated six days before was described, with one important change, of course, and some minor changes of the spelling of Spanish names of streets. This last-named deed was made to correct the grantor's former deed of a few days before. This fact was established not only by the testimony of the surviving trustee, but by the internal evidence found in said deeds and decree of distribution. What became of D. F. Oglesby's interest we are not informed, nor are we concerned with it. His interest is thus far traced to the extent of the record to show that the deed he recorded was meant for him and no part of it for his brother A. A. Oglesby.

A. A. Oglesby died about two years after receiving and recording the three deeds above mentioned, one from his sisters to Gideon, one from Gideon to himself, and another from Edwards to himself, all describing the identical property with some differences in description and spelling above noted. A. A. Oglesby's heirs were plaintiffs herein, Mildred, his wife, and Anna B. and Frances, his daughters. His estate was administered and his interest in said block 70½ was inventoried and distributed as an undivided one-fifth interest therein. Before his death A. A. Oglesby dealt with his interest in said block as an undivided one-fifth interest only, as his heirs did from the time of his death down to the time of the commencement of this action.

After their father's death, and long before the bringing of this suit, Frances W. Oglesby, who was one of the trustees above mentioned, died, and her estate was probated. The one-fifth interest which was inherited from her mother, Agnes B. Oglesby, and which interest was distributed to her under her mother's will, was administered upon and one-fourth of this one-fifth interest was distributed to the two daughters of A. A. Oglesby, who are plaintiffs herein. If Frances W. Oglesby had parted with her individual interest in said block 70½, as claimed by appellants, by the deeds above mentioned, instead of the interest she held in trust for A. A. Oglesby, then she would not have had any interest in said block at the time of her death. This is conceded by counsel for appellants in their brief. Yet these plaintiffs took by distribution from their aunt's estate an undivided one-fourth interest in the estate's one-fifth interest in said block, the very property which they now claim the aunt parted with to the father 25 years ago.

Believing that they owned the undivided one-fifth interest administered in their father's estate and the one-twentieth interest received from their Aunt Frances' estate, the two daughters of A. A. Oglesby, plaintiffs herein, in February, 1915, joined with their two living aunts in signing the escrow agreement to sell said block 70½. After this agreement had been placed in the Santa Barbara County National Bank, as an escrow holder, and after it had been partially executed by a sale of several lots of the block, plaintiffs brought this suit for an adjudication that, instead of being the owners of an undivided one-fourth part of said block, they are the owners of an undivided three-fifths of said block, and are therefore entitled to three-fifths of the proceeds of the sale of said block, instead of one-fourth only. And this is the way they arrive at their interest: Belle O. Franklin and Frances W. Oglesby held an undivided one-fifth part in said block 70½ in trust for their father, which trust they assert has never been executed, and which interest went to them on the death of their father. The other two-fifths they claim was received one-fifth from Gideon E. Franklin, Jr., to their father, and the other one-fifth from Edwards Franklin to their father, making three-fifths owned by him at the time of his death instead of the one-fifth administered upon. They fortify this plausible claim by maintaining that the written evidences of their title are "clear in meaning and intent and do not require extraneous testimony to add to or detract from the terms of the deeds, in order to make their parts clear, and any extraneous testimony which may have been introduced upon the trial for that purpose is irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial."

In their complaint plaintiffs allege that they were the owners of an undivided three-fifths interest in and to said block 70½. The court found that they were and are the owners of an undivided one-fourth interest only; the same being the proportional claim of the proceeds of the sale as set forth in the escrow agreement.

[1-3] Appellants chose to appeal on a bill of exceptions. In the bill they failed to specify wherein the findings are unsupported by the evidence. They also moved the court for a new trial, and in their amended notice of motion they made certain specifications wherein they claim that by a preponderance of evidence they had established certain facts opposite to those found by the court. The bill of exceptions purports to set forth the evidence adduced at the trial, but contains no specifications whatever. This being the state of the record the point made by appellants that the evidence is insufficient to support the decision cannot be raised here. "No particular form of exception is required, but when the exception is to the verdict or decision upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify it, the objection must specify the particulars in which such evidence is alleged to be sufficient." Section 648, Code Civ. Proc. And this same rule applies to an order denying a new trial. Hawley v. Harrington, 152 Cal. 188, 92 Pac. 177. Nor have appellants bettered their condition by undertaking to specify in their notice of motion for a new trial wherein the evidence preponderates in favor of certain allegations of their complaint against which the court found; for that notice, while a part of the record on appeal by the certificate of the clerk, is no part of the bill of exceptions, nor is it incorporated in or referred to by such bill. Sprigg v. Barber, 122 Cal. 573, 55 Pac. 419; Carver v. San Joaquin Cigar Co., 16 Cal. App. 761, 118 Pac. 92.

The bill of exceptions does not contain any particular specifications of errors. It does, however, contain exceptions to certain rulings of the trial court. These rulings more or less involved the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. We shall consider these rulings, and in doing so have examined the record, and have concluded the findings of the court are supported by the evidence.

The complaint alleged that soon after the death of the father of said plaintiffs the defendant, Belle O. Franklin, falsely and fraudulently represented to these two plaintiffs that they each owned a one-eighth part or interest only in said block of land. The court found that said defendant made no false or fraudulent representations whatever to said plaintiffs or either or any of them.

Appellants point out in their opening brief no particular exception to any oral testimony introduced or adduced concerning the deeds upon which they rely to establish their claim of title. In their brief they state generally that the language in the deeds is clear, the intent of the parties is fully expressed, and that parol evidence upon the hearing was not admissible to prove that the parties intended something different from what the language of the deeds themselves expressed. Dealing with the objections in the same general way as presented in the opening brief of appellants, suffice it to state generally what occurred on the trial of this branch of the case. The court sustained objections of appellants to questions put to the surviving trustee, Belle O. Franklin, asking her the occasion of making the deeds and what were their consideration. Afterwards witness was allowed to testify over the objection of plaintiffs as to the circumstances of the making of the deeds. Without objection, however, witness was allowed to testify:

That the deeds at first "did not make title," and in making other conveyances she "was simply conveying a one-fifth interest to correct a mistake in the first deed.

"Q. What one-fifth interest were you conveying to your brother A. A. Oglesby? A. An undivided one-fifth in block 70½."

She further testified without objection that the conveyances were made to Franklin so that A. A. Oglesby, her brother, should have the property absolutely divested of the trust. What trust did she refer to was asked her without objection.

"A. It was the trust clause in the will my mother made leaving brother Gus' [A. A. Oglesby] property in trust to sister Fannie [Frances] and myself.

"Q. Now is that the property you were conveying? A. That one-fifth interest, undivided one-fifth."

But if there was any doubt surrounding the transaction between the witness and her cotrustee and the father of said plaintiffs, it was cleared up on cross-examination of the witness. Under a wide range of examination she explained in detail the transaction, the intention of the parties, the object of the deeds, and the interests and estates they conveyed. For example:

"Q. Have you ever signed any deeds as trustee to this property yourself? A. As trustee?

"Q. Yes. A. I made a deed to my brother to release his property from this trust. * * *

"Q. Now, when you deeded this one-fifth Mrs. Franklin, did I understand you to say you were deeding the trust interest? A. Absolutely.

"Q. You were acting as trustee at the time? A. No; I was releasing myself. My mother had asked me to do it. * * *

"Q. You were then attempting to destroy the trust? A. Of course I was Mr. Balaam. I was trying to give my brother his property. That was my only endeavor.

"Q. You were trying to give your brother his property by deeding that property to Gideon Franklin; was that the idea? A. It was only a vehicle. * * *

"Q. Then you had an understanding with Gideon Franklin that you were going to destroy the trust? A. I will tell you, Mr. Balaam, I did not make these deeds. My brother D. F. Oglesby said, 'Now, I will make the deeds, and Gus will help me in his office.' Our friendship was perfect; our confidence was absolute in each other. They made these deeds, and I signed them, and it was signed for that one purpose alone. Brother Gus never bought that property. He didn't pay taxes on it, and the heirs didn't pay. * * *

"Q. When you made this deed to Gideon Franklin, you mean to say you and your sister made it as trustee under the will of your mother? A. We made it to release, so he would have it entirely and it could be at his absolute use and disposal. * * *

"Q. You gave it to him under this deed [deed to Gideon]; you got no consideration for it? A. No I did not; I did not get a thing."

And on direct examination, without objection, this question was asked and this answer given in regard to the other trustees receiving a consideration for the deed:

"Q. Did she receive any consideration? A. She did not."

[4] The foregoing excerpts from the testimony, taken in connection with the decrees of distribution and the deeds in evidence, clearly show, exclusive of the testimony received over the objections of appellants, that A. A. Oglesby, at the time of his death, owned an undivided one-fifth part only of said block 70½. Mrs. Franklin and her sister received, to hold in trust, two-fifths only of said block for their two brothers. The decree distributed this interest to them in their individual names. They parted with but two-fifths interest in said block by said deeds. The deed which went to Edwards Franklin must be eliminated from consideration, for it dealt with property, or at least some property, which belonged individually and exclusively to D. F. Oglesby. The court had a right to disregard it. The record shows that D. F. Oglesby drafted the deed, and as late as April 10, 1896, he still had it in his possession. When Gideon Franklin, under the name of Edwards Franklin, made his second deed on December 9, 1895 (a duplicate of his first deed to A. A. Oglesby), there is no evidence that the deed recorded by D. F. Oglesby at a later date had been delivered or was in effect on December 9, 1895, or has ever been delivered to the grantee, Edwards Franklin, or ever was vitalized. The other deed to Gideon was a deed by the trustees conveying to the grantee for A. A. Oglesby the one-fifth interest in said block, which interest was then held in trust for "Gus." The first deed from Gideon to A. A. Oglesby was found defective, and Gideon thereupon promptly made another deed to A. A. Oglesby of the same identical property described in his first deed. He executed it by and in the name by which he was commonly known.

[5] Nor do we refrain from holding that, under the circumstances of the case, parol testimony was admissible to explain the whole transaction as revealed by the decrees of distribution of the three estates and the four deeds introduced in evidence by plaintiffs. There existed a fiduciary relation between sisters and brothers, not only in blood, but in a business way. Besides, the complaint charged that the defendant Belle O. Franklin, the surviving trustee, had been guilty of fraud in certain representations concerning this very one-fifth and alleged three-fifths interest in said block. Certainly it is not the law under such circumstances that she must sit silently by and not be allowed to orally explain a transaction which on the face of the written evidence of plaintiffs contains uncertainties and inconsistencies, just because, forsooth, she had made and signed a writing 25 years ago.

The trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying appellants a continuance during the trial of the cause. No sufficient diligence was shown. Besides, plaintiffs' title depended largely upon records and writings. Even if the testimony of the absent witnesses would have established that Mrs. Belle O. Franklin had represented that the heirs of A. A. Oglesby had a one-fifth interest only in their father's estate, it would have been the truth.

The judgment is supported by the findings.

Judgment affirmed.

SPRING v. TAWA. (Civ. 3427.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸705(1)—Automobilist colliding with pedestrian held not negligent.

In an action for injuries received when pedestrian ran against and struck the side of defendant's automobile, plaintiff having done the unexpected thing of apparently losing her head and rushing into an open space which defendant was about to occupy, held, that defendant was not guilty of negligence.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸706(7) — Court justified in concluding that pedestrian was guilty of contributory negligence.

In an action for damages for personal injuries received when pedestrian ran against and struck the side of defendant's automobile, held, that the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to submit the question of contributory negligence to the jury, and in directing a verdict for defendant.

3. Appeal and error ⟸973—Ruling as to negligence not disturbed in absence of abuse of discretion.

The ruling of a trial court as to whether a given state of facts presented before it does or does not amount to negligence as a matter of law will not be disturbed on appeal, in the absence of a clear showing of an abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Katharine Spring against I. Tawa. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John M. Hall, of Pasadena, for appellant.
L. B. Stanton and E. J. Fleming, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment based upon a directed verdict in favor of the defendant in an action brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for injuries sustained by her as a result of being struck by an automobile driven by the defendant upon one of the streets of Los Angeles on the evening of December 21, 1918, at about the hour of 8:20 p. m. The answer of the defendant denied any negligence on his part causing said accident, and alleged that the same occurred through the contributory negligence of the plaintiff herself.

The facts of the case are practically undisputed and may be briefly summarized as follows: On the evening in question the plaintiff, accompanied by her daughter, was standing upon or near the intersection of Stephenson avenue and Jane street in said city, at or near the northeast corner of such intersection. She was awaiting the approach of a street car which was proceeding in a westerly direction along Stephenson avenue and on the northerly rails of the double street car track, occupying the center of said avenue. When said street car was approximately 300 feet away the plaintiff left her position and proceeded in a southerly direction out into Stephenson avenue toward the point where the approaching street car had its usual stopping place. When about 2 feet from the sidewalk she glanced up and down Stephenson avenue, and testifies to then having seen no approaching vehicle except said car. She walked out into the street, and in doing so did not further look for approaching vehicles until she reached a spot near the center of the street, when she suddenly observed the automobile, which the defendant was driving, approaching the spot where she was standing and only a few feet away. The southerly side of Stephenson avenue was rough and in such a condition as to make impracticable passage over it with automobiles, and in consequence the automobiles which at that time traveled along said street were accustomed to drive either in the space between the two tracks or along the northerly track. The defendant was apparently driving on the northerly car track, and as he appoached his car was well lighted, but otherwise than by such lights he did not give notice by any warning of his approach. He was traveling at a rate of from 10 to 12 miles an hour. When the plaintiff discovered the defendant's car and its nearness to the spot at which she, with some five or six other people, was standing, she screamed and ran southerly into the space between the two tracks. The defendant also swerved his car southerly and into the space between the two tracks, by which course he would have entirely avoided the plaintiff had she not in her confusion ran against and struck the side of his car, from which impact she suffered the injuries complained of.

Upon the presentation of the foregoing facts and the submission of the cause the defendant moved for a directed verdict in his favor, which motion was granted by the trial court, and a verdict rendered accordingly, on which the judgment was entered, from which this appeal is taken.

[1] The sole contention which the appellant makes upon this appeal is that the trial court was in error in taking the question of the defendant's negligence and of the plaintiff's contributory negligence from the jury. We are unable to agree with this contention. The trial court had the parties and their evidence before it. As to the negligence of the defendant there would seem from the foregoing statement to have been no substantial showing that he was guilty of any sufficient degree of carelessness at the time of or immediately preceding the accident in question to have justified a verdict against him on account of the plaintiff's injuries sustained as above set forth. He had approached the point where the plaintiff and several other persons were standing upon the street awaiting the on-coming street car with every appearance of proper caution; the lights of his car giving ample and sufficient warning of his approach. He was traveling along that portion of the street customarily used by automobiles while the southerly half thereof was in a state of disrepair. When he swerved his car to the southward he was in a position to have safely passed the said assemblage of persons and would have done so without any injury to the plaintiff had she not done the unexpected thing of apparently losing her head and rushing into the open space which he was about to occupy, striking the side of his car and being thus injured.

[2, 3] But, aside from the fact that there was no sufficient evidence of the defendant's negligence before the court, there was affirmative evidence of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, since from the time of her glancing up and down the street, when about two feet from the curb on her way to the center thereof, she neither looked to right or left until she reached her position in the center of said street immediately in front of the defendant's approaching car. In addition to this her act in rushing out between the tracks and to the place where her collision with the defendant's car occurred was an act which the trial court hearing the testimony would be fully justified in concluding to be contributory negligence on her part. At any rate, the trial court so concluded, and we are unable to say from the state of this record that its judgment in so doing constituted such a breach of discretion as would compel a reversal of this case. The rule has been laid down, both in the Supreme Court and in this court, that the ruling of a trial court as to whether a given state of facts presented before it does or does not amount to negligence as a matter of law will not be disturbed on appeal in the absence of a clear showing of an abuse of discretion. Mayne v. San Diego Elec. Ry. Co., 179 Cal. 173, 175 Pac. 690; Diamond v. Weyerhaeuser, 178 Cal. 540, 174 Pac. 38; Charves v. S. F. O. T. Rys., 186 Pac. 154.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

STEPHAN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 13, 1920. On Rehearing, Oct. 13, 1920.)

1. Justices of the peace ⟸45—Without jurisdiction of counterclaim for $500.

A justice's court did not have jurisdiction of defendant's counterclaim for $500; the recovery sought against plaintiff exceeding $300, the jurisdictional amount.

2. Justices of the peace ⟸174(13)—Defendant may amend on appeal to set up new defense.

On appeal from a justice's court to the superior court, the parties may amend their pleadings, and defendant may set up a defense which was not presented at all in the justice's court.

3. Justices of the peace ⟸174(15)—Setting up excessive counterclaim did not forfeit right to set up proper counterclaim on appeal.

Defendant, by setting up in a justice's court a counterclaim for $500, in excess of the $300 jurisdictional limit of the court, did not lose her right on appeal to amend her answer in the superior court, and to set up a counterclaim for $200.

4. Justices of the peace ⟸174(20) — Costs may be imposed on parties seeking to amend on appeal.

In case of amendment in the superior court by defendant to set up a counterclaim for $200, within the jurisdictional limit of a justice's court, the counterclaim as originally filed in the justice's court having been for $500, it is within the discretion of the superior court to exact payment of costs from defendant, to afford plaintiff relief from costs which he might not have incurred, had a proper pleading been presented in the first instance.

5. Fraud ⟸31—Action is common-law action for tort.

An action for damages for fraud or deceit is a common-law action for damages for tort.

6. Justices of the peace ⟸43(2)—Have jurisdiction of all actions at common law for tort under $300.

In view of Const. art. 6, § 5, and Code Civ. Proc. § 76, under section 112, subd. 2, of the Code, justice courts have jurisdiction of all actions formerly at common law for tort, where the demand is for less than $300, except for torts to real property in certain instances.

PER CURIAM. [1] The facts in this case are that the plaintiff brought an action in the justice's court for recovery of money on a contractual obligation, the recovery sought being for $201, so that the cause came within the jurisdiction of the justice's court, which extends only to actions for less than $300. The defendant filed an answer, the essence of which was a counterclaim against the plaintiff for $500. Of this counterclaim the justice's court did not have jurisdiction, since the recovery sought against the plaintiff upon it exceeded $300. Malson v. Vaughn, 23 Cal. 61; Maxfield v. Johnson, 30 Cal. 545. The justice gave judgment for plaintiff, either ignoring or deciding against the defendant's counterclaim. The defendant then appealed to the superior court on questions both of law and fact, so that that court had jurisdiction to try the case de novo. In the superior court the defendant amended her counterclaim, so that it showed damage to the defendant by reason of the plaintiff's alleged wrongful acts in the amount of $200 only, and sought to recover only this amount by having it set off against the plaintiff's claim. In other words, the counterclaim as so amended was one of which the justice's court would originally have had jurisdiction. On the trial in the superior court, the court, over the objection of the plaintiff that it had no jurisdiction of the counterclaim, proceeded to try the issues presented by it, found in favor of the defendant thereon, and set off the amount thereof against the plaintiff's claim, and gave judgment that the plaintiff take nothing. The plaintiff now asks for a writ of review annulling this judgment, on the ground that the superior court had no jurisdiction of the counterclaim.

[2] Upon appeal from the justice's court, the parties may amend their pleadings, and the defendant may set up a defense which was not presented at all in the justice's court. Ketchum v. Superior Court, 65 Cal. 494, 4 Pac. 492; Baker v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 114 Cal. 501, 46 Pac. 604. It follows that in this case, if the defendant had set up no counterclaim in the justice's court, she could, by amendment to her answer, have set up in the superior court for the first time the counterclaim which she did finally set up, one for $200.

[3] The question therefore presented here is: Did the defendant lose the right to amend her answer in the superior court and set up a counterclaim for $200, because of the fact that she had previously set up a counterclaim upon the same facts for $500, or in excess of the jurisdiction of the justice's court? We see no reason for so holding. The jurisdiction of the superior court to try the issues presented by the pleadings of the defendant in such a case must depend upon the state of the pleadings at the time of the trial. At that time the counterclaim presented by the defendant was one within the jurisdiction of the justice's court, and one which the superior court had therefore the right to hear on appeal in a justice's court action. This was enough.

[4] It should perhaps be said that, in case of such an amendment as that made here being asked for, it is within the discretion of the superior court to exact the payment of costs from the party seeking to amend, so as to afford the other party relief from costs which he might not have incurred, had a proper pleading been presented in the first instance. The matter of permitting amendments and the matter of costs are of course almost entirely within the discretion of the trial court. Certainly no question of jurisdiction is presented by the action of the court upon such matters.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J., and OLNEY, SHAW, WILBUR, LENNON, SLOANE, and LAWLOR, JJ., concur.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [5] We would say, however, that in our former consideration of this case we assumed that a justice's court has jurisdiction of actions for damages for fraud or deceit where the amount of the recovery sought is less than $300. In petitioner's brief the view was taken apparently that such an action was one in equity and for that reason not within the jurisdiction of the justice's court. This point we did not deem it necessary to discuss, since such an action is without doubt a common-law action for damages for a tort. The point, however, is now made in effect that even if it be a common-law action for a tort, it does not come within the instances enumerated by the statute as those of which the justice's court may take jurisdiction.

[6] The statute applicable is subdivision 2 of section 112, Code of Civil Procedure, which gives the justices' courts jurisdiction—

"In actions for damages for injury to the person, or for taking, detaining, or injuring personal property, or for injury to real property, where no issue is raised by the verified answer of the defendant involving the title to or possession of the same, if the damages claimed do not amount to three hundred dollars."

Taking this language by itself, there might be some question as to whether an action for damages for fraud or deceit was one "for taking or injuring personal property." But the section must be construed in connection with the other provisions of the Code and of the Constitution governing the matter of the respective jurisdictions of our different courts. Section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution and section 76 of the Code of Civil Procedure provide in effect that the superior courts shall have jurisdiction of common-law actions for damages only when the demand of the plaintiff is equal to $300. The result is that, if a justice's court does not have jurisdiction of an action for damages for fraud or deceit where the amount of the demand is less than $300, no court has jurisdiction of it. The Constitution and the Code undoubtedly intended to provide a consistent and complete scheme for the administration of justice, so that relief might be given in every case where a party was entitled to it. With this in mind, there is but one reasonable construction which it is possible to give to the Code provision as to justices' courts and that is that those courts have jurisdiction of all actions, formerly at common law, for tort, where the demand is for less than $300, except of course for torts to real property in certain instances.

We might add, as worthy of note, that Chitty, in giving the forms of declaration in common-law actions, includes under the head of forms for torts to personal property, forms in actions for deceit. 2 Chitty on Pleading, 679.

CASAROTTI v. LYONS.

1. Witnesses ⊜223—Question whether testimony is privileged preliminary one for the court.

Whether testimony of a physician was inadmissible because acquired in attending the patient is a preliminary one for the court.

2. Wills ⊜52(1)—Party asserting mental incapacity has the burden of proving it.

A party asserting testator's mental incapacity has the burden of proving it.

3. Wills ⊜55(1) — Evidence insufficient to show incapacity.

In a will contest, evidence held insufficient to establish the testator's mental incapacity.

4. Jury ⊜37—Wills ⊜55(1)—In determining whether finding is sustained, evidence of opposite party considered; considering evidence of opposite party not invasion of province of jury.

In determining whether the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict that testator was mentally incapable, the evidence of the proponent, as well as the contestant, should be considered, but the consideration of the proponents' testimony does not invade the jury's province.

5. Wills ⊜53(2)—Testimony as to mental condition before and after admissible only as bearing on condition at time of execution.

Testimony of an attending physician who saw the testator twice on the day of his death, as to his mental condition on those two visits, is admissible only as bearing on the capacity of the testator during the interval between the visits at which time the will was executed.

6. Wills ⊜45—Weakness and impairment in faculties will not invalidate a will.

Where a testator is of sufficiently sound mind to be capable of understanding the situation of his property and disposing thereof intelligently without any delusions, he has sufficient capacity to make a will, though he is feeble and suffering from disease.

7. Wills ⊜52(6)—Inability to speak articulately raises no presumption against capacity.

The testator's inability to speak articulately raises no presumption against his capacity to make a will.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Henry Casarotti, deceased. Will contest by Romeo Casarotti against Cornelius P. Lyons. From a judgment for contestant, proponent appeals. Reversed.

G. P. Hall, of Petaluma, and W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

Frank O. Nebeker, of Oakland, and G. W. Hoyle, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This is an appeal from a verdict and judgment revoking probate of a will. The will was contested on grounds of undue influence and incompetency. On the trial the question of undue influence was by the court taken from the jury for insufficient evidence on motion for a nonsuit. The only question on this appeal is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment on the ground of the testator's mental incompetency to make a will. The only evidence offering support to the claim of contestants on this point was the testimony of the physician in attendance upon the testator during his last illness and covering the period when the will was executed.

One of the grounds of error relied on by appellant is the admission of this testimony over appellant's objection that the physician's testimony was inadmissible under subdivision 4 of section 1881, Code of Civil Procedure, for the reason that it was the disclosure by a physician of information acquired in attending the patient which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient.

[1] The patient, in this instance, was suffering from pneumonia. Though it was primarily for the trial judge to weigh the facts upon which the admissibility of this testimony depends, it is doubtful if it sufficiently appears to support the court's ruling that the observations made by the doctor as to the patient's mental competency were merely incidental, and were not necessary to his treatment of the disease, or were not of a nature to come within the protection of professional confidence. Estate of Black, 132 Cal. 392–396, 64 Pac. 695; In re Redfield, 116 Cal. 644, 48 Pac. 794.

[2-4] If, however, it does not appear that there was error in admitting this evidence we do not think, in any event, it was sufficient to support the verdict. The burden of proving incompetency rested with the contestants. There was no pretense that the testator was delirious, irrational, or insane or under any delusions, but merely that he was in such a state of bodily weakness and mental stupor as to be incapable of an intelligent disposition of his property or determination of the objects of his bounty. It is also urged that his condition of weakness was such as to render him peculiarly susceptible to suggestion. The issue of undue influence having been eliminated, there is no evidence of influence or suggestion of any kind tending to direct his testamentary acts. The evidence is wholly to the effect that he personally and voluntarily suggested the parties to be the beneficiaries of his will, and his desire that all his property should go to them, and even enumerated the various possessions that were to be carried by the general terms of the will. Neither was there anything in the disposition of his estate to strangers by blood, to the exclusion of his several brothers or sisters, to render it obnoxiously unnatural.

The testator, Henry Casarotti, was unmarried, and evidently a comparatively young man. His next of kin were his brothers and sisters, some nine in number. He had for some time been living in the family of Cornelius P. Lyons and the latter's wife, who are the beneficiaries of the will, and proponents of the will, and appellants in this action. His relations with his own people, while not unfriendly, seem to have been not overly cordial because of their objections and criticisms of his relations with the Lyons family, and because of some differences arising in the distribution of their father's estate, through which Henry Casarotti derived most of the property transferred by this will. His relations with Mr. and Mrs. Lyons had been friendly and intimate for a considerable period, and he was living at their home at the time of his last illness and death. He was taken down with an attack of influenza six days prior to his death. This had developed into pneumonia. He died on the 19th of September, 1919, at about 3 in the afternoon. Dr. Gossage, the attending physician, and witness here, visited him about 8 o'clock in the forenoon and again at 12 or 1 o'clock, and did not thereafter see him alive. The will was made between 9 and 10 o'clock in the forenoon. The doctor found him very low at his first visit on the morning of the 19th. He was breathing with difficulty, and in a state of stupor bordering on coma. The doctor testifies that death was imminent. He told his patient that if he had any affairs to settle he had better send for his lawyer and on the patient's acquiescence and the subsequent suggestion of Mrs. Lyons, upon leaving the house the doctor telephoned to G. P. Hall, the attorney who prepared the will, that he was to visit Casarotti's sick bed for that purpose. Obviously, the doctor at the time of this suggestion as to settling his affairs and making a will, contemplated sufficient intelligence and competency on the part of the sick man to give some consideration to winding up his earthly business. The will was executed between the doctor's first and second visits, within an interim of two or three hours. On the second visit he found his patient in a similar state of stupor with evidence of the nearer approach of dissolution. His testimony covering physical and mental symptoms observed at both visits is in substance as follows:

"I saw him alive I think about 12 or 1 o'clock on the day he died, I had seen him that morning prior to that [about 8 o'clock]. His mental condition was such that he was very stupid, comatose condition." "I never saw him very delirious to amount to anything. He was sinking at time of first visit. I probably told him if he had any property to dispose of he had better have a will made. I telephoned after I left to the attorney." "I could not say he was irrational, but he was in a stupid condition." "I had to talk to him, rouse him up to get him to say anything." "I did not mean to say he was irrational at all after he woke up." "He was not taking any opiates or medicines to make him stupid." "When he was aroused he seemed to answer all my questions rationally." "He seemed to understand in a way when I told him to make a will. He did not seem to pay much attention to me. I thought in a way he comprehended what I was saying to him." "He was not insane because he was not in full possession of his faculties." "Q. When he was roused he was all right? A. I would not hardly say he was all right. He was not as bright and intelligent by any means as he was when he was well." "The man was in a bad condition in every way, he was very weak, but his reason had not left him. I think his mental condition was such that any person of ordinary intelligence could understand it as well as a physician." "I visited him again between 12 and 1 o'clock. He was then in a rather worse condition." "There was discoloration in his face." "He was not of sound mind on the occasion of my visits that day." "From being in the condition he was at 8 o'clock I don't think he would be thoroughly in possession of his faculties and be able to determine who was about him by 10 o'clock." "He knew me when I was there." "Q. For aught you could tell us Henry Casarotti may have been perfectly clear in his mind had he been thoroughly aroused after you were there on the morning visit? A. He might have been. I presume he was not, but he might have been." "When I suggested he had better fix his affairs up and send for his attorney I don't remember just what words he used, though he gave me to understand that he wanted to do that. I would say he was very weak mentally and physically." "He had no mental disease. He was just suffering from lack of strength." "I think he was in a condition that morning if out from under his stupor to say what he would like to have done with his property, or to know his sister if she came into the room. I think if he was thoroughly aroused he would know these things." "He would remain awake after he was aroused a short time, just a few minutes, I remember it required speaking to him rather loudly, possibly more than once, to arouse him." "I think I was in the room about 10 minutes on that occasion."

This summary fairly states the substance of Dr. Gossage's testimony on this point. Together with the other circumstances herein narrated it constitutes the entire evidence in support of the allegation of incompetency.

Even in the absence of direct evidence of the conditions attending the execution of the will, it may be doubted if it would support the finding of the jury as to incompetency. The jury would hardly be justified in inferring from this testimony as to the condition of the testator an hour or two before and an hour or two after the will was executed that he would not have been sufficiently aroused by the presence and efforts of his lawyer to intelligently dispose of his property at the intermediate time.

But the issue does not rest upon the contestant's evidence alone. The testimony of proponent's witnesses must be taken into account in weighing the sufficiency of contestant's case. Evidence which standing by itself might be sufficient to sustain a verdict may, in the light of all the facts, be wholly inadequate, and that without invading the province of the jury as the judges of the weight and sufficiency of the evidence. In re Redfield, 116 Cal. 637, 48 Pac. 794, is a case in which the showing of incompetency was stronger than here, where this court held that in the light of all the facts it was entirely inadequate. In the matter before us there is no conflict in the evidence. The conditions stated by the attending physician at the periods to which he testifies are not disputed, but two apparently disinterested witnesses, the lawyer and the nurse, testify that at the time of the actual execution of the will, an hour or more after the doctor's first visit and an hour or more before his second visit, the patient was aroused and awake, his eyes open and showing intelligence; that he recognized his visitors, and, though suffering, weak and short of breath, talked coherently and with comprehension. The nurse testified that when Mr. Hall, the lawyer, called she had just been administering nourishment to the patient. There was no sign of his being irrational. "He seemed to understand everything said to him. His answers were intelligible. I was called in the room after Mr. Hall was there. Mr. Hall read the paper, the will, and asked Mr. Casarotti if that was his will and wishes, and Mr. Casarotti said 'Yes.'" There was no one beside Mr. Hall in the room while Mr. Hall was drawing the will. "Mr. Casarotti first turned on his right side and Mr. Hall asked him if he was left handed and he said, 'No!'" They then turned him on his left side and he signed the will. "He did not ask any one how to spell his name." "When Mr. Hall left he told Mr. Casarotti he hoped he would soon get well, and Mr. Casarotti said, 'I hope so.'" "We aroused him for his treatment from time to time; he was perfectly normal then; that is, he was clear."

Mr. Hall, who drew the will, testified:

"When I went into the room I says to him, 'Hello, Henry. What's the matter?' 'Well,' he says, 'I am pretty sick but I don't think I am going to die.' I said, 'Did you want to see me?' and he said, 'Yes, I want to make my will.'"

The witness then asked him what property he had, and in response the testator enumerated various items of property, which, so far as appears from the record, correctly and fully included all his estate. In answer to the query as to whom he wished to leave his property, he answered that he wanted to leave it to his "friends Mr. and Mrs. Lyons." Asked as to their names, he said his name is "Con" Lyons, but he did not know what the "Con" stood for. The attorney then got the first names from Mr. Lyons, who was ill in another room. This witness further testified:

"He was awake when I went into the room. He recognized me. He answered my questions intelligently. I saw nothing to indicate that he was irrational. My opinion is that he was perfectly sound in mind. I don't imagine I was there over 20 or 25 minutes. He was not in a state of stupor at any time I was there. There was no continued conversation, but his eyes were open and he showed intelligence and talked intelligently. He was breathing heavily, but no difficulty in his speech. No one held his hand while he signed the will."

Here we have the testimony of a lawyer whose professional duty it was to ascertain the condition of his client's mind, as much as it was the duty of the doctor to note his physical condition.

We think this state of the evidence shows competency to execute a will beyond any substantial question arising either from direct evidence of mental irresponsibility, or from any inference that might be found from the facts testified to as existing on the prior or subsequent visits of the doctor.

[5] The physician's testimony as to the testator's mental condition before and after the execution of the will was admissible only as it tended to show that condition at the very time the will was made. Estate of Wilson, 117 Cal. 262, 49 Pac. 172, 711; Estate of Dole, 147 Cal. 188, 81 Pac. 534. But the doctor admitted that any conclusions he reached as to mental incompetency were based on the patient's weakness and stupor at the time of observation, and he admitted that he might have been aroused, and that if aroused his understanding would be unclouded. The witnesses for the proponent of the will testify that he was so aroused at the time the will was executed, and that his mind and understanding were clear.

[6] It must be borne in mind that it is not every weakness and impairment of the faculties of the testator that will invalidate a will. Even where a testator is feeble in health, suffering under disease and aged and infirm, yet if he was of sufficiently sound mind to be capable of understanding the nature and situation of his property, and of disposing thereof intelligently, without any delusions affecting his action, he had sufficient capacity to make a will. Estate of Motz, 136 Cal. 558, 69 Pac. 294; Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 Pac. 932; Estate of Huston, 163 Cal. 166, 124 Pac. 852; Estate of Weber, 15 Cal. App. 224, 114 Pac. 597.

[7] It was held that the fact of the testator being unable to speak articulately, and was compelled to communicate by signs, did not raise a legal presumption of incompetency to make a will. Estate of Latour, 140 Cal. 415, 73 Pac. 1070, 74 Pac. 441.

We are satisfied that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. CARNES. (Cr. 915.)*

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 8, 1920.)

1. Larceny ⟸68(1)—Sufficiency of evidence to sustain conviction held a jury question.

In a prosecution for larceny of an automobile found in defendant's possession, sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a conviction held a question for the jury.

2. Larceny ⟸64(6)—Failure to explain possession of stolen property tends to show guilt.

If the jury in a larceny prosecution believed that the property was stolen and found in defendant's possession shortly thereafter, the fact that defendant failed to account for its possession tended to show defendant's guilt.

3. Larceny ⟸41, 51(2)—Burden rests upon accused to explain possession of stolen property, and such fact may be considered.

In a prosecution for larceny of an automobile found in accused's possession, the burden rested upon the accused to explain his possession, and that was a fact to be considered with other suspicious facts.

4. Criminal law ⟸572—Jurors could disbelieve testimony tending to prove alibi.

Jurors could disbelieve uncontradicted testimony tending to prove an alibi, or could believe, either that defendant's witnesses were mistaken as to the day and hour they saw accused, or that the witnesses for the prosecution were mistaken in the exact time at which the crime occurred.

5. Criminal law ⟸1044, 1054(1), 1129(1)—No complaint of evidence in absence of exception, motion to exclude, and assignment of error.

Where during cross-examination of witness for defendants the prosecuting attorney asked, "Did you know that he was living at the H. with a woman not his wife?" to which the witness answered, "I did not," and an objection by defendant was properly sustained, and no motion was made to strike out the answer, no exception noted and no assignment of misconduct was made, nor a request that the jury be instructed to disregard the incident, it was too late on appeal to complain that the question might have had an improper influence upon the jury.

6. Criminal law ⟸649(2)—Directing defendant to proceed pending arrival of witness not misconduct.

The action of the trial court in directing defendant to proceed with his case pending the arrival of a certain witness did not amount to misconduct, especially where the witness appeared in due time and testified.

7. Criminal law ⟸1172(6)—Immaterial explanation by court held not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for grand larceny, where the prosecution relied only upon the theory that an automobile had been stolen, defendant was not prejudiced by an instruction of the court, drawing the distinction between grand larceny and obtaining property under false pretenses.

8. Criminal law ⟸789(4)—Instruction as to reasonable doubt held sufficient.

An instruction that: "The accused * * * is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proven, and in case of a reasonable doubt whether his guilt is satisfactorily shown, he (defendant) is entitled to an acquittal. * * * If you are satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant here is guilty of the crime charged against him in the information, * * * you will so declare by your verdict, and, on the other hand, if you are not so satisfied, you should return a verdict finding him not guilty"—was the full equivalent of making it incumbent on the prosecution to establish the guilt of defendant beyond a reasonable doubt.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Ernest P. Carnes was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment and from denial of motion for new trial. Affirmed.

William Sea, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the State.

WASTE, P. J. The defendant was charged by information with the crime of grand larceny, it being alleged that on or about the 25th day of October, 1919, he took and drove away a Buick automobile belonging to Charles E. Johnson. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

*Hearing denied by Supreme Court, Nov. 4, 1920.

The first contention made by the defendant is that the evidence is insufficient to warrant the conviction. Johnson, the complaining witness, left his automobile on a street in San Francisco and when he returned about 15 minutes later it was gone. It was next located by the police in a private garage in San Bruno, San Mateo county, where it had been stored by the defendant. He had removed the air pump and certain other parts, painted over the number of the motor, and removed the license plates. The parts that had been removed were found concealed under the sidewalk. It was proved also that the defendant attempted to procure old automobile license plates, failing in which, he tried to borrow plates from a dealer. When arrested, he gave contradictory statements as to how he came into possession of the automobile; first claiming that his wife purchased it, thereafter maintaining that he bought it on the installment plan from a man by the name of Miller. He was unable to give the whereabouts of Miller, and the latter was not produced at the trial, although a notary public testified that one Albert E. Miller, whom he personally knew, signed a bill of sale to the defendant and wife, for a Buick automobile in his presence.

[1-3] The question as to the sufficiency of the evidence was one resting entirely with the jury for its determination. If the jury believed that the property was stolen, and, as was proved, it was found in the possession of the defendant shortly thereafter, and the defendant failed to account for its possession or to show that such possession was honestly obtained, to the satisfaction of the jury, that was a circumstance tending to show the defendant's guilt. The burden rested upon the accused to explain his possession of the automobile, and that was a fact to be considered with other suspicious facts in the case. People v. Kelly, 28 Cal. 424, 426; People v. Gill, 45 Cal. 285, 286; People v. Warren, 130 Cal. 683, 685, 63 Pac. 86.

[4] The defendant attempted to establish an alibi as a part of his defense. He contends that the evidence on this point was uncontradicted and not impeached. The jurors may have disbelieved the testimony tending to prove the alibi, or may have believed, either that the defendant's witnesses were mistaken as to the day and hour they attended the theater, or that the witnesses for the prosecution were mistaken in the exact time at which the automobile was stolen. People v. Gill, supra; People v. Sears, 119 Cal. 267, 270, 51 Pac. 325; People v. Shehadey, 12 Cal. App. 648, 657, 108 Pac. 146.

[5] During his cross-examination of a witness for the defense, the prosecuting attorney, after ascertaining how long the witness had known the defendant, asked, "Did you know that he was living at the Hamlin with a woman not his wife?" The witness answered, "I did not." An objection by the defendant was promptly sustained. The subject was not thereafter alluded to. No motion was made to strike out the answer, no exception was noted, and no assignment of misconduct was made by the defendant, nor did he request that the jury be instructed to disregard the incident. It is now too late to complain that the question might have had an improper influence upon the jury. People v. Shears, 133 Cal. 154, 159, 65 Pac. 295; People v. Amer, 8 Cal. App. 137, 143, 96 Pac. 401; In re Estate of Hess, 192 Pac. 35.

[6] The action of the trial court in directing the defendant to proceed with his case, pending the arrival of the witness Sime, did not amount to misconduct. Furthermore, the witness appeared in due time, and testified.

[7, 8] In its charge, the court instructed the jury as follows:

"Larceny, ladies and gentlemen, is the felonious stealing, taking, or carrying away the personal property of another. And where by means of fraud, conspiracy, or artifice, possession of the property is obtained with felonious intent, and the title still remains in the owner, larceny is established; while the crime is false pretenses, if the title, as well as the possession, is absolutely parted with, and where the property feloniously taken is of a value exceeding $50, the offense is grand larceny."

Objection is made by the defendant to the portion italicized. It was unnecessary to draw the distinction in the instant case, between grand larceny and obtaining property under false pretenses. As the prosecution did not contend that the automobile had been obtained by means of fraud, conspiracy, or artifice, but relied upon the theory that it had been stolen, and that its value exceeded $50, there was no occasion for including in the instruction the part objected to. But we are unable to perceive in what manner the defendant was prejudicially injured by the giving of the immaterial explanation by the court of certain other circumstances under which the crime of larceny might be established. It was not error for the court to instruct the jury that—

"The accused, under our system, is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proven, and in case of a reasonable doubt whether his guilt is satisfactorily shown, he [defendant] is entitled to an acquittal. * * * If you are satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant here is guilty of the crime charged against him in the information, that is, grand larceny, you will so declare by your verdict; and, on the other hand, if you are not so satisfied you should return a verdict finding him not guilty."

The instruction was the full equivalent of making it incumbent on the prosecution to establish the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Wells, 145 Cal. 138, 142, 78 Pac. 470; People v. Miller, 171 Cal. 649, 652, 154 Pac. 468. The term "reasonable doubt" was correctly defined in the charge, and the jury was properly instructed on the doctrine of the presumption of innocence.

The redirect examination of the defendant as to the manner in which he was dressed on the day when it was alleged the bill of sale was executed by Miller was on an immaterial subject.

The order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, and the judgment are, and each is, affirmed.

PEOPLE v. POO ON. (Cr. 523.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 7, 1920.)

1. Physicians and surgeons ⟸6(9)—Information charging practice of medicine without license held sufficient.

Information charging defendant with violation of State Medical Practice Act, § 17, by willfully and unlawfully attempting to practice and advertising and holding himself out as practicing a system or mode of treating the sick and afflicted without having a valid unrevoked certificate from the state board of medical examiners, held not to have set forth different offenses not separately stated, and not to have failed substantially to conform to Pen. Code, § 951, in that it did not set forth the act or omission charged as an offense.

2. Physicians and surgeons ⟸6(11)—Verdict convicting of practice of medicine without license as charged in proper form.

In a prosecution for practicing medicine without a license, verdict finding defendant guilty as charged in the information held in proper form, despite defendant's claim that the information stated and set forth different charges, so that the verdict should have set forth which one of such charges defendant was guilty of.

3. Criminal law ⟸371(1, 12)—Evidence of other similar acts by defendant admissible as bearing on questions of intent and motive.

In a prosecution for practicing medicine without license, the trial court did not err in receiving evidence of other acts by defendant of similar nature to that charged in the information; such evidence bearing on the questions of intent and motive.

4. Criminal law ⟸543(2), 1153(6)—Showing of absence of witness sufficient to sustain decision admitting deposition.

Where the deputy sheriff testified he was unable to locate a witness in the state, and there was testimony tending to show she was in Mexico, such showing sustained the decision of the trial court that she was absent at the time of trial and could not be produced as a witness to render her deposition taken at the preliminary examination admissible; defendant's objection questioning the sufficiency of showing of absence being addressed to the discretion of the trial court, whose decision will not be disturbed except for abuse of discretion.

5. Criminal law ⟸1186(4)—Instruction partially unsupported by testimony not ground for reversal.

In a prosecution for practicing medicine without a license, though there was no reference in the testimony of a witness to any examination of her pulse, the words "examination of the pulse," in an instruction on what would constitute guilt, held not to have caused a miscarriage of justice, so that, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, conviction cannot be reversed.

6. Criminal law ⟸829(1)—Instructions need not be repeated on request.

The trial court did not err in refusing to give instructions proposed by defendant which were fully covered by the instructions given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Poo On was convicted of practicing medicine without a license, and, from the judgment and order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

L. J. Maddux, of Modesto, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. The defendant was tried and convicted in the superior court of Stanislaus county of the crime of practicing medicine without a license, and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. The information charged the defendant with a violation of section 17 of the State Medical Practice Act (St. 1913, p. 734), the said information alleging that—

"The said Poo On on or about the 19th day of September, A. D. 1919, at and in the said county of Stanislaus, state of California, and prior to the filing of this information, did then and there willfully and unlawfully practice, attempt to practice and advertise and hold himself out as practicing a system or mode of treating the sick and afflicted in this state without having at the time of so doing a valid unrevoked certificate from the state board of medical examiners of the state of California."

The appellant attacks the information on the ground that it sets forth many different offenses which have not been separately stated, and also on the ground that the said information does not substantially conform to the requirements of section 951 of the Penal Code, "in this that, it does not set forth the act or omission charged as an offense."

[1] There is no merit in these objections. The charging part of the information is almost in the identical language of the information that was before this court in People v. T. Wah, Hing, 190 Pac. 662, and which information was sustained; the court holding that—

"The information in this case is substantially the same as the information that was before the Supreme Court in People v. Ratledge, 172 Cal. 401, 156 Pac. 455, and which the court held sufficiently charged a violation of section 17 of the said Medical Practice Act. The court said: 'The information is attacked upon the ground that it charges "the crime of practicing medicine without a certificate from the medical board," the contention being that no such crime is denounced by the law. It is true that the statute does not contain the quoted words, but clearly they are used merely for purposes of general description of the offense as they are followed by the averment that the crime was "committed as follows: That the said T. F. Ratledge on the 30th day of October, 1914, at, and in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, did willfully and unlawfully practice, attempt to practice, and advertise and hold himself out as practicing a system and mode of treating the sick and afflicted in the state of California, without then and there having a valid, unrevoked certificate authorizing him to practice a system or mode of treating the sick and afflicted in this state from the board of medical examiners of the state of California." This sufficiently charges a violation of section 17 of the Medical Practice Act (Stats. 1913, p. 734), and is not open to the criticism that it seeks to impute many offenses to defendant because any one of the acts or omissions averred and conjunctively pleaded would suffice as the basis of an information. (Citing cases.) This information does not fall within the rule declared in People v. Plath, 166 Cal. 227 (135 Pac. 954).'"

[2] 2. The defendant challenges the verdict, which is in the following form, "We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find the defendant Poo On guilty as charged in the information," claiming that the information states and sets forth different charges and that the verdict should have set forth which one of said charges the defendant was guilty of.

The verdict, in our opinion, is in the proper form, and this objection of defendant is sufficiently answered by the case of People v. Nitta, 17 Cal. App. 152, 118 Pac. 946. In that case it was charged in the information that the defendant did willfully connive at, consent to, and permit the placing and leaving of his wife in a house of prostitution, and that he did then and there willfully permit and allow her to remain there.

On appeal it was contended that the verdict was not supported by the evidence, because the evidence shows that the defendant placed his wife in the house of prostitution, and the argument was that this state of facts did not support a charge of conniving at, consenting to, or permitting the placing of his wife in such house. The court, in answer to this argument, said:

"Whether or not the evidence may be said to support a charge of conniving at the placing of the wife in a house of prostitution or not, it certainly supports the charge that he permitted her to remain in such house, which is all that is required to support a conviction under the information. People v. Shotwell, 27 Cal. 403; People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507; People v. Sheldon, 68 Cal. 434."

[3] 3. The court committed no error in receiving evidence of other acts of defendant of a similar nature to that charged in the information. This evidence was proper as bearing upon the question of the intent and motive of the defendant, and as tending to show such intent and motive evidence was admissible of similar acts prior and subsequent to the time charged in the information. The case of People v. Ratledge, 172 Cal. 401, 156 Pac. 455, was a prosecution for the crime of practicing medicine without a certificate from the medical board. Evidence was received over defendant's objection of similar offenses. The Supreme Court, in sustaining the trial court's ruling, said:

"A witness was permitted over defendant's objection to detail the occurrences upon the occasion of a visit by her to his office nearly six months before the time set forth in the information. The objection was upon the usual grounds of incompetency, etc., and that the time was too remote. The evidence was competent as tending to show the intent and motive of the defendant in the commission of the acts charged in the information, and it was not too remote. Courts are allowed a wide discretion with respect to the periods of time covered by such testimony."

[4] 4. The deposition of Constance Parrish, taken at the preliminary examination of the defendant, was offered and received in evidence over the objection of the defendant. The appellant claims that the showing was not sufficient to justify the admission of said testimony. The deputy sheriff testified that he was unable to locate the witness in this state and he gave testimony tending to show that she was in Tia Juana, Mexico. The showing in our opinion was sufficient to sustain the decision of the court that she was absent from the state at the time of the trial and could not be produced as a witness. People v. Grill, 151 Cal. 592, 91 Pac. 515.

The question whether it has been satisfactorily shown that a witness whose deposition was taken at the preliminary examination of the defendant "cannot with due diligence be found within the state is a question of fact that is addressed to the trial court, to be determined by it from evidence introduced before it (People v. Plyler, 126 Cal. 379), and with the determination of that question of fact by the trial court this court will not interfere, unless the evidence thereon is such as to satisfy the court that the trial court abused the discretion confided to it in holding that due diligence had been used, and that the witness could not be found." People v. Lewandowski, 143 Cal. 574, 576, 77 Pac. 467.

[5] 5. Complaint is made that the court erred in giving the following instruction to the jury:

"You are instructed that it is as much a violation of the Medical Practice Act to diagnose and prescribe herbs or medicine for any disease of a human being as it is to operate or otherwise treat a human being. You are instructed that it is no defense to an action for a violation of section 17 of the Medical Practice Act to say that he, the defendant, merely sold drugs or medicinal preparations in a commercial capacity, or like a storekeeper, if, at the time of so doing, he inquired of the patient or customer, the manifestations of his disease or ills, or made an examination of the pulse or any portion of the person of said patient or customer, and in connection therewith, selected and gave herbs, drugs, or other preparations intended by him to cure said patient or customer of the said disease or ills from which the defendant determined, by his inquiries or examination, the patient or customer to be suffering with."

Appellant contends that this instruction is erroneous because there is no claim made by the prosecution that the defendant examined the pulse of any one at the time charged in the information, and that the witness Constance Parrish did not in her testimony state that defendant had examined her pulse.

Although there is no reference in the testimony of this witness to any examination of her pulse, nevertheless, in view of the whole instruction, we are clearly of the opinion that the words, "examination of the pulse," contained in said instruction, did not in any manner cause a miscarriage of justice in this case, and to reverse the judgment for the giving of this instruction would be to disregard section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, which provides that—

"No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, in any case, on the ground of misdirection of the jury * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

[6] Error is also claimed in the court's refusal to give certain instructions proposed by the defendant, as to the principle of reasonable doubt, etc., but these instructions were fully covered by the instructions given by the court to the jury.

Finding no material error in the case, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Ex parte REINEGER. (Cr. 2263.)

1. Criminal law ⟸13—Proviso of statute relating to sale of imitation milk held not to define criminal offense.

The provisos of Imitation Milk Act, Stats., relating to regulations as to the manner of sale, coloring, etc., and the manufacture and sale for cooking purposes, held not to define a criminal offense, but merely to state exceptions to a previously stated prohibition against the sale of products of imitation milk.

2. Food ⟸8—Act prohibiting sale of articles made from imitation milk held not to prohibit sale of imitation milk itself.

Imitation Milk Act, providing that no person shall manufacture, sell, etc., any article, product, or compound made wholly or in part out of an imitation milk, held not to absolutely prohibit the sale of the imitation milk itself.

3. Evidence ⟸20(1)—Courts will take judicial notice that boxes containing cans of liquid are called "cases."

The courts may take judicial notice that liquid goods, such as imitation milk, are, for purposes of transportation or storage, first inclosed in tightly sealed cans or bottles and then packed in boxes or other containers, which containers are called cases.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Case.]

4. Food ⟸3—Mode of determination as to whether seller of milk in cans is "wholesaler" or "retailer," stated.

Where an act regulating the sale of imitation milk imposes a different license fee upon wholesalers, who are defined as all persons selling cans of milk in quantities of "one full case or more at a time," than upon retailers, who are defined as including all persons selling in quantities of less than one case, in determining whether a business is wholesale or retail, the number of cans in each case is not material.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Retailer; Wholesaler.]

5. Statutes ⟸206—Construction should seek to give effect to each part of statute and carry out its purpose.

A statute should always be so construed, if reasonably possible, as to give each part thereof the meaning and effect which, from the act as a whole, appears to have been intended, and a narrow or restricted meaning should not be given to a word if it would result in an evasion of the evident purpose of the act, when a permissible and broader meaning would prevent the evasion and carry out that purpose.

6. Food ⟸3—Sale of milk by barrel or carboy held sale by "case," and seller is a "wholesaler" within license act.

Under Imitation Milk Act, imposing a different license fee upon retailers selling milk in quantities of less than one case than upon wholesalers selling one case at a time, a seller of milk in a barrel, carboy, or creamery can, containing larger quantities than would be sold to consumers in ordinary retail trade, would be selling by the case, and consequently would be a wholesaler.

7. Constitutional law ⟸48—Statute requiring wholesalers of milk to take out license presumed valid.

On habeas corpus to procure the discharge of one prosecuted for violating the Imitation Milk Act, imposing a license fee on wholesalers, it will be presumed that the Legislature properly omitted to provide for cases wherein a wholesaler sold and delivered milk to retailers in one-pound cans in large lots not incased at all; the statute making persons selling more than one case wholesalers.

8. Habeas corpus ⟸27—Writ lies only where magistrate without jurisdiction to issue warrant of arrest.

Habeas corpus to procure the release of one charged with selling imitation milk without a license lies only when the magistrate is without jurisdiction to issue the warrant of arrest.

9. Habeas corpus ⟸30(2)—That complaint is demurrable as failing to specify offense does not deprive court of jurisdiction.

Where a complaint in a court of inferior jurisdiction states facts showing that a defendant has committed a public offense, but is subject to attack by demurrer on the ground that it is uncertain as to the particular offense committed, the inferior court has jurisdiction, and the defect will not be ground for release on habeas corpus.

10. Food ⟸20(1)—Complaint under imitation milk statute held insufficient to show commission of offense.

A complaint, in a prosecution for violating Imitation Milk Act, held not to show that defendant had committed any offense whatever.

Sloane and Wilbur, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Application by E. B. Reineger for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Chief of Police, City and County of San Francisco, to secure release of petitioner from custody on a charge of violating a statute. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Thomas, Beedy & Lanagan, Theodore A. Bell, and Raymond Benjamin, all of San Francisco, Thomas E. Lannen, of Chicago, Ill. (William Thomas, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert W. Harrison and John H. Riordan, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondent.

John C. Macfarland, amicus curiæ, for State Board of Health.

SHAW, J. The petitioner, being imprisoned on the charge of violating the act of 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 89), regulating the sale of substances designated therein as "imitation milk," seeks his discharge upon a writ of habeas corpus. He was arrested upon a warrant issued upon a complaint filed in the police court of San Francisco.

The complaint alleges that—

"The crime of misdemeanor, to wit, selling and offering for sale imitation milk, without first obtaining a license therefor, was committed by E. B. Reineger, who did then and there willfully and unlawfully engage in the business of selling, dealing in, and furnishing imitation milk, namely, a compound composed of evaporated skim milk and 7.8 per cent. of edible vegetable fat, without any other ingredient or ingredients, without first having applied for and obtained a license so to do, and did unlawfully sell, other than for cooking purposes, at one time, and in the same transaction, 60 cans of such imitation milk, each can containing one pound avoirdupois, which said imitation milk was not of a separate and distinct character not resembling milk or condensed or evaporated milk, nor colored nor containing any color or any ingredient or ingredients that caused it to look unlike pure, whole cows milk, or the condensed or evaporated product made therefrom."

It further alleged that each can was labeled to show that it was a compound of evaporated skim milk and vegetable fat containing 7.8 per cent. vegetable fat and 25.5 per cent. total solids.

It is claimed on behalf of the respondent that the complaint charges two offenses, the first under section 2 of the act and the second under section 6 of the act. Section 2 has no reference to the obtaining of a license, while section 6 forbids the sale of milk by any person who has not obtained a license therefor as therein provided. We are satisfied that no offense is charged under the provisions of section 2, the material parts whereof are as follows:

"Sec. 2. No person by himself, his agents or servants shall render, manufacture, sell, offer for sale, expose for sale, or have in his possession with intent to sell or to use, or to serve to patrons, customers, boarders or inmates of any hotel, dwelling house, restaurant, public conveyance or boarding house, any article, product or compound made wholly or in part, out of an imitation milk; provided, that nothing in this section shall be construed to prohibit the manufacture or sale, under regulations hereinafter provided, of imitation milk, of substances or compounds that may be used as imitation milk, of a separate and distinct character not resembling milk or condensed or evaporated milk, and in such a manner as will advise the purchaser and consumer of its real character, colored or containing ingredients that cause it to look unlike pure whole cow's milk or the condensed or evaporated produce made therefrom; * * * and provided, further, that nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent or prohibit the manufacture, sale, or use, for cooking purposes, of imitation milk as defined by section one of this act."

[1] The first clause of the complaint manifestly was intended to charge the selling of such milk without license, and that offense only. The claim that an offense is charged under section 2 is based on the second clause of the complaint. Upon the general frame of the complaint it would appear that this clause was intended merely as an additional definition of the offense of selling without license. The claim is that it was not so intended, but that it is a charge of an offense under section 2. Its language follows closely the language of the provisions of section 2. If it was intended as a charge of a separate offense, it could have been based only upon the theory that the provisos were affirmative and prohibitory, and were intended to define a criminal offense. The mere reading of them shows clearly that they were not so intended. They merely state exceptions to the previously stated prohibition. They do not forbid any act nor define any offense. In re Day, 181 Ill. 79, 54 N. E. 646, 50 L. R. A. 519; State v. Weeden, 17 Wyo. 418, 100 Pac. 114; Gaither v. Wilson, 164 Ill. 548, 45 N. E. 1019; 36 Cyc. 1162; 2 Suth. Stat. Constr. § 352.

[2] It is argued that the first clause of the section absolutely prohibits the sale of the imitation milk itself. It is obvious that it was not so intended. An article or compound made by evaporating from imitation milk the water therein, or by any other separation of its ingredients without adding others, would be made wholly out of imitation milk, and would come within the prohibition of the clause. But by no ordinary use of language can it be said that an article made wholly out of imitation milk is the same thing as the imitation milk out of which it is made. The complaint does not allege that the defendant sold any article, product, or compound made wholly or in part out of any imitation milk. The latter part of it charges merely that he did sell imitation milk which was not so colored as to be unlike milk. The first clause does not forbid such sale. Since it fails to state an offense under section 2, the complaint can be upheld only upon the theory that it purports to set forth a charge of selling imitation milk without license. This, we think, was the real purpose of the pleader.

Section 6 declares that no person shall engage in the business of selling imitation milk without first having obtained a license so to do. For such license it provides that wholesale dealers shall pay a fee of $50, and retail dealers a fee of $5. The petitioner concedes that the complaint charges that he did engage in the business without having obtained a license, but he claims that the section is void because of the uncertainty of its definitions of dealers, the uncertainty being of such a character, so it is argued, that no person in the business could determine from such definitions whether he was a wholesaler or a retailer. The two definitions in question are as follows:

"The term 'wholesale dealer' as used in this section includes all persons, firms or corporations who sell any of said substances in quantities of one full case or more at a time or in the same transaction. The term 'retailer dealer' includes all persons who sell in quantities of less than one case."

It is contended that the question whether a person carrying on the business is a "wholesale dealer" or a retail dealer depends entirely on the meaning of the word "case"; that its meaning is altogether uncertain and indefinite; that consequently no one can determine the question, or ascertain from the section what sort of license a particular dealer must have or what amount he must pay as a license fee; and hence that the provisions requiring licenses to such dealers are incapable of enforcement and void.

[3, 4] The word "case," when used in that connection, is defined as "a box, sheath, or covering of any kind; * * * a box and its contents; * * * as a case of goods" (Webster's Dict.), and also as "anything intended to inclose or contain something." (Standard Dict.) It is common knowledge that liquid goods, such as imitation milk, are, for purposes of transportation or storage, first inclosed in tightly sealed cans or bottles, and then packed in boxes or other containers, each containing a number of the cans or bottles. This is done either by the manufacturer or by wholesale dealers who buy from the factory. Of this fact the courts may take judicial notice. Such boxes or containers are called cases. In each kind of goods usually a fixed number of cans or bottles are packed in each case, and such number is well known to all persons engaged in trade in such goods, whether wholesalers or retailers. In any action wherein the number contained in each case was a fact material to the cause of action, or charge, it would be necessary to allege and prove the usage in that particular trade as to the number of cans or bottles packed in each case, or if there were cases of different sizes in use, the number in each size, if that were a material fact. But as the facts that wholesalers sell and ship such goods in cases as above stated, and that retailers do not, are of common knowledge, the word "case" has a definite meaning when used to distinguish a wholesaler from a retailer. It refers to the boxes in which the cans are packed and shipped, and it includes the contents of such cases, whether a small or a large number of cans is incased. In determining whether the business is wholesale or retail, the number in each case is not material. The one selling by cases would be a wholesaler, regardless of the number of cans in a case; the one selling less than a case at a time would be a retailer. A sale, in the sense here used, would include the delivery. A change in the number of cans packed in a case by the usage of the trade, or by a particular wholesaler, would not affect the question.

[5, 6] If, as suggested, imitation milk were sold by wholesalers in bulk, as in barrels or carboys or large creamery cans, without being put in small cans or bottles for the retailer, and the retailer should adopt the custom of selling to consumers in pint or quart vessels, brought in by the consumer or furnished by the retailer and filled from such bulk containers, no difficulty need arise in applying the law. A statute should always be so construed, if reasonably possible, as to give each part thereof the meaning and effect which, from the act as a whole, appears to have been intended. A narrow or restricted meaning should not be given to a word, if it would result in an evasion of the evident purpose of the act, when a permissible, but broader, meaning would prevent the evasion and carry out that purpose. A barrel, carboy, or a creamery can, used to contain larger quantities of the milk than would be sold to consumers in ordinary retail trade, would be a "sheath or covering" for the milk, a thing intended to contain the milk, and therefore it would be included in the general definition of the word "case." One who was engaged in the business of selling the milk in such packages would be selling by the "case," and consequently a wholesale dealer, as defined in the section.

[7] A wholesaler who engaged in the business of selling and delivering to retailers the one-pound cans in large lots not incased at all, but merely piled into box cars or trucks, would be so rare that he would be in a class by himself, and we may safely leave his case to the next Legislature. The possibility does not appear so great as to require us to annul the section for fear that there may be an unjust discrimination in his favor if it is held valid. In view of the presumption in favor of legislative action we must assume that the Legislature, upon a survey of the field, concluded that there were no dealers carrying on business in that manner, and that it was improbable that there ever would be, and so purposely omitted any provision for such cases. Ex parte Martin, 157 Cal. 57, 106 Pac. 235, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 242; Ex parte Miller, 162 Cal. 698, 124 Pac. 427.

The complaint does not purport to charge a violation of sections 4 and 5 of the act, or of either of them. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the objections urged to the validity of those sections.

The proposition that a compound of this kind which is not milk, but which resembles milk, and which for many purposes may be used as a substitute for milk, is subject to reasonable regulations under the police power, designed to prevent it from being sold to consumers as real milk, is settled by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Hebe Co. v. Shaw, 248 U. S. 297, 39 Sup. Ct. 125, 63 L. Ed. 255. Some of the regulations in this act may be unreasonable; but, as they are not so interwoven with the provisions requiring a license and other parts of the act as to be inseparable and thereby invalidate the entire act, we need not consider the question.

[8, 9] It may be that the complaint is uncertain because it does not state whether the petitioner is a wholesale dealer or a retail dealer as defined in the act. It does not allege whether the 60 cans sold amounted to one full case or not. Habeas corpus lies in such cases only when the magistrate is without jurisdiction to issue the warrant of arrest. Where a complaint in a court of inferior jurisdiction states facts showing that the defendant has committed a public offense, but is subject to attack by demurrer on the ground that it is uncertain as to the particular offense committed, the inferior court has jurisdiction, and the defect will not be ground for his release on habeas corpus. Ex parte McNulty, 77 Cal. 166, 19 Pac. 237, 11 Am. St. Rep. 257. There is nothing in Ex parte Kearney, 55 Cal. 212, or Ex parte Greenall, 153 Cal. 767, 96 Pac. 804, that is contrary to this rule.

[10] The complaints there considered failed to show that the defendant had committed any offense whatever.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner is remanded to the custody of the proper officer.

SLOANE, J. I dissent from that portion of the main opinion construing section 2 of the act. In my judgment it was clearly the intention of the Legislature to prohibit the sale of imitation milk. I concur in the rest of the opinion.

ZELLNER v. WASSMAN et al. (L. A. 6052.)

1. Specific performance ⇐86—Remedy inapplicable to agreement to bequeath where legal remedy adequate.

Equitable relief in the nature of specific performance of an agreement to devise and bequeath property by will cannot be allowed where the legal remedy is adequate; so specific performance of an alleged contract to bequeath a specified sum of money will not be granted, the legal action for damages affording adequate relief.

2. Specific performance ⇐39—Relief will not be granted because action at law is barred by statute of frauds.

Specific performance of an oral contract to bequeath money will not be granted because the legal action for damages is barred by the statute of frauds, particularly as the statute is not disregarded by courts of equity.

3. Specific performance ⇐39 — Statute of frauds applicable to suits in equity, but cannot be used as instrument of fraud.

The statute of frauds is applied in equity suits as well as in actions at law, subject to the rule that, since the statute was designed to prevent fraud, equity will not permit it to be used as an instrument for the accomplishment of fraudulent purposes.

4. Specific performance ⇐39 — No resort to equitable relief on theory that law action is barred by statute of frauds.

Where the administration of law and equity has been merged in one court, the doctrine of equitable estoppel applied to prevent reliance on the statute of frauds in case it is sought to be used as instrument to accomplish fraud is not confined to suits in equity, but is equally available in actions at law, and hence in such a court there can be no resort to equitable relief on the theory that legal action is barred by the statute.

5. Frauds, statute of ⇐103(1) — Bequest in lost will held not memorandum of contract to bequeath.

Though testator made a bequest in a will duly executed, it does not amount to a memorandum in writing required by the statute of frauds (Civ. Code, § 1624, as amended in 1905 [St. 1905, p. 611]), requiring agreements to leave property by will to be reduced to writing, where the will was not discovered at the death of the testator.

6. Frauds, statute of ⟸139(1)—Execution of will not performance of agreement to bequeath.

The mere execution of a will containing a bequest where the will was not discovered at the death of testator, and there was no other written memorandum, coupled with the fact that the services for which the bequest was to be made were fully rendered, does not render the contract executed, so as to prevent the personal representatives of the decedent from relying on the statute of frauds.

7. Frauds, statute of ⟸143(4)—Representatives of decedent not estopped from relying on statute of frauds.

Where decedent's mother requested plaintiff to assist her in making investments and in caring for decedent during periods of delirium tremens, and requested decedent to pay plaintiff $5,000 out of her estate, and decedent arranged to bequeath plaintiff that sum if he would forego fees as administrator, etc., held that, where there was no written memorandum of the agreement as required by Civ. Code, § 1624, as amended in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 611), the personal representatives of decedent may rely on the statute of frauds, there being no estoppel, as there was no representation by decedent that he would reduce the contract to writing.

8. Judgment ⟸249—Where complaint states cause of action on any theory, it supports recovery.

As there is but one form of civil action, plaintiff may recover if his complaint states any cause of action entitling him to any relief in law or equity, even though he has misconceived the relief to which he is entitled.

9. Frauds, statute of ⟸138(4)—Party may recover for services on quantum meruit where action on contract is barred by statute.

Where a party has conferred on another with the assent of the latter a benefit not intended as a gratuity, and the recipient cannot be held on his original promise to compensate, the law implies a promise to pay the reasonable value; hence, where plaintiff could not recover on an agreement to bequeath money because there was no written memorandum as required by Civ. Code, § 1624, as amended in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 611), held that, where the agreement was in consideration of the rendition of services, etc., plaintiff might recover on the quantum meruit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Richard Zellner, Jr., against E. C. Wassman, Carl Frederick Wassman, and Frank Bryson, administrator of the estate of Hugo C. Wassman, deceased. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. L. Murphey, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Slosson & Mitchell, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment of nonsuit in an action brought against the administrator and heirs at law of Hugo C. Wassman, deceased, upon an alleged contract of said deceased to leave certain property to plaintiff by will. The claim sued upon emanates from the following circumstances set forth in the complaint: Frequently every year, for a period of seven years, commencing in 1905, the mother of deceased requested plaintiff to come to her home and take charge of deceased during attacks of delirium tremens, to which he was subject. Complying with these requests, plaintiff, on many occasions during the years above mentioned, remained with the deceased a large part of his time, both day and night, and, in order to do so, neglected his business. Plaintiff was also frequently requested to and did attend deceased as a companion, and both deceased and his mother declared to plaintiff that the latter was of great assistance and benefit to the said deceased. In addition to these services, plaintiff aided the mother of deceased in business matters and advised the purchase, for the sum of $3,000, of certain real property which was sold by her a few days prior to her death for $35,000, $5,000 of which was paid in cash and $30,000 by a promissory note secured by a mortgage. In consequence of the foregoing, the mother of deceased declared to plaintiff, in the presence of her son, that she intended to pay plaintiff $5,000, and that she would bequeath him that amount by will, for she did not have the money with which to pay him at the time. She requested her son, the deceased, to pay plaintiff $5,000 from her estate in the event that she died without making a will or paying the said sum, and the son agreed to do so.

The money was never paid by the mother, who died intestate in the month of July, 1912, leaving to her son, as her sole heir at law, an estate consisting of $4,776.80 in cash, real estate valued at $500, and the above-mentioned promissory note for $30,000. At the time of the mother's death, the son was suffering from serious illness, caused by excessive drinking, and plaintiff, upon the son's request, temporarily gave up his business and devoted several weeks to care of said son. As a result of the efforts of plaintiff and one other person, the son had, prior to October, 1912, altogether stopped drinking alcoholic liquors. At that time the son, being himself unable to act as administrator of his mother's estate, asked plaintiff to act in that capacity, and plaintiff did so. During the administration of the estate the son told plaintiff that he desired to compensate plaintiff for his services to him and to carry out the wishes of his mother with respect to the payment of the $5,000, but that there would not be sufficient money for that purpose until the $30,000 note was paid. This was so, he said.

because, although cured of the drinking habit, he was unable to earn a living and was entirely dependent upon the proceeds of his mother's estate for support. He then proposed to plaintiff that, if plaintiff would waive his administrator's fees, amount to approximately $1,100, and would make no claim against his mother's estate, he, in turn, would pay plaintiff $5,000 out of the money collected on the $30,000 note, provided that the amount of said note was collected prior to his death, and that he would make a will and bequeath plaintiff $5,000 so that plaintiff would be secured in event the son died before the note was collected. Plaintiff agreed to accept this proposition and fully performed all of the conditions on his part. The note is still uncollected, save for interest and a small portion of the principal, amounting to less than $3,000, and the son did not during his lifetime pay, or have sufficient money with which to pay, the $5,000 to plaintiff. Although the son made and executed a will wherein he bequeathed $5,000 to plaintiff, no will was found upon his death, which occurred November 26, 1917. Administration of the estate is now pending; the only heirs of the decedent being two uncles, one of whom resides in Hanover, Germany, and the other in the state of Tennessee.

The complaint is drawn upon two theories: (1) That plaintiff is entitled to specific performance of the alleged agreement; (2) that the action is a suit at law upon a claim against the estate of the decedent, duly presented and rejected by the administrator.

[1-4] Under the facts disclosed by the complaint, equitable relief in the nature of specific performance is unavailable. Agreements to leave property by will often consist of promises to devise real property in return for peculiar personal services, or other consideration, which was not intended to be, and in the contemplation of law could not be, compensated by money, and this circumstance has rendered possible the frequent interposition of equity in cases involving violations of such agreement. The fact remains, however, that in actions upon these agreements, as in other actions upon contracts, inadequacy of the legal remedy to compensate for the breach is the keystone of equitable jurisdiction. Since plaintiff relies upon an alleged contract to bequeath a specified sum of money, the case falls within the decision of this court in Morrison v. Land, 169 Cal. 580, 147 Pac. 259, where it was said:

"An ordinary action at law for breach of the contract would bring him the very thing to which he is entitled under the allegations of his complaint—afford him full and adequate relief. In such an action, the measure of damages would have been the value of the property agreed to be bequeathed, for that was the amount in which he was damaged by the breach. See 40 Cyc. 1073. Attorneys for respondents pertinently ask, 'Is a decree in equity ordering payment of a sum of money from the estate to plaintiff any more perfect and complete justice to him than a common law judgment in his favor and against the estate for a like sum?' A clearer case of adequacy of remedy at law could not be made than that presented here. The situation is such as to absolutely preclude resort to equity."

In support of the proposition that the case is amenable to equitable jurisdiction, counsel for plaintiff advances the naive argument that plaintiff's remedy at law is inadequate if a legal action is barred by the statute of frauds. The proposition, if adopted, would lead to the anomalous result that all oral agreements within the statute of frauds which had been performed by one of the parties thereto would be specifically enforceable in equity upon the ground that the statute rendered a recovery at law impossible. Moreover, plaintiff would gain nothing even were he permitted to sue for equitable relief in the nature of specific performance, for the statute of frauds is not disregarded in equity. It is enforced in suits for equitable relief as well as in actions at law, subject to the rule that, since the statute was designed to prevent fraud, equity refuses to permit it to be used as an instrument for the accomplishment of fraudulent purposes. 3 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 1293. Where the administration of law and equity has been merged in one court, this doctrine of equitable estoppel is not confined to suits in equity, but is equally available in an action at law. 5 Browne on Statute of Frauds, p. 575; Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 782, 106 Pac. 88, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154. Therefore a plaintiff's claims to an equitable estoppel will be considered in determining whether or not his cause of action is barred by the statute of frauds whether the action be at law upon the contract or an equitable action seeking specific performance.

[5] This brings us to a consideration of the legal action upon the claim presented against the estate. Agreements to leave property by will must be reduced to writing or evidenced by some written note or memorandum; for, by virtue of the 1905 amendment to section 1624 of the Civil Code, they are within the purview of the statute of frauds. It is admitted that the agreement of the son to leave $5,000 by will herein sued upon was not reduced to writing, and that no written note or memorandum thereof was made unless the will executed by deceased, a copy of which was attached to the complaint, fulfills the requirements of the statute in that respect. The will in question contained a simple bequest of $5,000 to plaintiff, without reference to any agreement in respect thereto. The pre-eminent qualification of a memorandum under the statute of frauds is "that it must contain the essential terms of the contract, expressed with such a degree of certainty that it may be understood without recourse to parol evidence to show the intention of the parties." 5 Browne on Statute of Frauds, § 371. Accordingly, it has been held in this state that an undelivered deed cannot be regarded as a sufficient memorandum of an oral agreement for the sale of land therein described when the deed is silent as to the terms of the alleged agreement and merely conveys the land from one party to another. Swain v. Burnette, 89 Cal. 564, 570, 26 Pac. 1093. In other jurisdictions the same reasoning has been applied to a will, for some reason ineffective upon the death of the testator, which makes no mention of the terms of the contract in pursuance of which it is alleged to have been executed. Allen v. Bromberg, 163 Ala. 620, 50 South. 884; McClanahan v. McClanahan, 77 Wash. 138, 137 Pac. 479, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 461. A potential factor in furtherance of fraud would be engendered were a will containing a simple bequest permitted to operate as evidence of a binding contract to make such a bequest. It must therefore be held that there is no written memorandum of the agreement here in suit.

[6] Nor does this case fall within the rule that the statute of frauds cannot be invoked in case of a completed oral contract (Schultze v. Noble, 77 Cal. 79, 19 Pac. 182; Colon v. Tosetti, 14 Cal. App. 693, 113 Pac. 365, 366), for the contract now sued upon was not completed. The reason that the contract is now in court is because the decedent did not perform his part of the alleged agreement by causing to be in existence at the time of his death a will bequeathing $5,000 to plaintiff. The mere execution of a will was not a performance of the contract.

[7] It has been stated that the right of courts of equity to hold a person estopped to assert the statute of frauds where such assertion would amount to practicing a fraud applies "in every transaction where the statute is invoked." 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 921; Seymour v. Oelrichs, supra. We may assume, for the purposes of this case, without deciding, that this doctrine applies to contracts to leave property by will; for in any event, the circumstances of this case are not such as to estop defendants from invoking the statute of frauds as a defense. As a general rule neither the mere omission to put a contract in writing nor such omission coupled with performance is alone sufficient to create an estoppel. "A plaintiff * * * must be able to show clearly * * * such acts and conduct of the defendant as the court would hold to amount to a representation that he proposed to stand by his agreement, and not avail himself of the statute to escape his performance, and also that the plaintiff, in reliance on this representation, proceeded, either in performance or pursuance of his contract, to so far alter his position as to incur 'an unjust and unconscientious injury and loss, in case the defendant is permitted after all to rely upon the statutory defense.'" 5 Browne on Statute of Frauds, p. 585. Plaintiff's services to decedent's mother were apparently rendered upon the basis of friendship, in the absence of contract and without expectation of charge. The performance relied upon by plaintiff consisted in waiving administrator's fees and refraining from presenting a claim against the mother's estate, in addition to certain personal services, in consideration of an oral promise to leave plaintiff $5,000 by will. There was therefore no such change of conditions and relations in reliance upon the contract that a refusal of the other party to perform would amount to fraud, as was the case in Barry v. Beamer, 8 Cal. App. 200, 96 Pac. 373, cited by counsel for plaintiff. There was no representation on the part of decedent that he would reduce the promise to writing, as was the case in Seymour v. Oelrichs, supra. The words and conduct on the part of decedent in making the oral promise and accepting plaintiff's performance did not amount to an inducement to plaintiff to, in effect, waive a written instrument in reliance upon a representation that decedent would stand by his agreement and not avail himself of the statute of frauds. There is therefore an absence of the element of fraud which is requisite to an estoppel. It is a case in which the consequences of the failure to comply with the statute must be borne by the party who seeks to enforce the agreement, and it follows that plaintiff has no cause of action upon the contract.

[8, 9] While the contract cannot be enforced, either in law or equity, we think that plaintiff is nevertheless entitled to some relief under the pleadings and evidence offered in support thereof, and that, as a consequence, the judgment of nonsuit was erroneous. There being but one form of civil action in this state, a plaintiff may recover if his complaint "states any cause of action entitling the plaintiff to any relief at law or in equity." Hayden v. Collins, 1 Cal. App. 259, 261, 81 Pac. 1120, 1121. It is not essential that a complaint state a cause of action for the relief which plaintiff seeks, provided the facts stated show some right of recovery, and a party cannot be thrown out of court merely because he may have misconceived the form of relief to which he is entitled. Walsh v. McKeen, 75 Cal. 519, 17 Pac. 673; Rogers v. Duhart, 97 Cal. 500, 32 Pac. 570; Brown v. Irrig. Dist., 190 Pac. 797. Where a party has conferred upon another, with the assent of the latter, a benefit which was not intended as a gratuity, and the recipient cannot be held upon his original promise to compensate by virtue of the statute of frauds, the law implies a promise on the part of the party receiving the benefits to pay the reasonable value of whatever has been received under the contract. Elliott on Contracts, vol. 2, § 1216. In the present case it appears, from a careful examination of the pleadings, that plaintiff has pleaded facts sufficient to entitle him, under the rules just mentioned, to a recovery for the reasonable value of his services. It is true that the cause of action for the reasonable value of the services is inartificially set forth, and that the pleadings ought to be amended for the purpose of clarifying the issues, but the facts pleaded were sufficient to advise defendants of the nature of the basis of plaintiff's claim of recovery, and objection, so far as the sufficiency of the complaint was concerned, was raised only by general demurrer. The claim presented to the administrator by plaintiff and sued upon in the present action sets forth facts sufficient to show the nature of the services performed; a request for the services on the part of decedent; that the services rendered were not gratuitous, but were rendered, to some extent at least, in expectation of and under a definite arrangement for compensation; that plaintiff has received no compensation therefor. Testimony in support of all of these allegations was either given or offered and refused; proof of the value of the services and the failure to pay the same was offered and rejected. The trial court evidently proceeded upon the theory that both of plaintiff's causes of action were predicated solely upon the contractual claim, which, as we have above stated, was unenforceable. However, in view of the presence in the pleadings of facts sufficiently stating the elements of a cause of action for the value of the services rendered, and in view of the fact that sufficient evidence in support of such cause of action was either introduced or offered for introduction, the nonsuit should not have been granted.

FULLER v. TOWNE. (L. A. 5369.)

1. Schools and school districts ⟸81(2)—Evidence insufficient to show indemnitor of surety on contractor's bond did not agree to make good deficiency to materialmen.

Evidence held insufficient to sustain finding that defendant indemnitor of a surety company against loss on bonds given on behalf of a contractor to erect a schoolhouse, after arranging at a creditors' meeting after the disappearance of the contractor to complete the building and pay all claims in full if not harassed or oppressed, did not agree to collect the money due from the school district, apply it to claims, and make good any deficiency, in consideration of release of stop notices by claimant materialmen.

2. Schools and school districts ⟸81(2)—Indemnitor of surety company liable on promise to materialmen, irrespective of his liability for contractor's default.

Where the indemnitor of surety on bonds of a contractor to erect a school building, in consideration of claimants for materials releasing their stop notices so that he could secure payment for the work, which he had completed on disappearance of the contractor, agreed to apply payments to claims and to make good any deficiency, his promise was supported by consideration, and he was liable thereon, whether or not, on account of the contractor's default, he was obligated to pay materialmen.

3. Trial ⟸404(2)—Finding stop notices ineffective merely a conclusion of law.

The trial court's finding that certain stop notices given by materialmen to a school district relative to payments on a school house under construction for it were wholly ineffective was not a finding, but a conclusion of law.

4. Mechanics' liens ⟸113(2)—Stop notice effective as to money subsequently falling due under contract.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, makes a stop notice effective as to any money subsequently falling due under the contract without any provision that the money be due at the time of the giving of the notice, or that the notice be effective only as to money falling due next after the use in the building of the materials on account of which the notice is given.

5. Schools and school districts ⟸81(2)—Stop notices effective as to money due under contract whether notice was for labor or materials furnished at instance of contractor or of surety's indemnitor.

Where the indemnitor of surety on the bonds of a contractor to erect a schoolhouse on the contractor's default merely stepped into his shoes and undertook to complete the work, stop notices from materialmen to the school district as to payments on the contract were effective under the statute as to all money due or thereafter becoming due under the contract, whether the notice was for labor or materials furnished at the instance of the original contractor, or at the instance of the indemnitor of the contractor's surety.

6. Contracts ⟸72—Agreement in consideration of release supported whether or not stop notices released were effective.

A contract, in consideration of release by materialmen of stop notices filed in good faith, under which the materialmen were claiming in good faith, is supported by sufficient consideration and is valid, regardless of whether or not the notices were legally effective.

7. Frauds, statute of ⟸33(2) — Oral agreement of indemnitor of surety of contractor for release of stop notices not within statute.

Oral agreement of indemnitor of surety on bonds of contractor to erect school building to apply all payments to the claims of materialmen and to make good any deficiency in consideration of release of stop notices to the school district filed by such materialmen held not within Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, Civ. Code, § 1624, as a promise to answer for the debt of another, in view of the exception of cases provided for in Civ. Code, § 2794.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by J. D. Fuller against Z. A. Towne. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Sheldon Borden, Richard J. O. Culver, G. C. De Garmo, and Albert A. Kidder, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Tanner, O'Dell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. The plaintiff, as the holder by assignment of certain claims against one La Rue, brought the present action against the defendant, Towne, upon the alleged promise of the latter to pay the claims. After trial judgment went for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals. The facts as stated in the complaint are in brief: La Rue in April, 1915, entered into a contract with the trustees of the school district of Watts, in Los Angeles county, to erect a schoolhouse, and induced a surety company to execute two bonds on his behalf, one for the faithful performance of the contract, and the other for the payment of claims for labor done upon, or materials furnished for, the building. These bonds were furnished by the surety company in reliance upon a written contract previously executed by the defendant, whereby he agreed to indemnify the company against loss upon any bonds they might give on behalf of La Rue. La Rue commenced the erection of the building and had partially completed it when he disappeared. The defendant thereupon, induced by his responsibility on his indemnity contract, undertook to complete it and did so. Prior to his disappearance La Rue had purchased and failed to pay for materials furnished for the building, and it is the claims for the price of materials so furnished which the plaintiff holds by assignment and upon which he sues. After La Rue's disappearance, stop notices on behalf of each of these claims against any money payable by the school district for the building were given the district by the plaintiff's assignors. Upon the completion of the schoolhouse, there was a considerable balance due from the school district under the building contract. In order to obtain this money, the defendant promised the plaintiff's assignors that, if they would withdraw their stop notices, so that he could secure payment from the school district, he would use the money so obtained to pay the claims against the work, including their claims, and would pay any deficiency out of his own pocket. The plaintiff's assignors accordingly released their claims so far as the school district was concerned, and the balance due for the building was paid the defendant. With this balance he paid in full all bills which he had himself incurred in connection with the work, and applied the remainder pro rata to the payment of the claims incurred by La Rue. The remainder was not sufficient to pay these latter claims in full, the defendant refused to make the deficiency good, as it is alleged he promised to do, and the complaint asks for judgment against him for the amount of the deficiency.

It is apparent at once upon the foregoing facts, as stated in the complaint, that the gravamen of the plaintiff's cause of action is the alleged promise of the defendant to make good the deficiency. The other material facts appear practically without dispute, and if the defendant actually made the promise, he is liable upon it, for it was a promise made for and supported by a sufficient consideration. It may be that he would be liable even if this particular promise were not made, for the complaint goes on to allege a number of other promises by the defendant, made subsequently to the one we have mentioned. But these later promises, as alleged, are based upon the prior promise, and we are not certain that they are supported by any consideration other than the obligation of the prior promise, so that, if the prior promise were not made, it may be that the subsequent promises are not contractual in effect for want of a consideration. But it is not necessary to decide the question so presented, and for the purposes of discussion on this appeal we may assume the view most favorable to the defendant, and that is that the later promises would not be effective unless supported by the prior promise mentioned, so that the situation is that, if the defendant made that promise, he is liable, and, if he did not make it, he is not. The trial court found that he did not make it, and the most fundamental question presented by the appeal is as to whether or not this finding is contrary to the evidence.

[1] An examination of the record makes it plain that the finding is contrary to the evidence and wholly without support in it. The evidence for the plaintiff is that upon the disappearance of La Rue the defendant engaged one Pierce, a credit man for one of La Rue's creditors, to advise or assist the defendant in the situation in which he found himself by reason of his agreement to indemnify the surety company which was La Rue's bondsman; that a meeting of creditors was had whereat Pierce, speaking for the defendant, who was present and acquiesced in all that Pierce said, informed the creditors that the defendant would undertake to complete the building and pay all claims in full, provided he was not harassed or pressed; that upon the completion of the building another meeting of creditors was had, with the defendant and Pierce present, and at this meeting substantially the arrangement alleged in the complaint was made between the creditors and the defendant; that is, the creditors were to withdraw their stop notices, and the defendant was to collect the money due from the school district and apply it to the claims against the work, and was himself to make good the deficiency which was known at the time to exist. There were quite a number of witnesses to the foregoing facts. There was also considerable testimony as to the defendant's subsequent conduct, which strongly corroborates the testimony that the arrangement claimed was made. According to this testimony, the defendant later gave his note and mortgage for the deficiency, but there was some clerical defect in the instrument, and, upon their return to the defendant for correction, he refused to redeliver them. There was also introduced in evidence a verified pleading by the defendant in another action wherein it was stated that he had executed such note and mortgage.

The only evidence for the defendant was his own testimony. He admitted that at the first meeting of the creditors he was present and allowed Pierce to speak for him, and does not controvert the fact that Pierce stated that he would pay the claims against the work in full. As to the meeting after the completion of the building, when the arrangement which is the crux of the case is claimed by the plaintiff to have been made, the defendant does not testify at all. Nor does he in his testimony deny having promised to make good the deficiency. He does deny ever having promised to give a mortgage or ever having executed one, and that is about all of substance that he does deny. Even as to that, he admits signing some papers which may have been the note and mortgage, but says he signed them without reading them and in the belief that they were something else. He likewise explains the verification of the pleading which alleged that he had executed such note and mortgage by saying that he had sworn to the pleading without reading it. It is doubtful if this testimony was sufficient to justify the finding which the court made that he did not execute the note and mortgage. But, whether it was or not, it was wholly insufficient to justify the finding that he did not make the arrangement at the creditors' meeting which is the basis of the action. That arrangement was testified to by several witnesses, there is nothing whatever to cast doubt upon their testimony, on the contrary all the circumstances of the case tend to corroborate it, and the defendant's evidence does not controvert it. There is but one conclusion possible, and that is that the finding is contrary to what is the plain fact in the case.

[2] We have stated that, if this finding were not justified, if the promise substantially as alleged in the complaint were in fact made, the defendant was liable. Prima facie, of course, this statement is true, for the promise was made for a consideration, the withdrawal by the plaintiff's assignors of their stop notices so that the defendant might collect the balance on the building contract from the school district, and, being supported by a consideration, creates a contractual obligation enforceable at law. Counsel for the defendant, however, contend that the statement is not true for several reasons, and the cause should not be decided without a discussion of these reasons. Among those urged are that there was no valid contract between La Rue and the school district, that the bonds which the surety company signed on La Rue's behalf were not valid, that the bonds given by the surety company did not fall within the defendant's indemnity contract, and that the defendant never received any consideration for executing the indemnity contract. Some of these reasons are advanced in more than one form. They all, however, go to the single point that because of them the defendant was not liable on his indemnity contract, and was therefore under no obligation because of La Rue's default, and in particular was under no obligation to pay the bills of plaintiff's assignors for materials furnished for the work. The answer is that it is wholly immaterial whether the defendant was so obligated or not. He is not being sued upon that obligation, but upon a wholly independent one which he later assumed voluntarily, in consideration of the plaintiff's assignors releasing their stop notices. His motive for assuming this later obligation may have been his belief that he was responsible for La Rue's bills, because of the indemnity contract, but his mistaken belief in this respect, if it was a mistake, does not entitle him now to deny or avoid the contractual arrangement which he made. Even if he could have avoided that arrangement in the first instance on the ground of mistake, which is very doubtful at best, he certainly cannot do so now, when it is wholly impossible to restore the creditors to the position they were in when by his promise he induced them to release their stop notices.

[3, 4] Another reason advanced why the defendant should not be responsible upon his promise is that, according to the claim of counsel, the stop notices were wholly ineffective. The trial court, in fact, made an express finding to that effect, but the finding is very evidently but a conclusion of law. It is rather difficult to get clearly the ground upon which it is claimed the notices were ineffective. Apparently it is one or more of the following: (1) The fact that the materials for whose price the notices were given had all been used in the building at the time of La Rue's disappearance, and La Rue had been paid all installments due up to that time; (2) the fact that no money was due on the building when the notices were given; and (3) the legal proposition that the work done by the defendant was as if done under a separate contract from that done by La Rue. As to the first two grounds, it is sufficient to say that the statute makes a stop notice effective as to any money subsequently falling due under the contract without any provision that the money be due at the time of the giving of the notice, or that the notice be effective only as to money falling due next after the use in the building of the materials on account of which the notice is given. The statute (section 1184, Code Civ. Proc.) reads:

"Upon such notice being given, * * * the owner or person who contracted with the contractor, shall withhold from his contractor sufficient money due or that may become due to such contractor to answer such claim. * * *"

See, also, Diamond Match Co. v. Silberstein, 165 Cal. 282, 131 Pac. 874.

[5, 6] As to the third ground, the answer is that the defendant undertook the completion of the schoolhouse, not under a new or separate contract or as an independent contractor, but under La Rue's contract and as one completing the contract for La Rue upon the latter's default. The defendant simply stepped into La Rue's shoes, and consequently a stop notice was effective under the statute as to all money due or thereafter becoming due under the contract, regardless of whether the notice was for labor or materials furnished for the building at the instance of La Rue or at the instance of the defendant. There is nothing contrary to these views in Hughes Bros. v. Hoover, 3 Cal. App. 150, 84 Pac. 681, and Clark v. Beyrle, 160 Cal. 314, 116 Pac. 739, cited by defendant's counsel. Furthermore, it would make no difference if the notices were legally ineffective, as counsel claims. The plaintiff's assignors filed them in good faith and were claiming under them in good faith. They had a right to insist upon them and were under no obligation to release them. This being the case, a contract in consideration of their release is supported by a sufficient consideration and is valid, regardless of whether or not the notices were in truth legally effective. 13 Corpus Juris, 346.

[7] The final contention on behalf of the defendant which requires discussion is that the promise sued upon was within the statute of frauds as a promise to answer for the debt of another, and was not in writing. The promise was certainly one to answer for the debt of another, and it was not in writing nor was there any written memorandum of it. But section 1624, Civil Code, and section 1973, Code of Civil Procedure, which constitute our statute of frauds as to contracts of this character, both except from their operation the cases provided for in section 2794, Civil Code. This section specifies a number of cases wherein a promise to answer for a debt of another need not be in writing, but of these there is only one within which the defendant's promise here might fall. Omitting the provisions concerning other cases, the section reads as to the one material here:

"A promise to answer for the obligation of another, in any of the following cases, is deemed an original obligation of the promisor and need not be in writing. * * * 3. Where the promise, being for the antecedent obligation of another, is made * * * upon a consideration beneficial to the promisor, whether moving from either party to the antecedent obligation, or from another person."

It is clear that the present promise falls within the class so specified. Just two elements are required by the Code provision: (1) That the promise be for an antecedent obligation; and (2) that the consideration be for the benefit of the promisor. Both elements are present here. La Rue's debts were antecedent obligations, and the consideration for the defendant's promise, the release or withdrawal of the creditors' stop notices, was for his benefit. It was for the purpose and had the effect of enabling the defendant to secure from the school district the unpaid balance of the contract price for the schoolhouse. The defendant had himself incurred bills for labor and materials for completing the building for which he was responsible in any case. These bills he was enabled to pay by the money he secured from the school district upon the release by the creditors of La Rue of their stop notices, and one of the purposes of the arrangement was to enable him to do this. The direct benefit to the defendant is plain. It follows that it was not necessary that the defendant's promise be in writing. See, also, Leslie v. Conway, 59 Cal. 442; Sacramento Lumber Co. v. Wagner, 67 Cal. 293, 7 Pac. 705; Doe v. Allen, 1 Cal. App. 560, 82 Pac. 568.

There are a number of other points discussed by counsel, but they are either answered or rendered unimportant by what has already been said.

Judgment reversed.

PEOPLE v. NAKIS. (Cr. 2285.)

1. Jury ⟸31(11)—Irregularity of appointment of "elisor" without showing of disqualification of officers may be waived.

Though the court, under Code Civ. Proc. § 226, has no power to appoint an elisor—a person designated and directed by a court to summon a jury when the persons designated by law for that duty are disqualified to act—unless both the sheriff and coroner are disqualified, irregularity of such an appointment, without showing of disqualification of coroner, and the consequent irregularity in summoning of jury, may be waived, even in a felony case; strict compliance with the statutory procedure not being part of the right to trial by jury, guaranteed by the Constitution, which may not be waived in a felony case.

2. Jury ⟸110(9)—Irregularity of appointment of elisor without showing coroner's disqualification waived.

Irregularity of appointment of an elisor without showing disqualification of coroner, and consequent irregularity in summoning of jury, was waived, there being no objection, but defendant's counsel announcing, "Defendant is perfectly satisfied with the appointment of —— as elisor."

3. Criminal law ⟸868—Irregularity of placing jury in charge of deputy of disqualified sheriff waived.

Irregularity of placing the jury on retiring in charge of a deputy sheriff, notwithstanding disqualification of the sheriff is waived by defendant failing to object.

4. Criminal law ⟸1163(1)—Placing jury in charge of deputy of disqualified sheriff held harmless.

Placing the jury on retiring in charge of a deputy sheriff, though the sheriff is disqualified, will be held harmless, in the absence of an affirmative showing of prejudice therefrom.

5. Criminal law ⟸404(3, 4)—Pistol and clothing found at time and near place of arrest admissible.

The pistol and clothes of defendant, stained with human blood, found at the time and near the place of defendant's arrest, though three weeks after the homicide, are admissible.

6. Criminal law ⟸369(15)—Evidence of other offense, showing defendant's possession of pistol before homicide, admissible.

As tending to show that defendant at the time of the homicide was in possession of the pistol found in his room and capable of discharging bullets of the two calibers found in deceased, testimony that it had before the killing been taken from witness in a robbery by defendant and others is admissible.

7. Criminal law ⟸369(2)—Evidence of other crime admissible to prove material fact.

Proof of one crime, tending to prove any fact material on trial for another crime, is admissible, though it may tend to prejudice the jury.

8. Witnesses ⟸396(1)—Witness may state reason for making statement contrary to his testimony.

For consideration of the jury on the question of credibility of witness whose testimony contradicts his signed statement made before the trial, he may testify that he was bribed by defendant's brother to make the statement.

9. Criminal law ⟸720(6)—Right of district attorney in argument to draw inferences from testimony stated.

A district attorney has the right in his argument to the jury to draw any inferences from the testimony which in his judgment are logical.

10. Criminal law ⟸729—Statement of district attorney as qualified on objection held harmless.

Statement of district attorney in argument that the judge "in his generosity" permitted a certain book of accounts to be introduced as qualified, on objection being made, held harmless.

11. Criminal law ⟸721½(1)—District attorney not to call attention to little testimony of defendant.

For district attorney in argument to call attention to how little testimony defendant gave is misconduct.

12. Criminal law ⟸1171(3)—Calling attention to little testimony of defendant held harmless.

For district attorney in argument to call attention to how little testimony defendant gave, he desisting on objection and the evidence against defendant being overwhelming, is not ground for reversal.

13. Criminal law ⟸1037(2)—No complaint on appeal of argument in absence of request for instruction to disregard.

Error in argument of district attorney may not be complained of on appeal, it being such that its effect would be obviated by instruction to disregard it, and no such instruction having been asked.

14. Criminal law ⟸783½—Direction to jury to disregard question held sufficient.

Direction to disregard any question asked and not permitted to be answered, given immediately after sustaining of objection to a question, held sufficiently definite that it should be disregarded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Ernest Nakis was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

Carl E. Lindsay and Henry Brickley, both of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., and C. E. Beaumont, Dist. Atty., and R. G. Retallick, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Fresno, for the People.

LENNON, J. The penalty of death was the sentence imposed upon the defendant in this case, in keeping with the verdict of a jury finding him guilty of murder in the first degree. Edwin Taylor, the deceased, was a familiar character about the streets of Fresno, commonly known as "the old broom man," who had accumulated considerable wealth and was reputed to be in the habit of secreting large sums of money about his person. On May 16, 1919, his body was found in a tractor shed on the Gibson ranch, a lonely place about 12 miles north of Fresno. About 8 o'clock, or some time between the hours of 8 and 10, on the morning of May 16, a number of witnesses saw deceased riding in the direction of this ranch, and clearly remembered the incident, for it was unusual to see the old broom man in an automobile. Several of these witnesses identified the defendant as the man who was driving the machine in which deceased was riding, and their descriptions of the automobile corresponded in important particulars with the description of a machine rented by defendant on May 15 and returned by him on the afternoon of the following day. Two men, one of whom was the owner of the orchard and the other his assistant, were working in an orchard at a point slightly over a quarter of a mile from the tractor shed on the Gibson ranch on the morning of May 16, and saw deceased and a companion pass by in a machine and stop at the ranch between 9 and 10 o'clock. These men, believing that deceased and the man with him had been sent out for the purpose of poisoning squirrels, watched them, from time to time, as they walked about the place, and finally observed the deceased starting toward the tractor shed, followed by the other man. Soon afterward they heard two shots and a low groan or howl, and thought a dog had been killed. About five minutes thereafter the companion of the deceased came out of the shed alone, closed the door, and returned in the machine in the direction from which he had come. Upon his return trip, this man passed within 20 feet of the witnesses, who had walked toward the road for the purpose of observing his features more closely; they testified that the man in the machine was the defendant. In the afternoon these witnesses drove over to the Gibson ranch and found the old broom man lying dead on the floor of the tractor shed, his pockets either torn open or turned inside out. They immediately notified the sheriff. No money was found on the body of deceased, but an empty canvas money bag was discovered near the body. Two bullets were taken from the body of deceased, one a .38 and the other a .41 caliber. At the time of defendant's arrest, which occurred about three weeks later, a pistol was found above a window casing in the room occupied by him at that time; it was a .41 Colts, which was, according to expert testimony, capable of discharging both .38 and .41 caliber bullets. In order to arrest defendant, it was necessary to pry open two doors of the cabin where he was living, the doors and windows being nailed shut, and defendant was found, wrapped in a quilt, hiding under the bed. Near the shack where defendant was arrested, there was discovered a bag containing a suit of clothes, identified as those of defendant, upon which were small stains, which were pronounced by an expert to be human blood stains. A witness testified that, on the afternoon of May 19 he met defendant at a water tank about 150 miles south of Fresno, and that at that time defendant stated to him that he had killed the old broom man and had tried to reach Mexico.

Defendant's case consisted primarily of an attempt to establish an alibi by the testimony of two witnesses, corroborated by defendant's own testimony, to the effect that he arrived at the tobacco ranch of a friend a mile or so south of Fresno between 9 and 10 o'clock on the morning of May 16, and remained there until 11:30. Defendant also sought to contradict the testimony as to the incident at the water tank on the afternoon of May 19 by the introduction of a book containing the entries of the dates upon which men had been employed at a tobacco ranch about 75 miles north of Fresno, and from which it appeared that on the afternoon of May 19 defendant had been employed at that ranch.

Upon this appeal from the judgment it is conceded by counsel for the defendant, as indeed it must be, that the evidence adduced in behalf of the people's case sufficiently supports the judgment. It is earnestly urged, however, that certain alleged erroneous rulings of the trial court, coupled with the claimed misconduct of the district attorney and an asserted irregularity in the summoning of the jury, were so grievously prejudicial in their operation and effect as to warrant and compel a reversal of the judgment, despite the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict.

Error is assigned in the appointment by the trial court of an elisor to summon two special venires of jurors. In this behalf the record shows positively and unqualifiedly that counsel for the defendant, in response to the suggestion of the trial court, conceded the disqualification of the sheriff of the county to act in the matter of summoning the needed jurors and the consequent necessity for the appointment of an elisor. The record further shows that counsel for the defendant expressly consented to the appointment of a Mr. Harkness as an elisor in the place and stead of the sheriff for the purpose of summoning the required jurors, and specifically declared:

"The defendant is perfectly satisfied with the appointment of Mr. Harkness as elisor."

This was done, so the record shows, in order to obviate any objection which might be made to the sheriff summoning the jury because of his conceded disqualification to act in the premises. Thereupon an order was made, directing the elisor to summon a special venire of 50 jurors, and, when that venire was exhausted, a second order was made also with the consent of counsel for the defendant, for a second special venire, and the same Mr. Harkness, again with the consent of counsel for the defendant, appointed as elisor to summon the additional jurors who were needed for the trial of the case. Despite the record showing of his consent to the course pursued by the trial court for the summoning of the jury, counsel for the defendant, be it said to his credit, insists that, because a human life is involved he is justified as a matter of professional duty and at the cost of self-stultification, in assailing the order of the trial court excluding the sheriff and appointing an elisor upon the ground that the defendant's right to have a jury summoned in the manner precisely prescribed by law was a right guaranteed by state and federal Constitutions, which could not be ignored by the trial court nor waived by either the defendant or his counsel.

[1, 2] An elisor may be defined to be a person designated and directed by a court to summon a jury when the persons designated by law for that duty are disqualified from acting. Code Civ. Proc. § 226; Bruner v. Superior Court, 92 Cal. 239, 28 Pac. 341. In the absence of the disqualification of both the sheriff and coroner, the court has no power to appoint an elisor. Wilson v. Roach, 4 Cal. 362; People v. Fellows, 122 Cal. 233, 54 Pac. 830; People v. Vasquez, 9 Cal. App. 545, 99 Pac. 982. Ordinarily, before appointing an elisor, the court should require a formal showing that both the sheriff and the coroner are disqualified (Bruner v. Superior Court, supra; People v. Irwin, 77 Cal. 494, 20 Pac. 56; People v. Yeaton, 75 Cal. 415, 17 Pac. 544), nevertheless it is the duty of the court to determine, of its own motion if need be, whether the sheriff and coroner are disqualified, and, if it be conceded that both are disqualified an elisor must be appointed (People v. Le Doux, 155 Cal. 535, 102 Pac. 517). Generally speaking the constitutional right to trial by jury cannot be waived by the defendant, or his counsel, in a felony case, but the manner and method of summoning a jury is the subject-matter of legislative control rather than of constitutional provision. That is to say, it is the province of the Legislature, subject to the proviso that the fundamental requirement of impartiality be not violated, to prescribe the procedure and designate the officer for the summoning of a jury. People v. Harding, 53 Mich. 48, 18 N. W. 555, 51 Am. Rep. 95; Lommen v. Minn., etc., Co., 65 Minn. 196, 68 N. W. 53, 33 L. R. A. 437, 60 Am. St. Rep. 450; Hildreth v. City of Troy, 101 N. Y. 234, 4 N. E. 559, 54 Am. Rep. 686; Mattox v. State, 115 Ga. 212, 41 S. E. 709. While the constitutional guaranty to a defendant in a criminal case of trial by jury of necessity embodies the right to have the jury summoned and selected in substantial compliance with the particular procedure provided by law (People v. Coffman, 24 Cal. 230; People v. Irwin, supra; People v. Compton, 132 Cal. 484, 64 Pac. 849), still such procedure, in its final analysis, confers no more than a statutory right, the benefit of which may be waived by the defendant or his counsel. And this is so because the procedure prescribed is not, in the absence of express constitutional or statutory inhibition, regarded as a jurisdictional restraint upon the power of the court to proceed, with the consent of the defendant, to a trial of the case pursuant to a procedure for the summoning of the jury which may not be in strict accord with the requirements of the statute. Queenan v. Territory, 11 Okl. 261, 71 Pac. 218, 61 L. R. A. 324; State v. Mortenson, 26 Utah, 312, 73 Pac. 562, 633; State v. Albee, 61 N. H. 423, 60 Am. Rep. 325; Perteet v. People, 70 Ill. 171; People v. White, 20 Cal. App. 156, 128 Pac. 417; Flynn v. State, 97 Wis. 44, 72 N. W. 373; Bishop's New Criminal Procedure, § 118. The disqualification of the sheriff in the instant case being conceded, the trial court should, in strictness, have selected the coroner in the place and stead of the sheriff to summon the needed jurors, but the right to insist upon the selection of the coroner rather than the appointment of an elisor was lost to the defendant when he knowingly consented, in the presence of an opportunity to object, to the summoning of the jury by an elisor. Watkins v. Weaver, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 107; Queenan v. Territory, supra. In other words, it was entirely competent for the defendant, directly or through his counsel, to waive an apparent irregularity in the matter of summoning the needed jurors, and this, we take it, the defendant did when his counsel announced:

The decision in the case of Bruner v. Superior Court, supra, has no application to the facts of the instant case. While the holding in that case was to the effect that the summoning and impaneling of a jury for the trial of a defendant were void, and the result of their deliberations of no effect, because the jury was summoned by an elisor who was not selected and appointed by the trial court in substantial conformity with statutory requirements, it will be noted that in that case there was no express waiver, as here, by the defendant of the right of the defendant, in the absence of a formal and sufficient showing of disqualification of the sheriff of the county, to have the jury selected by that officer, or the coroner, rather than by an elisor. Not only was there no express waiver by the defendant in the case last cited, but objection, timely objection, was made to the action of the trial court and steps, timely steps, taken to conserve the rights of the defendant. The case of People v. Enwright, 134 Cal. 527, 66 Pac. 726, also relied upon by the defendant here in support of the contention that the trial court was without jurisdiction to proceed to trial with a jury summoned by an elisor selected and appointed without a formal showing first made of the disqualification of the sheriff and coroner, is not in point, for, in so far as it relates to the question involved here, it does no more than decide that—

"The point that the special venire was placed in the hands of the coroner, rather than in those of the sheriff, without any showing why, cannot be raised on this record. No such fact was stated as the basis of the challenge."

In the case of People v. Schmitz, 7 Cal. App. 330, 94 Pac. 407, 419, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 717, the trial court "refused to hear the defendant as to the enmity and disqualification of the elisor Biggy," and in that case counsel for the defendant vigorously and steadfastly objected to the appointment of the elisor, and persistently protested against the refusal of the trial court to permit the defendant to file counter affidavits in opposition to the claimed disqualification of the sheriff and coroner. So, obviously, the situation in these and kindred cases, is clearly distinguishable from the situation revealed by the record in the case at bar.

[3, 4] Nor is the action of the trial court in placing the jury in charge of a deputy sheriff, when it retired to deliberate upon its verdict, a ground for the reversal of the judgment. While the deputy was, perhaps, technically disqualified by reason of the admitted disqualification of the sheriff from official participation in the proceedings (People v. Le Doux, supra), no objection to his appointment was raised at the trial, and, in fact, it was at one time suggested by counsel for defendant that the jury be placed in charge of the sheriff himself. The rule that by failing to call the court's attention thereto by timely objection at the trial, a defendant in a criminal case may waive his right to object to certain irregularities and errors not basal in their nature has frequently been applied to irregularities in matters concerning the custody and control of the jury. People v. White, supra; People v. Tarm Poi, 86 Cal. 225, 24 Pac. 998; Price v. U. S., 14 App. D. C. 391; Dreyer v. People, 188 Ill. 40, 58 N. E. 620, 59 N. E. 424, 58 L. R. A. 869; Id., 187 U. S. 71, 23 Sup. Ct. 28, 47 L. Ed. 79. Where a technical error is committed at the trial to which a defendant gives tacit consent, the right to object cannot be held in abeyance until defendant ascertains the nature of the verdict; but such right is waived upon the failure of the defendant to avail himself of it when the opportunity was fairly presented. People v. Kramer, 117 Cal. 647, 49 Pac. 842; Queenan v. Territory, 190 U. S. 548, 23 Sup. Ct. 762, 47 L. Ed. 1175; Sylvester v. State, 46 Fla. 166, 185, 35 South. 142. Moreover, in the instant case no attempt has been made to demonstrate that any prejudice has resulted from the error. In the absence of an affirmative showing of prejudice to the defendant, a reversal for irregularities in regard to the custody and management of the jury cannot be had. People v. White, supra; Jarnagin v. State, 18 Tenn. (10 Yerg.) 529; Speer v. State, 57 Tex. Cr. R. 297, 123 S. W. 415; Galan v. State, 68 Tex. Cr. R. 200, 150 S. W. 1171; Holmes v. State, 70 Tex. Cr. R. 214, 156 S. W. 1172. The error complained of in the case at bar is no more inherently prejudicial than those committed in the cases cited, and, there being neither an objection at the trial nor an affirmative showing of prejudice, it does not constitute ground for reversal.

[5-8] It was not error to admit in evidence the pistol and bag of clothing found at the time of defendant's arrest near the spot where he was taken into custody. The fact that a period of three weeks had elapsed between the date of the murder and the time of the arrest might affect the weight of this particular evidence, but would not render it incompetent. As was stated in the case of People v. Mar Gin Suie, 11 Cal App. 42, 50, 103 Pac. 951, 955:

"As a part of the original case of the people, we think the testimony with regard to the finding of the pistols was proper as furnishing a circumstance bearing upon the charge, whether directly or remotely, was for the jury to decide in view of all the other facts and circumstances." People v. Fitzgerald, 138 Cal. 39, 70 Pac. 1014; People v. Argentos, 156 Cal. 720, 726, 106 Pac. 65.

A Chinese witness testified to the effect that he had owned the pistol in question for over 30 years, and that it had been taken from him, about a month before the murder, at a time when he and other Chinese were robbed by a number of men, among whom was the defendant. The introduction of this testimony was objected to on the ground of irrelevancy, and also for the reason that it tended to prejudice the defendant by showing the commission of another crime. It having been proved that .38 and .41 caliber bullets were found in the body of the deceased, and that a pistol capable of discharging bullets of both calibers was found in the cabin where defendant was arrested, it became a relevant subject of inquiry whether defendant possessed that pistol at the time of the murder, and evidence which tended to prove such fact likewise became relevant. People v. Rogers, 71 Cal. 565, 12 Pac. 679. Whenever proof of one crime tends to prove any facts material in the trial of another, such proof is admissible, and the fact that it may tend to prejudice the defendant in the minds of the jurors by inducing the belief that he had been the perpetrator of another crime is no ground for its exclusion. People v. McGilver, 67 Cal. 55, 7 Pac. 49; People v. Rogers, supra; People v. Walters, 98 Cal. 138, 32 Pac. 864; People v. Ebanks, 117 Cal. 652, 49 Pac. 1049, 40 L. R. A. 269. The jury was carefully instructed as to the purpose for which this evidence was admitted, and directed not to consider it "for any other purpose whatsoever." One of the witnesses to the occurrences at the Gibson ranch signed a written statement prior to the trial, in which he declared that he could not swear that the man he saw leaving the ranch in the automobile was the defendant. At the trial the witness testified that this statement, which was not made under oath, but was signed in the office of one of the attorneys for defendant, was made by him as the result of a bribe received by him from the brother of defendant. These facts, of course, were merely for the consideration of the jury in determining the credibility of the witness. No attempt was made to impeach the companion of this witness, who testified to practically the same facts, in regard to the events at the ranch and the identity of the man in the machine, as those sworn to at the trial by the witness who had previously signed the contradictory statement.

[9-13] Turning to the comments of the district attorney during the course of his argument to the jury, claimed to have been so far afield as to constitute formidable misconduct on his part, the reference to defendant as "the known associate of prisoners in the jail" was not entirely without support in the evidence. The fact was brought out upon the examination and cross-examination of defendant, as well as by other witnesses for the defense, that, on the afternoon of the day of the murder, defendant went to the jail for the purpose of seeing a friend, who was then held as a prisoner, and that another of his associates had been in prison shortly before that time. A district attorney has the right, in his argument to the jury, to draw any inferences from the testimony which, in his judgment, are logical. People v. Vaughn, 25 Cal. App. 736, 147 Pac. 116, 117. The book of entries of employment introduced for the purpose of proving defendant's whereabouts on May 19, 1919, concerning which the district attorney stated that the judge, "in his generosity, permitted this to be introduced here," was a doubtful piece of evidence at best. The owner of the book, being himself incapable of reading or writing, caused the dates of employment to be entered by men in his employment, and he was himself unable to attest the correctness thereof; the man who made the particular entry was neither produced nor accounted for at the trial. The remark was therefore not wholly without justification. Moreover, upon defendant's counsel objecting to the remark, the district attorney immediately added the qualification, "because he [the trial judge] wanted to give every possible opportunity for the defendant to prove anything that might go to show his innocence, and that was correct." In view of this qualification, the statement could not have been prejudicial. People v. Raber, 168 Cal. 316, 143 Pac. 317. The comment of the district attorney during the course of his argument to the jury, by which he called attention to "how little testimony the defendant gave," was misconduct. People v. McGungill, 41 Cal. 429. If a district attorney persists in commenting upon the failure of defendant to testify, or if the evidence against defendant is not sufficiently strong to warrant a conviction notwithstanding remarks of that nature, the judgment may be reversed because of such misconduct (People v. Derwae, 155 Cal. 592, 102 Pac. 266); but, in view of the fact that, in the present case, the district attorney desisted from further comment along that line upon objection thereto, and in view of the additional fact that such a comment could not have operated as an inducement to the verdict in the presence of the overwhelming evidence against defendant, we do not consider it a ground for reversal in this case. Moreover, the record shows that counsel for defendant, after objecting to the remark, said: "Let the objection stand. I assign it as error. That is enough"—and refrained from requesting an instruction that the jury disregard the remark. Where the error is such that its effect would be obviated by an instruction to the jury to disregard it, and no such aid is invoked, the error cannot be complained of on appeal. People v. Shears, 133 Cal. 154, 159, 65 Pac. 295; People v. Babcock, 160 Cal. 537, 117 Pac. 549; People v. Wong Hing, 176 Cal. 699, 169 Pac. 357; People v. Warr, 22 Cal. App. 663, 136 Pac. 304; People v. Vaughn, supra. Inasmuch as the court was not once, during the course of the argument to the jury, requested to instruct the jury to disregard the improper statements of the district attorney, and such an admonition would doubtless have been sufficient to cure any effect the remarks might have produced, the claimed misconduct in argument cannot be considered on appeal.

[14] On direct examination defendant testified, as previously stated, that he visited a friend in the jail on the afternoon of May 16. Upon cross-examination, the district attorney asked if this friend, and another associate of defendant, "were both charged with the crime of robbery at the time." The court sustained an objection to this question and, in compliance with a request from defendant's counsel that the jury be instructed to disregard the question, directed the jury "not to pay any attention to the questions that are asked—any questions that are asked that are not permitted to be answered." While the ruling was possibly not as emphatic as might be desired under the circumstances, nevertheless, since it was given immediately following the sustaining of an objection, the reasons for which had been fully explained by counsel for defendant, it cannot be said that it was not sufficiently definite for the purpose of advising the jury that the question that had just been asked was to be disregarded by them.

After a careful review of the evidence adduced upon the whole case, we are of the opinion that the verdict found by the jury was not the result of prejudice and was uninfluenced by any of the errors or irregularities complained of. People v. Lawlor, 21 Cal. App. 63, 131 Pac. 63.

The judgment is affirmed.

SAN GABRIEL VALLEY COUNTRY CLUB v. CITY OF PASADENA. (L. A. 5485.)

Waters and water courses ⟸119(2)—Diversion of drainage through channel on plaintiff's land unlawful.

Diversion of drainage from a natural channel into a channel through plaintiff's land was unlawful.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by the San Gabriel Valley Country Club against the City of Pasadena. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hickcox & Crenshaw, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John Munger, City Atty., and R. S. Parker, both of Pasadena, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This case, in all its essential facts, is the same as San Gabriel Valley Country Club v. County of Los Angeles, 188 Pac. 554. It was there held that the plaintiff was entitled to neither injunction nor damages upon the facts presented, and such was the judgment of the trial court here. For a statement of the facts, and a discussion of the law applicable to them, it is necessary only to refer to that decision.

The only difference between that case and the one at bar lies in the fact that here there were either 75 or 107 acres of land, as the case may be, the drainage of which originally was, not into the wash or channel which passes on down to the plaintiff's land, but into another channel to the west or southwest. The diversion of this drainage from its natural channel into the channel through the plaintiff's land was of course unlawful. See Rudel v. County of Los Angeles, 118 Cal. 281, 50 Pac. 400. This fact, however, is wholly immaterial as far as the present case is concerned. The diversion was not one made by the defendant city, but by the inhabitants of the particular territory prior to its incorporation into the city, and more than eight years before the commencement of the present action. More important than this, however, is the fact that such diversion was not made or affected in the slightest degree by the storm drains on account of which exclusively this action is brought. Those drains operate only to carry what waters would, except for them, flow in the wash for which they are a substitute. If the plaintiff has any right to complain of the diversion of the drainage of the lands mentioned, the present action was not brought to enforce it, and the right is not here involved.

WHITMAN v. CITY OF SAN DIEGO et al. (L. A. 5145.)

1. Municipal corporations ⇐648—Intention to dedicate conclusively presumed from adverse user for five years.

Though there can be no dedication for a street without an intention, such intention is conclusively presumed from an adverse user by the public for 5 years, and a denial by the owner of an intention to dedicate cannot defeat the title acquired by the public by its hostile use.

2. Municipal corporations ⇐654—Evidence held to sustain finding of user as street for more than five years.

In an action to quiet title to land claimed by a city as a street, evidence held to sustain the trial court's finding that the land had been used by the public for travel for more than 5 years.

3. Judgment ⇐747(5)—Decree quieting title against claim of dedication does not preclude claim of right necessary to prescription.

That a decree had been previously entered, holding that there had been no dedication of a street across plaintiff's land and quieting title, does not estop the city, in defending an action to quiet title several years thereafter, from claiming that the user of the strip for street purposes after the decree was under claim of right, so that such user for 5 years would establish the street by prescription.

4. Municipal corporations ⇐648—Use of street must show owner it was hostile.

Use by the public may be sufficient to create a highway, but if such use alone is relied on, it must be of such character and under such circumstances as to indicate clearly to the owner of the property that the use was hostile and adverse.

5. Municipal corporations ⇐654—Evidence held insufficient to sustain finding use of street was hostile.

Evidence which showed merely the occasional driving of vehicles across an unimproved and uninclosed tract of land held insufficient to sustain a finding of the court that such use was hostile to the owner of the land, and not permissive.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by Blance M. Whitman against the City of San Diego and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Haines & Haines, of San Diego, for appellant.

Doolittle & Morrison, of San Diego, T. B. Cosgrove, City Atty., of Los Angeles, and M. R. Thorp, Deputy City Atty., of San Diego, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. This is an action to quiet title of plaintiff to certain property against certain liens for the improvement of Ohio street, and also to enjoin the issuance of bonds for such assessments made upon plaintiff's adjoining land for the improvement of said street. Both parties state that the question before this court is whether that portion of Ohio street running through the property of the plaintiff is or is not a public street. In 1888 a map was filed by the contestants of plaintiff's predecessor, whereon Ohio street was shown as now claimed by the city. The plaintiff's predecessor was not a party to the filing of this map, and, claiming that he was not bound thereby, secured a judgment against the city of San Diego and others interested, quieting title to the land included in such street, and canceling the map in question, March 15, 1895. On February 18, 1904, a map, showing plaintiff's land subdivided into lots and blocks and showing Ohio street running through it, was attached to a lis pendens in an action brought by the College Hill Land Association against the city of San Diego, and recorded in the office of the county recorder. From 1907 the city assessor and from 1908 the county assessor assessed the property of plaintiff according to this map by lot and block, and omitting that portion of her land covered by Ohio street. Plaintiff protested against this form of assessment without avail. Her agent, without her knowledge or authority, filed verified tax statements for the years 1910 and 1911, according to such subdivision. If there is any inference of dedication to be drawn from the fact that the land was thus assessed and the by the protest of the owner against such assessment, that inference is entirely overcome by the protest of the owner against such assessment. There is, then, in the record, no evidence of actual intention to dedicate this land, except such as arises as a matter of law from adverse user. The owner lived in the Philippine Islands from 1904 until 1907, and had no direct personal knowledge of the condition of the property, and thereafter only visited San Diego twice, for a few days each time. The trial court found that the public had acquired the street by adverse user for more than 5 years, and the judgment is based upon this finding. Plaintiff appeals and attacks the finding as not supported by the evidence. At all times up to the beginning of the street improvement proceedings the neighborhood was sparsely settled, and up to 4 or 5 years previous to the adoption of the resolution of intention there were only a few scattered houses in the neighborhood. There was, for a period of approximately 5 years before January, 1912, more or less travel upon Ohio street, and the question is whether or not this travel was of such a nature and for such a period as to justify the finding of the trial court that the public had acquired an easement by adverse possession. Travel along the street increased with the building up of the neighborhood; hence the least amount of travel during the prescriptive period was during 1907 and 1908. We will state those portions of the evidence relied upon by respondents to show such user. George A. d'Hemecourt, a civil engineer, testified that in the year 1899 he had surveyed the entire length of Ohio street and had placed stakes at every block and every intersection of the street; that there was then no travel along the street; that in 1904 he had placed reference points in the center of the street, so that people owning lots could "brush a road" through; that the brush was cut out about 1904 and 1905. Henry Ellers testified as follows:

"I know that there has been a street there ever since I have been there, because we can tell where the line was. We could drive straight north from University north."

He further testified:

That he bought a lot on Ohio street in 1906; that he had driven along Ohio street (across plaintiff's property) to Madison street many times before; that in 1907 he hauled a load of chickens up there for a man named Lilly, who lived at the corner of Adams and Ohio, and that he had driven there a good many times; that there were teams going along there. The street was not graded. There was a wagon road being used, and that road had continued to be used since that time. "In 1907 there was a wagon road, that is all. It was not graded. It was all up and down and over bumps. A few wagons were driven there. We could tell where the streets were. When I first drove it over at the time I got there there was not much teaming there, but the road was there, and it has been there ever since."

On cross-examination he testified:

That at the time he was there there was nothing done to the streets; that they were rough and ungraded. "The way I found the line of this so-called street when I drove up there to get Mr. Lilly's chickens and chicken coop [1907] was that there was Works up there. He lived two blocks north of that, and my house was supposed to front on Ohio street. That is the way we found the line. There was some marks. There was stakes up on Adams. I do not remember that there were any houses between El Cajon avenue and Monroe avenue (plaintiff's property is between these points) as it is now up there along this Ohio street. Works lives on Adams, two blocks, I thing, or three blocks west. As to the amount of travel 9 years ago (1906) there was not much doing there. Once in a while I seen a team pass up there. The teams were not confined to any particular route. You could not travel all over. You did not keep to the road where the street should be. The first improvement I saw made on Ohio street northward from El Cajon avenue was that it was graded in 1912. There were buildings, a lot of buildings built up all through there. When I got there there was hardly a house east of the Normal, but two or three. They commenced building about 1909."

Thomas L. Works lived in the neighborhood for 20 years, and testified:

That he could not definitely fix the beginning of travel there. As near as he could fix it it was 4 or 5 years prior to the grading of the street. That the travel took a zigzag course according to the formation of the ground. "That formation up there is awfully hilly, full of hummocks. I was over the tract oftener than once a month. One could travel over what is now Ohio street before Mr. Hyde graded it. There were hummocks and a few houses; naturally there was a way of getting through to them. You could not call it a defined street. There was not any way of getting through, except following around zigzag through these hills."

He stated that he did some grading on the street about a year and a half before Ohio street was graded, and that at that time his zigzag track would not carry one further afield than the line of an 80-foot street.

C. L. Hyde, a witness for the defendants, testified:

That he had been familiar with the physical condition of Ohio street from University avenue to Adams street from 1910; that the street was in a more or less rough condition, but was traveled right along; that there was a well-defined wagon road, which consisted of wagon tracks, excepting the south end, which is more of a level country; that probably two blocks of the south and north of and intersecting El Cajon avenue had been graded by the property holders; this would cover a part of plaintiff's property; that some hummocks had been cut down in the center of the street on plaintiff's property; that the balance of the road was passable; that he could not say whether there was anybody living on the plaintiff's tract or not; that there were some furrows plowed along the curb line. "In most places there might be more than the width of a wagon track. There were some hummocks or round knolls that would not be worn enough to give room enough to pass. Take it all through, there was plenty of room for two vehicles to pass side by side. The street was roughed out all the way through."

Frank Barber, of the city engineer's office of San Diego, testified that in 1909 he had set stakes at the street corners along Ohio street on both sides of the street; that at that time the brush had been cut off a portion of Ohio street 30 or 40 feet in width between El Cajon and Madison avenues; that there was a passable roadway along there; that a portion of the street had been closed and the hummocks cut off by a road grader, and the earth shoved into the center to make a roadway for travel. This was through plaintiff's property.

E. J. Walker, the superintendent of the respondent contracting company which did the work of grading and curbing Ohio street, testified that:

He had been familiar with the street about 2 years before the work was done; that at the time the work was done from Madison on down to Monroe, "although a little rougher than the first block south of Adams, still that road ran on down through there. The brush was all taken out of it. It continued on down that way until it got to Meade street. That is as near as I could tell you how I found the road. The brush had all been cleared away. We did not have to cut any brush at all. There was a well-defined roadway when I went there, and the public had been using it."

From this testimony, construed most favorably to the respondents, it appears that plaintiff's land, consisting of a little over six acres, is in the heart of a subdivision originally made in 1888; that all the streets in this subdivision were thus dedicated to public use, and by a formal ordinance, not hereinbefore referred to, accepted by the city; that all the streets in the tract became public streets, save only in that part of the tract which was set apart to the plaintiff's predecessor by a decree of partition; that in connection with the subdivision of this tract the street corners were indicated by surveyor's stakes; that plaintiff's tract of land completely blocked Ohio street and Monroe avenue. In 1906 there was a well-defined wagon road along Ohio street through plaintiff's property, zigzagging to avoid hummocks in the street, but confined to the street. This road was used constantly from that time forward by all who found occasion to do so, and during the entire 5 years previous to the beginning of the proceedings to improve the street this roadway had been clearly marked and constantly used. It is evident that the actual use of the street did not extend its full width through plaintiff's property. The road was "brushed out" the 30 or 40 feet in width in 1909, and to the full width by 1912. The wagon road zigzagged through the plaintiff's property, but was confined to the 80-foot strip claimed by the city as a street. The distance which Ohio street traverses the plaintiff's property was about 430 feet.

[1] The decree of 1895, quieting the title of plaintiff's predecessor to the land in question, is strongly relied upon by the appellant as fixing the rights of the parties and preventing the running of the statute of limitations. Appellant claims that "the record is bare of any testimony whatsoever tending to show that the plaintiff had the slightest knowledge that any one was traveling over her land at all, much less that any one was doing so under the adverse claim of a street, according to that duplicate map or otherwise;" that in default of such notice or of any acquiescence on her part to any claim of the city, no title could be gained by adverse user. Barnes v. Daveck, 7 Cal. App. 487, 94 Pac. 779. It is true that an actual intention to dedicate property is essential to such dedication. Smith v. San Luis Obispo, 95 Cal. 463, 30 Pac. 591. But the theory on which the prescriptive right of the public to the street is based is that from an adverse user of 5 years the intention of the owner to dedicate the property to such use is conclusively presumed, and the mere denial on the part of the owner of any intention to dedicate, or evidence which might otherwise satisfy the court that there was no such actual intention, cannot be considered in opposition to the title acquired by the public by its hostile use. Appellant places great emphasis upon the fact that the map filed with the lis pendens in 1904 in the office of the county recorder was not only unauthorized by her, but was improperly recorded. We attach no significance whatever to this map so far as the rights of the parties are concerned. Plaintiff was not in any manner bound by this map, and its existence on the records tends to explain, though not to justify, the assessment of the plaintiff's land by lot and block.

[2] From the foregoing evidence the court was justified in finding that there had been a public use for 5 years. But the question remains, Was such use adverse; that is, under a claim of right? It is clear from the evidence that the owner was never notified in any way of such a claim, and was relying, not only on her ownership of the land, but upon a decree of court, expressly deciding that the city had no rights therein. After plaintiff paid her taxes in the fall of 1907, she ascertained from her receipt that the land was assessed in accordance with the subdivision theretofore declared by the court to be unauthorized and not bringing in plaintiff. Her demand that the property be assessed as a whole was refused. If, however, we assume that this act of the assessor, who had no authority or control over the public streets, amounted to an adverse claim of right in the street, such claim was brought to her attention less than 5 years before the street improvement was completed, and consequently cannot aid us in considering the character of the use from January to July, 1907.

[3] Appellant claims that the judgment quieting the title of plaintiff or her predecessor against the city estopped the latter from making the claim of right to the street essential to the securing of title by adverse possession, citing Hintrager v. Smith, 89 Iowa, 270, 56 N. W. 456; Larum v. Wilmer, 35 Iowa, 244, 247, and that thereafter, in order to start the statute of limitations running, it was essential that actual notice be given to the owner of the intention to claim the property adversely (citing Root v. Woolworth, 150 U. S. 401, 414, 415, 14 Sup. Ct.

136, 37 L. Ed. 1123), and that prior to the giving of such notice any possession by the city would be held permissive only. The rule stated in Root v. Woolworth, supra, is cited as the law in 2 Corpus Juris, p. 163, § 299. It is also followed in the recent case of Midkiff v. Colton, 252 Fed. 420, 164 C. C. A. 344, and was followed in the earlier case of Dupont v. Charleston Bridge Co., 65 S. C. 537, 44 S. E. 86. The question does not seem to have been directly raised in or decided by this court. But the principle relied upon in Root v. Woolworth, supra, was that in the decree in a suit to remove a cloud from the title by which a conveyance was required to be made by the defendant to the plaintiff, the situation was substantially that between a grantor and grantee, and that the grantor, after the grant, was deemed to hold in subordination to the claim of his grantee. In numerous cases in this state involving the adverse possession by a grantor as against a grantee, it is nowhere held that actual notice of the adverse possession other than that derived from the possession itself was essential to start the statute of limitations running. In all of these cases it was assumed, and in some of them stated, that the rule was no different between a grantor and grantee and the grantor and a stranger. Franklin v. Dorland, 28 Cal. 175, 87 Am. Dec. 111; Dorland v. Magilton, 47 Cal. 485; Lord v. Sawyer, 57 Cal. 65; Garabaldi v. Shattuck, 70 Cal. 511, 11 Pac. 778; Barker v. Clark, 128 Cal. 181, 60 Pac. 677; Allen v. Allen, 159 Cal. 197, 113 Pac. 160; Hodgkins v. People's Water Co., 177 Cal. 730, 171 Pac. 945. For instance, in Allen v. Allen, supra, it is said:

"He [the grantor] stood in relation to his title, asserted by adverse possession, as would any other adverse claimant, and it was necessary for him to make full proof of all the conditions in order to constitute it."

The Supreme Court of Texas in Thomson v. Weisman, 98 Tex. 170, 82 S. W. 503, refused to follow Root v. Woolworth, supra, upon the ground that the matter had been determined to the contrary in Pendleton v. McMains, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 575, 75 S. W. 349. In the latter case it was said:

"There is no peculiar sacredness in a title to land obtained through a judgment that lifts it out of the scope and purview of statutes of limitation, and if the possession be adverse for 10 years, whether it be by the defendant in the judgment or any one else, it will perfect a title."

It is stated in Thomson v. Weisman, supra, that—

"This court has held a vendor, by executed conveyance, who remains in possession of the land, claiming it as his own, without notice other than possession, may acquire against his vendee a title by limitation."

In Hodgkins v. People's Water Co., supra, this court, in holding that the defendant in an ejectment suit could gain title by adverse possession against the plaintiff, although the judgment was in favor of the plaintiff, cited the case of Pendleton v. McMains, supra, as authority for the proposition that—

"Adverse possession of land for 10 years after the rendition of judgment in an ejectment suit where no writ of possession was issued, etablished a title against the plaintiff independent of and subsequent to the right of possession adjudicated in the ejectment suit."

[4] Use by the public alone may be sufficient to create a highway. Schwerdtle v. County of Placer, 108 Cal. 589, 594, 595, 41 Pac. 448. But such use, if use alone is relied upon to establish the right of the public, must be of such a character and under such circumstances as to indicate clearly to the owner, if advised thereof, or, if not, such as might be readily ascertained by the owner, so as to advise the owner, knowing the character of the use, that such use was hostile and adverse.

[5] The point at issue then resolves itself into this question: Was the use by that portion of the public that traveled across plaintiff's land during the first six months of 1907 of such a character as to advise the plaintiff, if she had known thereof, that such use was under a claim of right? We conclude from the evidence in the case that the trial court was not justified in holding that the use by the public was of such a nature as to give notice that the use was under a claim of right. The surrounding country was almost uninhabited. The use of the wagon road across plaintiff's land must necessarily have been very slight, although it was no doubt sufficient to be clearly indicated on the ground. The street was unimproved and almost impassable. The plaintiff's premises were uninclosed and unoccupied. As we said in San Diego v. Hall, 179 Pac. 889:

"* * * Something more than a mere casual user must be shown before any valid dedication will be implied. The rule upon this subject—a rule to the measure of which appellant's testimony fails to reach—was well expressed by Mr. Justice Sloss, speaking for the court in bank, in the case of F. A. Hihn Company v. City of Santa Cruz and Union Traction Company, 170 Cal. 436–447, 150 Pac. 62–68: 'In order to constitute a valid dedication, there must be an intention on the part of the owner to devote his property to the public use. California Navigation Co. v. Union Transportation Co., 126 Cal. 433, 46 L. R. A. 825, 58 Pac. 936; Niles v. Los Angeles, 125 Cal. 572, 58 Pac. 190. It is true that this intent may be inferred from long acquiescence in a use by the public. 13 Cyc. 455. But where land is uninclosed and uncultivated, the fact that the public has been in the habit of going upon the land will ordinarily be attributed to a license on the part of the owner, rather than to his intent to dedicate. 13 Cyc. 484.'"

It is conceded that, if none of that portion of Ohio street extending through plaintiff's premises is a public street, the assessment upon plaintiff's property is invalid, and that the judgment should be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

SECURITY TRUST & SAVINGS BANK v. FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. OF MARYLAND et al. (L. A. 5002.)

1. Pleading ⊂=422 — Objection for want of verification waived by proceeding to trial.

Where parties proceed to trial on an unverified petition or answer without objection thereto, they are held thereby to waive their right to object to the want of verification.

2. Guardian and ward ⊂=17—Failure to verify petition no ground for collateral attack on order of appointment.

Where, after filing of petition for appointment as guardian, notice was given and hearing regularly held, the defect in pleading that the petition for appointment was unverified was waived, and, no want of jurisdiction being disclosed on the face of the record, the order of appointment cannot be collaterally attacked.

3. Guardian and ward ⊂=33—Money paid to guardian on mortgage held payment to ward, satisfying mortgage released.

Where an owner borrowed $11,000 on her property from plaintiff's assignor, which was $8,800 in excess of the amount called for by a mortgage, which she had previously executed to her ward, having released the ward's mortgage in order to obtain the $11,000 loan, a direct connection is traceable between the money secured by plaintiff's loan and the release of the ward's mortgage, and equity regards the money, to the extent of $2,200, as paid to the use and benefit of the ward, and if the money is applied by the guardian for other uses, such misappropriation amounts to embezzlement, for which the person who paid the money to the guardian cannot be held accountable, under Code, § 2244, and the ward must look to the guardianship bond.

4. Mortgages ⊂=121—Mortgagee may not enforce mortgage for more than amount, though liable as surety for mortgagor.

Where a recorded mortgage and loan secured thereby were for the specified sum of $2,200, the owner could not in any event become entitled to enforce the mortgage for a greater sum than the $2,200, with interest, regardless of the amount paid by it under its obligation as surety for the mortgagor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by the Security Trust & Savings Bank against the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. W. Sargent, W. G. Cooke, and S. W. Odell, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

S. E. Vermilyea and S. L. Carpenter, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. The appeal from the judgment in favor of the defendant in this action to quiet title to real property, situate in the city of Los Angeles, involves a determination of the legal effect of several and various transactions appertaining to the execution, satisfaction, and release of certain mortgages upon the property in suit. The facts of the case are practically undisputed, and, as revealed by the pleadings, proof, and findings, are these:

Johanna Agnes Keffel, the owner of the property in suit, through whom both plaintiff and defendant derive their respective claims of interest in said property, being in ill health and believing her death to be not far off, transferred the said property by deed dated and delivered March 2, 1906, to her son, Max Keffel, without receiving any valuable consideration therefor, and the legal title thereto remained in the latter until December 3, 1909. At the time of this conveyance, Johanna Agnes Keffel was acting as the guardian of an incompetent son, and the defendant, Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, was surety on her guardianship bond in the sum of $6,000. A portion of the funds of the incompetent which came into the possession of the guardian were misappropriated by her and applied to the "purchase or betterment" of the real property conveyed, as above set forth, to the son Max Keffel. At the request of defendant, and for the purpose of securing the restoration to the incompetent of the moneys so misappropriated from his estate, Johanna Agnes Keffel caused her son, Max Keffel, to make a promissory note in the sum of $2,200, and to execute, as security therefor, a mortgage upon the property conveyed to him as aforesaid, both bearing date December 2, 1909. The note was payable to Johanna Agnes Keffel; the mortgage ran to said Johanna Agnes Keffel, as guardian. On December 3, 1909, Max Keffel and his wife reconveyed the property to the grantor, Johanna Agnes Keffel, without consideration. Some time after the reconveyance Johanna Agnes Keffel executed a mortgage, dated April 26, 1911, upon the same property to Mrs. M. J. Turner, to secure the repayment of $11,000, borrowed from Mrs. Turner at that time by Johanna Agnes Keffel. This latter transaction was conducted by means of an escrow, approximately $9,000 of the $11,000 being used to pay off two mortgages which had been executed and recorded prior to the execution of the $2,200 mortgage by Max Keffel. May 10, 1911, after these two prior mortgages, together with certain tax liens, had been satisfied and released, and the expenses incident to the escrow had been paid, the escrow was closed, and the balance of the $11,000, namely $1,046.96, was paid over to Johanna Agnes Keffel. Shortly before the closing of the escrow, to wit, May 6, 1911, Johanna Agnes Keffel, as guardian, released of record the $2,200 mortgage, which had been recorded at the request of an agent of defendant March 13, 1911. Neither the acceptance of this mortgage by the guardian nor its release by her was authorized by order of court, and no part of the sum secured thereby was ever returned to the ward's estate.

Johanna Agnes Keffel died intestate in October, 1911, leaving no estate, other than the aforesaid real property and $15 in money. On February 21, 1914, Frank N. Goodman, who subsequently qualified as guardian of the incompetent son, instituted an action on the guardianship bond against the administrator of the estate of Johanna Agnes Keffel, deceased, and Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, defendant herein, as surety, for the recovery of the money misappropriated from the ward's estate. Judgment was rendered in favor of the ward for the sum of $3,645.40, with interest. It appearing, upon petition of the guardian, that an appeal was about to be prosecuted from that judgment, the court authorized and empowered the guardian to compromise the claim arising from said judgment by accepting from defendant Fidelity & Deposit Company the sum of $2,500 in complete satisfaction of said judgment, and, on receipt of this sum, to make an assignment in writing to defendant, Fidelity & Deposit Company, of all interest of the ward and his guardian in the $2,200 mortgage executed to Johanna Agnes Keffel as guardian. This assignment was duly executed July 16, 1914, and the mortgage constitutes the basis of defendant's claim of an interest in the property in suit. Plaintiff held the $11,000 Turner mortgage by assignment, and, having obtained a decree of foreclosure upon said mortgage December 5, 1914, purchased the property at a sale held in pursuance of the decree. Whether or not the mortgage assigned to defendant can be asserted as a valid, subsisting, and superior lien upon the property in suit is the problem propounded for solution.

The conclusions of law of the trial court were: (1) That the $2,200 mortgage was a valid lien on the premises, created for the protection of the incompetent and to secure the restoration to his estate of the moneys misappropriated by the guardian; (2) the marginal release of this mortgage was inoperative and void; (3) the estate and title of plaintiff in the said premises is inferior and subject to this prior subsisting mortgage; (4) defendant, by right of subrogation and legal assignment, is the owner of the $2,200 mortgage and entitled to enforce the same against the premises to the extent of the amount paid by it in satisfaction of the judgment in favor of the incompetent.

[1, 2] It appears from the record of the guardianship proceedings, which was introduced in evidence, that the petition for appointment, upon which the superior court made the order appointing Johanna Agnes Keffel guardian of her incompetent son, was unverified. The failure to verify the petition of appointment in accordance with the requirements of section 1763 of the Code of Civil Procedure amounted to no more than a defect in pleading and the verification was not a jurisdictional requirement for the making of the appointment. Where parties proceed to trial upon an unverified petition or answer without objection thereto, they are held, by so doing, to waive their right to object to the want of verification. People v. Reis, 76 Cal. 269, 275, 18 Pac. 309; Hill v. Nerle, 29 Cal. App. 473, 156 Pac. 981. It appears that, after the filing of the petition for appointment as guardian, notice was duly given and a hearing was regularly held, and the defect in pleading was therefore waived, and, no want of jurisdiction being disclosed on the face of the record, the order of appointment cannot be collaterally attacked. Isaacs v. Jones, 121 Cal. 257, 261, 53 Pac. 793, 1101; In re Lundberg, 143 Cal. 402, 77 Pac. 156. For the purposes of this case, Johanna Agnes Keffel must be considered the duly appointed guardian of her incompetent son and subject to the rules governing such a guardian.

The facts of the case are substantially the same as those in the case of Cummings v. Strobridge Land Syndicate, 150 Cal. 209, 88 Pac. 901, 119 Am. St. Rep. 189. There the guardian had embezzled $2,000 of the ward's money and executed a mortgage upon his own land in favor of the ward, by way of securing the deficit. Subsequently the guardian borrowed $2,000 from a third person, and, without authority from the court, released of record the mortgage previously executed by him to his ward. There was no agreement that the guardian was to apply the money received from the new mortgagee to the extinguishment of the ward's mortgage; he stated, however, that he would see that the ward's mortgage did not affect the lien of the new mortgage, and it was the understanding between the parties that the lien of the new mortgage should be a first lien upon the property. It was held that, inasmuch as the money was paid by the subsequent mortgagee to the guardian upon the release of the mortgage, such payment would be deemed a complete satisfaction of the mortgage, although the money was never, in fact, received by the ward. In that case the court said:

"But, aside from this and other like questions with which the case abounds, one proposition is determinative of the matter, and upon it this decision may rest. Assuming or conceding that the note and mortgage as given to the ward were valid, so as to incumber the land; assuming, also, and conceding that the release of this mortgage was without authority of the court; conceding, also, that the witness Sayle [the guardian] does endeavor * * * to have it appear that he did not pay over to his ward the money which he received from the Baird mortgage—the fact remains that equity itself, under such circumstances as those here disclosed, makes such payment in pursuance of its maxim that it will regard as done that which ought to have been done. When the money for the release of this mortgage came into Sayle's hands, it was, in equity, the ward's money, and any improper use which Sayle thereafter made of it was but a second embezzlement of the ward's funds."

[3] The facts of the present case bring it within the rule of equity thus enunciated. The owner of the property borrowed $11,000 upon her property from plaintiff's assignor, which was $8,800 in excess of the amount called for by a mortgage which she had previously executed to her ward. In order to obtain this $11,000 she released the ward's mortgage, and therefore there is traceable a direct connection between the payment of the money secured by plaintiff's mortgage and the release of the ward's mortgage. As a result equity regards the money, to the extent of $2,200, as paid to the use and for the benefit of the ward. If the money is applied by the guardian to other uses, such misappropriation amounts to an embezzlement on the part of the guardian, for which the person who pays the money to the guardian cannot be held accountable (Civ. Code, § 2244), and in such a case the ward must look to the guardianship bond for reimbursement.

It is true that there were mortgages upon the property prior in time of execution to the ward's mortgage, which, together with the taxes and other items, amounted to nearly $10,000, and that therefore the $11,000 advanced by plaintiff's assignor was insufficient to pay both the ward's mortgage and these additional charges. But there is no proof that the release of the ward's mortgage was executed after the payment of the other liens. The escrow was begun April 24, the ward's mortgage was released May 6, and an escrow statement was rendered May 10, from which it appeared that the liens prior to the ward's mortgage and certain expenses had been paid by that date, leaving a balance of $1,046. From all that appears, the ward's mortgage was released prior to the other payments, and the money which was the consideration for that release was later misappropriated to the payment of the other charges. But, however that may be, there was no contract or agreement which prohibited the guardian from putting in escrow money in addition to that derived from the new mortgagee, so as to render the sum sufficient for the extinguishment of all existing liens and charges. In fact, it was the duty of the guardian to do this, in view of the understanding between the parties that plaintiff's assignor was to be given a new first mortgage upon the property in consideration of the $11,000 loan, and the lender had the right to assume that this was done. The lender was not required to go back of the record of the release and see that the money called for by the mortgage was actually applied to the deed of the ward; all that she was obliged to do under the circumstances was to see that there was placed in the hands of or to the credit of the guardian the amount of the ward's mortgage and, having done so, the receipt of the guardian, as such, was a sufficient acknowledgment of the appropriation of that amount to the use of the ward's estate, and thereupon the satisfaction of the mortgage became operative.

The cases relied upon by respondent in support of the point that the release of the mortgage to the ward was void differ from the present case in important particulars. In Aldrich v. Willis, 55 Cal. 81, the party executing the release was not the guardian, and consequently was wholly unauthorized to represent the minor. In Jennings v. Jennings, 104 Cal. 150, 37 Pac. 794, inasmuch as the ward's mortgage was released several months prior to the execution of the new mortgage, and the loan by the subsequent mortgagee was made to the mortgagor and a third party upon their joint promissory note, there is no indication of any relation between such payment and the release of the mortgage to the ward. The mortgage, as appears from the syllabus of that case, was released without any payment whatever. In Martin v. De Ornelas, 139 Cal. 41, 72 Pac. 440, it was, in effect, agreed between the person advancing the money and the guardian that the debt to the ward was not to be paid, but was to be secured by a new mortgage on different property, which was to be substituted for the released mortgage, and, of course, the ward was not bound by this unauthorized change of security, but could elect between the two mortgages.

The view we take of the validity of the release of the $2,200 mortgage renders unnecessary any consideration of plaintiff's various contentions with regard to its right to subrogation and the legal effectiveness of the ward's mortgage and the assignment thereof to defendant. Likewise it is unnecessary to discuss plaintiff's assignments of error in the admission of evidence.

[4] The judgment of the trial court decreed:

"That defendant Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland is the owner of said mortgage and entitled to enforce the same against said premises for the sum of $2,500 and interest thereon from the 16th day of July, 1914; and * * * that the estate and title of the plaintiff in and to the said premises is subject to the lien of said mortgage to the amount of said sum of $2,500 and interest."

The recorded mortgage and the note secured thereby were for the specific sum of $2,200, and defendant could not, in any event, become entitled to enforce the mortgage for a greater sum than $2,200, with interest, regardless of the amount paid by it under its obligation as surety, and the judgment was therefore erroneous in this additional particular.

Since defendant's mortgage does not constitute a valid and subsisting lien upon the premises, the judgment in favor of defendant must be reversed.

E. CLEMENS HORST CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 9319.)

1. Master and servant ⊂=352 — Employer's "serious misconduct" within Compensation Act defined.

"Serious misconduct" of an employer within Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6b, authorizing increased compensation, means conduct which the employer either knew or should have known to be conduct likely to jeopardize the safety of his employés.

2. Master and servant ⊂=352 — Employer's "willful misconduct" within Compensation Act defined.

An employer's serious misconduct, causing injury to his employé and justifying the award of increased compensation under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6b, is "willful," particularly with reference to the requirement of knowledge to the employer, though the evidence does not show positively that the employer was notified of the unsafe condition, if it appears from the circumstances that the acts of omission or commission evinced a disregard for the safety of others and willingness to inflict the injury complained of, as a failure to guard shafting, in directing violation of a general safety order of the Industrial Accident Commission.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Willful.]

3. Master and servant ⊂=352—Employer's "officer" chargeable with misconduct within Compensation Act defined.

Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6b, authorizing increased compensation where the employé is injured by reason of serious and willful misconduct on the part of an executive or managing "officer" of a corporation, by "officer" means a person in the corporation's employ, either elected or appointed, invested with the general conduct and control in a particular place of the business, the word not being used in its technical, legal sense as one elected or whose office is provided for by articles of incorporation or by-laws.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Officer.]

4. Master and servant ⊂=405(1) — Evidence held to show accidental injury by "serious and willful misconduct of executive or managing officer," within Compensation Act.

Evidence held to sustain the Industrial Commission's finding that the accidental injury to an employé caught in a revolving shaft was the result of the "serious and willful misconduct of an executive or managing officer" of the corporate employer, justifying increased compensation under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6b.

5. Constitutional law ⊂=48—Presumptions to be indulged in favor of validity of act.

All presumptions are to be indulged in favor of the validity of an act of the Legislature.

6. Master and servant ⊂=347 — Workmen's Compensation Act provision for additional allowance for willful misconduct of employer held constitutional.

Const. art. 20, § 21, empowering the Legislature to create a liability on the part of employers to compensate employés for injuries received irrespective of the fault of either party, authorized the enactment of Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6b, providing for compensation, increased by one-half in case the injuries were caused by willful and serious misconduct of the employer.

Application for certiorari by the E. Clemens Horst Company, a corporation, the employer, to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California, awarding compensation for injuries to Mrs. La Verne Hamilton, the employé. Award affirmed.

Rehearing denied in bank; ANGELLOTTI, C. J., dissenting.

Edward C. Harrison and Maurice E. Harrison, both of San Francisco (Arthur W. Bolton, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This cause is before us on a writ of certiorari issued upon the application of petitioner, E. Clemens Horst Company, a corporation, to review an award made on October 24, 1919, by the respondent Industrial Accident Commission in favor of respondent Mrs. La Verne Hamilton as compensation for injuries sustained by her on June 7, 1919, while in petitioner's employ. The sum of $8.89, payable weekly in advance, was awarded to her against the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, petitioner's insurance carrier, as "a temporary total disability indemnity," and one-half of that sum, $4.45, also payable weekly in advance, was awarded her against petitioner as additional compensation by reason of the fact, as found by the commission, that her injuries were occasioned by petitioner's "serious and willful misconduct."

The said insurance carrier is not a party to this proceeding, and the only question presented is as to the validity of the award of additional compensation against the petitioner. The latter's contentions are: (1) That section 6(b) of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 834) is unconstitutional; and (2) "that even if this section were valid, there is no evidence of 'serious and willful misconduct * * * on the part of an executive or managing officer' of the petitioner corporation, and that therefore the commission was without jurisdiction to make the award."

At the date of the accident Mrs. Hamilton was employed in petitioner's vegetable drying plant near Wheatland, Yuba county, which had been built about three months before. E. Clemens Horst was petitioner's president and general manager. George E. Miller was general superintendent of petitioner's ranches. It appears that he was not a director or stockholder of petitioner. T. L. Conrad was superintendent of the plant at Wheatland, and was neither a director nor a stockholder of petitioner. When Mrs. Hamilton was injured she was working on a small platform raised about two feet from the floor of the plant. It was her duty to watch a conveyor belt which passed in front of her, and upon which potatoes were being carried from a peeling machine to a "slicer" about two feet to her left, and to pick out and pare those potatoes which had not been properly treated by the peeling machine. Directly over, and parallel to the conveyor belt, and about 5½ feet above the platform on which she was standing, was a rapidly revolving shaft which operated the various machines in the plant. This shaft was protected by a board on the side nearest the employé, but was unprotected below. The accident occurred under these circumstances: About 8 p. m. the mouth of the "slicer" at Mrs. Hamilton's left became clogged. Leaning over the belt and under the shaft, she reached out to clear the potatoes away from the "slicer." In this position her hair was caught by the shaft and pulled from her head, so that she was completely scalped. It is admitted by petitioner that "the accident happened in the course of her employment, and no question is made of her right to recover compensation."

1. We shall first consider petitioner's claim that the finding that the injury was caused by the employer's serious and willful misconduct is not supported by the evidence. Section 6(b) of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Stats. 1917, p. 834; Deering's General Laws, Consol. Supp. 1917–1919, Act 2143c, p. 1392), as it stood at the time of the accident, read in part:

"Where the employé is injured by reason of * * * serious and willful misconduct * * * on the part of an executive or managing officer [of a corporation], the amount of compensation otherwise recoverable for injury or death, as hereinafter provided, shall be increased one-half: * * * Provided, however, that said increase of award shall in no event exceed twenty-five hundred dollars."

The commission has found on this point:

"(8) That at the time of said injury, the employer was a corporation. That the employer by its executive and managing officers constructed said plant and placed therein the transmission shafting upon which applicant was injured, parallel to and directly over the belt upon which applicant worked, at a height on a level with her eyes and without any guard or protection on the under side thereof. That applicant's work required her to bend forward with her head beneath said shafting, and it was necessary for her to stoop to do so. That her hair was thereby brought into close proximity to the unguarded portion of said shafting, which was at all times revolving rapidly. That said shafting was at all times herein mentioned maintained in said condition by said employer through its executive and managing officers and by said Miller and Conrad. That said construction and maintenance were, and each of them was, a direct and open violation of the provisions of sections 33, 34, 35, and 36 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act of 1917. That the duty owed by said employer and its executive and managing officers to employés, under the said provisions, cannot be delegated by them, or any of them so as to free them, or any of them, from responsibility for the violation of said duty, and under the ruling in the case of Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland v. Industrial Accident Commission, 171 Cal. 728, 154 Pac. 834, L. R. A. 1916D, 903, constituted serious and willful misconduct on the part of said employer. That said serious and willful misconduct was the proximate cause of said injury.

"That said construction and maintenance were further in violation of General Safety Order No. 6(a) of the Industrial Accident Commission, then in full force and effect, which provides that: '* * * All transmission shafting, either horizontal or vertical, in workrooms * * * and located within seven feet of the floor or platform, must be guarded.'

"That said violation of said safety order constituted serious and willful misconduct on the part of the executive and managing officers of said corporation, and of said corporation, and was the proximate cause of said injury.

"That therefore applicant is entitled to have her compensation for said injury increased one-half under section 6(b) of said act, said increase to be paid by said employer, and not by said insurance carrier."

The question, then, is: Does the evidence sustain this finding?

Mrs. Hamilton testified that she had been engaged in this particular work for ten days prior to the accident; that on the day in question two foremen had told her "to watch to see that it [the belt] didn't stop up at the end," where it dumped the potatoes into the "slicer"; that she could not reach that end of the belt without stooping under the shaft; that when she commenced to work at this plant she had been told "the general nature of the work, but not just what I was to do"; that she had not seen any signs on the premises warning employés against approaching the machinery; and that she had not "tried to take potatoes out of the slicer" except on the occasion when she was injured.

Mrs. Daisy Cope testified that she had been working on the same belt as Mrs. Hamilton; that the revolving shaft which caused the latter's injuries was "right over the belt" on a level with her eyes; that no one had called her attention to any danger signs in the plant, and that she had seen none; that prior to the accident she herself had felt the suction from the revolving shaft tugging at her hair, but had not spoken about it to her fellow employés; that she had not been warned "to look out for the shaft"; that "the shaft is right over the belt, and if you are not careful you would raise up under it"; that the board protecting the shaft on the side nearest her was "right even" with her head; that there was sufficient distance between the shaft and the belt at the point where the witness worked so that her hair would not become entangled in the shaft unless she leaned over the belt, but that the belt ran "upward" as it approached Mrs. Hamilton's position, "and it was closer to the shaft there than it was where I was."

Mrs. A. M. Parker stated that at the time the applicant was injured she was "forelady, overseeing the work"; that she had not instructed Mrs. Hamilton "to be careful or about the machinery in any way"; that she did not remember seeing any warning signs in the plant; that the "slicer" frequently became clogged; that she did not know whose duty it was to clear the machine in such cases, but that the "day boss" had told Mrs. Hamilton to do so; that in order to do so she would have to lean over the belt so that her head "came right under the shaft"; that within a few days after this accident the shaft was boxed in; that she (the witness) had a pole which she often used to clear potatoes from the "slicer," but that this was not generally known among the employés, and that "the most of the time I used it was after she got hurt"; and that the pole was not located so that Mrs. Hamilton could use it. When recalled by petitioner, she admitted that no instructions had been given to any one except to the applicant to clear the "slicer," and stated that she herself had not been told to do it until after Mrs. Hamilton was injured, but that during the 10 days prior to the accident she frequently used the pole to keep the mouth of the machine clear.

Mrs. Marion Sherman, who was working about 5 feet from Mrs. Hamilton when the latter was hurt, testified that she had not been instructed as to whose duty it was to keep the "slicer" clear, but that "any one who was working on that end of the belt, right there, they was to keep the potatoes moving"; that she, too, had noticed the effect of the shaft on her hair when she stood erect; that the shaft was about 2½ feet above the belt; and that any one working in front of the belt would naturally stoop under the shaft in order to reach the mouth of the "slicer."

T. L. Conrad testifying for petitioner, stated that he was "fairly familiar" with conditions at the plant; that the distance between the shaft and the platform on which Mrs. Hamilton was working was about 5½ feet; that after the accident the shafting was boxed in at his direction; that one Boyd was the night foreman at the plant under him; that the "slicer" occasionally became clogged; that it was Mrs. Parker's duty to keep it clear, and not the duty of an employé stationed where Mrs. Hamilton was; that he did not know whether or not his foremen, who were "supposed to instruct these employés when they went to work about their duties," had given these or other instructions; that "we had signs up in regard to the safety of the machinery"; that, so far as he knew, Horst himself had no knowledge of the dangerous position of the shaft; that surface of the shafting was smooth; that he had never seen "any woman working in the same position Mrs. Hamilton was cleaning the slicer"; that "she had no business there," clearing the mouth of the machine; and that a woman working "below" Mrs. Hamilton on another belt had been instructed by him and by the foreman to keep the "slicer" from becoming clogged. On cross-examination he stated that prior to the accident he had frequently noticed the position of the shaft; that he had been on the platform where Mrs. Hamilton worked, and had seen that the shaft was "open underneath and on the back," although there were two boards "in front"; that he had never called the attention of Horst or Miller to the position of the shaft; that he had never told any other foreman "to cover it up or box it in"; that he thought Horst was in the East, and had not been in the plant before the accident; and that he himself had considered the plant "as ready to run and absolutely safe."

George E. Miller, also a witness for petitioner, testified that he had inspected the Wheatland plant "simply in a general way by going through it and seeing it in operation. The instruction to the builders at the time it was built was to house in everything they considered dangerous. * * * I know that we didn't consider it was necessary to inclose shafts where the shaft was over the belt, so that one would have no business to be in there. Of course, there are dangerous places in any plant or any machine when you get in that dangerous position, but we didn't consider it was necessary to put boards underneath the shaft where the shaft was back of or over the conveyor." He further testified that the plant had not been built from plans or specifications, but from general instructions; that he had never made a special survey of the plant; that he frequently visited the various ranches under his supervision, and "had them make changes wherever I thought they were necessary"; that he had seen the revolving shaft, but had not noticed there was no guard underneath it; and that "the handling of the plant and operation of it" was left to Conrad.

Horst testified that he had given Miller instructions "to look out for the safety" of the employés; that no report had been made to him as to any dangerous conditions in this plant; that he knew practically nothing of the exact condition of the works other than as he was advised by Miller and Conrad; that prior to the injury his attention had not been called to this shafting, although on many occasions he had been through the plant "in a casual way"; and that his custom was to give Miller "general instructions," and "leave it up to his judgment to see that the work is carried out." As to Miller's powers as superintendent he stated "he has got no authority except what authority I gave him."

Miss Viva Jessup, who worked next to Mrs. Hamilton, stated that she had not known of any instructions being given to any one as to the cleaning of the "slicer"; that she did not remember seeing any "safety signs" in the building; and that she had never heard any one say that the shaft was in a dangerous position.

Subdivision (2) (a) of section 1 of the English Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906 (St. 6 Edw. VII, c. 58) provided that if the injury to an employé "is attributable to the serious and willful misconduct of that workman, any compensation * * * shall, unless the injury results in death or serious and permanent disablement, be disallowed." In discussing what is meant by "serious and willful misconduct," Beven, in his Workmen's Compensation, page 394, considers separately the terms "serious" and "willful," and we think our consideration of the evidence may properly be thus divided.

[1] The first question presented is, then, Was the commission justified in finding that the petitioner was guilty of "serious misconduct"? There is no statutory definition of this term. In this connection we may again quote from Beven, page 401:

"To constitute 'serious misconduct,' it is probable that the Legislature intended to signify conduct that an average workman in being guilty of either would know, or ought to know, if he turned his mind to consider the matter, to be conduct likely to jeopardize his own and his fellow workman's safety."

In our opinion the serious misconduct of an employer under our statute may be similarly defined. There should be no difference in principle between the degree of care required of an employer and that exacted from an employé. "Serious misconduct" of an employer must therefore be taken to mean conduct which the employer either knew, or ought to have known, if he had turned his mind to the matter, to be conduct likely to jeopardize the safety of his employés. It seems clear that, according to this test, the commission was amply warranted in finding that the maintenance of the improperly protected shafting, immediately over, and in close proximity to, the conveyor belt, was such serious misconduct. Mrs. Hamilton's testimony that she had been instructed to keep the belt and the "slicer" clear is uncontroverted, and it plainly appears from the testimony of the other employés that in order to do so it was natural that she should lean over the belt, thereby bringing her head in dangerous proximity to the revolving shaft. Mrs. Sherman testified that it was the custom in the plant for the employé who worked in Mrs. Hamilton's position to "keep the potatoes moving," and she and Mrs. Cope stated that they had frequently felt the suction of the revolving shaft tugging at their hair. From the evidence which we have summarized we cannot hold that the commission was not justified in finding that the place at which the employé was required to work was unsafe. Under the evidence the finding of serious misconduct implies that the conditions of the employment were patently unsafe. If this be true, we know of no rule under which petitioner may claim that, passing for the time being the question of the penalty, it is not primarily liable for resulting injuries. It is so well settled as to require no citation of authority that petitioner was charged with the duty of maintaining a safe place for its employés to work, and we do not think it can be said the evidence is insufficient to establish serious misconduct, in that petitioner's officers knew, or ought to have known, if they had turned their minds to consider the matter, of the conditions under which Mrs. Hamilton was required to work.

[2] Next, as to whether such serious misconduct was "willful." It has frequently been said that willful misconduct involves the knowledge of the person that the thing which he is doing is wrong. Lewis v. G. W. Ry. Co., L. R. 3 Q. B. D. 195; In re Burns, 218 Mass. 8, 105 N. E. 601, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 787; Riley v. Stand. Acc. Ins. Co., 227 Mass. 55, 116 N. E. 259; Beckles' Case, 230 Mass. 272, 119 N. E. 653. Conceding that knowledge is required, it seems to us that in order to prove the requisite knowledge, it is not necessary for the evidence to show positively that the person was notified of the unsafe condition of his premises, but that it is sufficient if it appears that the circumstances surrounding the act of commission or omission are such as "evinced a reckless disregard for the safety of others, and a willingness to inflict the injury complained of." Railway Co. v. Bryan, 107 Ind. 51, 7 N. E. 807. See. also, Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Judd, 10 Ind. App. 213, 36 N. E. 775. According to the findings, the failure to guard the shafting was in direct violation of a general safety order of the commission. It is not contended that the making of this regulation was not within the power of the commission, and, by sections 48 and 49 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, such orders "are conclusively presumed to be reasonable and lawful." In the face of the evidence it cannot be held that the finding that petitioner was guilty of serious and willful misconduct in maintaining the unguarded shafting is without support.

[3] It only remains to consider in this connection whether such misconduct was that "of an executive or managing officer" of petitioner. It is to be noted that section 12, subdivision (b), of the act of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p 283), specified that the willful misconduct of a corporate employer which should entitle an injured employé at his option either to claim compensation under the act or to sue at law for damages, must be that of an elective officer. This provision was repealed by the act of 1917, supra, and under the corresponding section of that statute—the section here under consideration—the willful misconduct which entitles the injured employé to additional compensation is that of an executive or managing officer of a corporation. It is significant that in this section it is not prescribed that such misconduct be that of an elective officer, and it is to be deemed that in enacting the act of 1917 the Legislature was fully advised of the changes being made in the language of the corresponding provisions of the act of 1913. Under the prior statute an injured employé, in order to recover for the willful misconduct of his corporate employer, was required to bring home such misconduct to an elective officer. Under the 1917 statute, however, the Legislature has seen fit to require that a corporation shall be liable for the willful misconduct of an executive or managing officer, and has not specified that the officer shall be an elective one. It seems clear, therefore, that the Legislature by this section did not use "officer" in its technical, legal sense as one who has been elected, or whose office is provided for by the articles of incorporation, or the by-laws, but that by an "executive or managing officer" was meant a person in the corporation's employ, either elected or appointed, who is invested with the general conduct and control at a particular place of the business of a corporation.

[4] Applying this reasoning to the facts herein, it is plain that Conrad was a managing officer of the petitioner, for whose willful misconduct the company is responsible. The by-laws were not introduced in evidence, and it cannot be determined from the record whether Conrad was elected or appointed as manager of the Wheatland plant. But, as has been shown, Miller testified that the operation of the Wheatland plant was entirely intrusted to Conrad. According to the testimony of Conrad himself, he knew of the position of the shafting, and had been on the platform where the injury was received; that he observed it was "open underneath and on the back"; that he neither remedied the conditions nor reported them to his superiors; that immediately after the accident the shafting was boxed in at his direction; and that as superintendent he was fairly familiar with conditions in the plant. It is not necessary, in order to support the finding, that there be direct evidence that Conrad knew of the dangerous condition of the premises and intentionally failed to remedy it; it is sufficient if the existence of either his knowledge, or intention, or both, may be inferred. The commission may have decided that Conrad could not have failed to observe that an operator tending the belt was in perilous proximity to the unguarded shafting. From all the evidence we cannot say the commission may not have inferred that he must have known of the dangerous conditions of the employment. If he did, as matter of law he would be guilty of willful misconduct if he failed to take proper precautions to remove the danger. It may be observed that if Conrad's testimony as to whether he knew of the situation is to be accepted, the conclusion is inevitable that petitioner in the operation of the plant failed to place responsibility for the working conditions upon any one. In any event, we are not prepared to hold that the superintendent of the plant is not to be charged with knowledge of conditions which are in gross violation of prescribed safety regulations, or that under the evidence he is not "an executive or managing officer" within the meaning of the statute.

And it is only necessary to refer to the testimony of the various employés that the unguarded shafting was on a level with Mrs. Hamilton's eyes, that several of the employés themselves had felt the suction from the shaft, that Mrs. Hamilton had been instructed to clean the "slicer," and that in so doing it was to be expected she would lean over the belt and under the shaft, in order to justify the conclusion of the commission that her injuries were due to the dangerous conditions under which she was required to work. It must be held, therefore, that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding that the accident was the result of the "serious and willful misconduct of an executive or managing officer" of petitioner.

[5, 6] 2. We now turn to consider petitioner's claim that section 6(b) is unconstitutional. The Constitution, as it stood at the time the legislation in force on June 7, 1919, was enacted, empowered the Legislature to create a liability on the part of employers "to compensate their employés" for any injury received in the course of their employment, "irrespective of the fault of either party." Article 20, § 21. This language does not authorize the creation of a liability for anything more than compensation. If the 50 per cent. to be added in cases where the injury is caused by the willful misconduct of the employer is given as a penalty on the employer for such misconduct, and not as compensation to the employé for his injury, the provision is not within the power given to the Legislature by said section, and if it has no other sanction, it is beyond the legislative power and void.

It would be within the general power of the Legislature, under section 1, article 4, to provide that in any case of injury to an employé from willful misconduct of the employer, the amount found as the actual damage sustained by the employé should be increased by adding 50 per cent. thereto as a penalty for the misconduct and by way of exemplary damages. But that part of the award would not be given as compensation, and the jurisdiction to enforce the liability for the exemplary damages would be in the ordinary courts established by section 1, article 6 of the Constitution. That section vests the whole judicial power of the state in the courts there mentioned, except such as may be placed in other tribunals by the subsequent constitutional amendments providing for the giving of special powers of a judicial nature to the railroad commission and to the Industrial Accident Commission. Article 12, §§ 22, 23; article 20, § 21. Section 21, article 20 does not authorize the Legislature to commit to the Accident Commission the enforcement of any liabilities except those created by it against employers to the employés for compensation for injuries. Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 171 Cal. 319, 153 Pac. 24; Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 413, 156 Pac. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390; Carstens v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 572, 158 Pac. 218. Hence it does not authorize the giving of jurisdiction to enforce a liability for punitive damages, not given as compensation, but as something over and above compensation for the injury.

But the provision in question is founded upon a different theory. It is obvious from the language of sections 6 and 9 of the act of 1917, supra, and from the act as a whole, that the ordinary schedule of compensation there established was not considered to be full and complete compensation for the injuries received. The purpose was to take a part of the burden imposed by the injury from the injured employé, and transfer that part to the employer to be ultimately borne by the community in general as an addition to the cost of production. In Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 693, 151 Pac. 398, three of the justices of the court, in upholding the constitutionality of the act, said, with regard to the compensation allowed to employés in addition to medical and surgical expenses, that the indemnity based upon the loss of earnings "covers not the whole, but only a part or a percentage of such loss. The risk of actual injuries is thus shared by employer and employé." The opinion of the other three justices, upholding the act for somewhat different reasons, confirms the foregoing statement. All presumptions are to be indulged in favor of the validity of an act of the Legislature. It is therefore to be assumed the Legislature found that the actual injury by loss of earnings and other elements of damage, not including expenses for costs of treatment and the like, would be at least 50 per cent. more than the fixed schedule would come to, and that it was deemed just, if the injury was caused by willful misconduct of the employer, he should be made to pay a greater proportion of the burden, and the allowance in such a case should be increased by adding 50 per cent, thereto. Thus considered, the additional allowance is really for additional compensation in the strict sense, and not for exemplary damages. This being the case, the power to enforce it was properly given to the commission under the provisions of section 21, article 20, of the Constitution.

The award is affirmed.

CROWE et al. v. BOYLE, Auditor of City and County of San Francisco, et al.
(S. F. 9545.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 16, 1920. Rehearing Denied in Bank Nov. 15, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations ⊂=994 — Taxpayers can enjoin expenditures under illegal contract despite consequent losses.

If a contract between the city and county of San Francisco and a construction company for the construction of an aqueduct was illegal, taxpayers have a right to prevent such illegal expenditure under the contract, legally constituting a loss to the city, though injunction may result in the abandonment of the whole project and consequent business losses.

2. Constitutional law ⊂=15—Municipal corporations ⊂=8 — Statutes ⊂=206 — Effect should be given all language of charter, Constitution or statute.

It is a fundamental rule of construction that effect should be given to all the language of a city charter, Constitution, or statute.

3. Municipal corporations ⊂=328—Supervisors held authorized to regulate method of contracting for public utilities.

Under Charter of City and County of San Francisco, art. 6, c. 1, §§ 9, 14, the supervisors are authorized by ordinance to regulate the method of entering into contracts for the work described in section 9, subd. 8—that is, the construction of public utilities—notwithstanding the general scheme for entering into contracts for public work contained in section 14.

4. Municipal corporations ⊂=340—Bidding and letting of contract on "cost-plus" basis held to have complied with ordinance.

Bidding and letting of contract for construction of aqueduct in furtherance of the Hetch Hetchy project by the board of public works of the city and county of San Francisco, the contract being on a cost plus basis, held in compliance with the ordinance of the board of supervisors of March 22, 1920, No. 5007, authorizing such contract, a "cost-plus" form of contract being characterized by payment by the city of the cost of the work.

5. Municipal corporations ⊂=346—Bond held one for faithful performance of construction contract as required by city's ordinance.

Where a contract by the city and county of San Francisco for the construction of an aqueduct in furtherance of the Hetch Hetchy project merely required that the guaranty of the bond should be the amount of the unpaid cost-plus fee to the contractor in the hands of the city, a bond expressly providing that it was not intended as a guaranty of the estimated maximum cost substantially complied with the ordinance requirement.

6. Municipal corporations ⊂=346—Supervisors had power to provide by ordinance for single surety to contract.

If provisions with reference to method of procedure in letting a contract contained in the ordinance enacted by the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco required that bond for the performance of the contract be signed by two sureties instead of one, the supervisors had power to provide in the ordinance for only one surety, as is provided by Pol. Code, § 955, in case of corporate sureties, and had power, after execution of the contract, to waive requirement of more than one surety.

7. Municipal corporations ⊂=346—What supervisors could provide for they could authorize by ratification.

What supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco had a right to provide for in the first instance by ordinance, as that a single surety to the city's construction contract should be sufficient they could authorize by way of ratification.

8. Municipal corporations ⊂=85—In absence of provision to contrary, legislative act of supervisors may be by resolution or ordinance.

In the absence of statutory or charter provision to the contrary, a legislative act by the supervisors of a city may be either in the form of a resolution or of an ordinance, resolutions and ordinances being equivalent terms for many purposes.

9. Municipal corporations ⊂=342—Proceedings of board in letting contract and taking surety bond ratified by appropriate resolutions.

Proceedings of board of public works of city and county of San Francisco in letting contract for construction of aqueduct in furtherance of Hetch Hetchy project, and taking of bond from contractor, held ratified by subsequent resolutions of board of supervisors of the city in the appropriate manner for such ratification—that is, by the appropriation of the money for the purpose of carrying out the contract—the resolutions in question being adopted in accordance with the charter and approved by the mayor, and equivalent to ordinances for the same purpose, if they did not in fact become ordinances by reason of such approval and in accordance with the charter of the city, art. 2, c. 1, § 16.

10. Municipal corporations ⊂=347(1)—Single surety on contract for construction work for city bound though two required.

A single surety on contract for construction work for a city is bound by its bond though two sureties are required.

11. Municipal corporations ⊂=995(1)—Taxpayer cannot sue to enjoin payments under contract on account of informality of bond as to number of sureties.

A taxpayer of a city cannot maintain action to enjoin payments under a contract for construction work based on the mere informality of the bond in that there is only one surety where two are required by the charter, in the absence of showing made as suggested of injury either to the public or the taxpayer.

12. Municipal corporations ⊂=338, 921(1)—Supervisors held to have followed authority as to sale of water project bonds; auditor held to have complied with requirements relative to indorsement on aqueduct contract.

Board of supervisors of city and county of San Francisco held to have legally followed the authority vested in them with reference to the sale of bonds to pay for construction of an aqueduct in furtherance of the Hetch Hetchy project, and the auditor, in respect of his indorsement on the contract, to have complied with the requirements of the Charter, art. 3, c. 1, § 10, essential to the validity of the contract.

13. Evidence ⊂=83(2)—Presumptions favor good faith of public officials.

All presumptions of law are in favor of the good faith of public officials, as those of a city in issuing bonds for the cost of a water project without subterfuge by way of an arrangement for an advance fee to take care of discount and market the bonds.

14. Municipal corporations ⊂=921(1)—Purchase by contractor of bonds to raise funds for work not illegal.

It is not illegal for a contractor with a city on a cost-plus basis to use part of his fee in the purchase of bonds sold to raise funds for the work.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by James W. Crowe and James E. Lennon against Thomas F. Boyle, as auditor of the City and County of San Francisco, and the Construction Company of North America. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied in bank; Angellotti, C. J., and Shaw and Olney, JJ., dissent.

Jared How and Richard C. Harrison, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

George Lull, Robert M. Searls and Lent & Humphrey, all of San Francisco (Edward I. Wolfe, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

WILBUR, J. [1] This is an action brought by taxpayers to enjoin the defendant auditor from paying $276,000, due under a contract between the city and county of San Francisco, which will hereafter be referred to as "the city," and the Construction Company of North America, for the construction of about 16 miles of aqueduct on what is known as the mountain division of the Hetch Hetchy project. The plaintiffs allege that the contract is void. The trial court, upon stipulated facts, denied the injunction, and plaintiffs appeal. It is conceded by appellants that the contract was let in accordance with the ordinance of the board of supervisors, enacted for the purpose of regulating that matter, except in certain particulars, which will be hereafter noted. Appellants contend that the procedure prescribed by such ordinance is in violation of the charter. It is admitted by the respondents that if the charter provisions regulating the letting of contracts for public work by the board of public works (article 6, § 14 et seq.) apply to the contract in question, the contract is unauthorized and void. The contract is of the type known as "cost-plus-a-fee contract"; that is, a contract by which the city pays for all labor and material used in the prosecution of the work, and, in addition, pays the contractor a fee for its services in superintending and managing the same. The contract was let after advertisement for bids. The fee of the Construction Company of North America under the contract is $1,190,329.20, and the aggregate cost of the work to the city, including the contractor's fee, is estimated and guaranteed at $7,802,952.80. Respondents contend that the method selected by the city authorities is the only possible one for getting the work done at a reasonable cost because of the uncertain and fluctuating cost of labor and material. In support of this contention they point out that the lowest flat contract bid made in response to the call for bids on that basis contained in the same notice calling for bids on the cost-plus-a-fee basis was $9,674,208, and the only other bid on that basis was $16,250,263. It is also stated that the issuance of an injunction against the respondents in this case would necessarily result in the stopping of the work now in progress, and that the delay in the Hetch Hetchy project incident to the disbandment of forces, which will be necessary in the event this case is decided in favor of the plaintiffs, will mean a loss to the city of at least $2,000,000. But, if we assume that the contract is illegal, calling, as it does, for an expenditure of nearly $8,000,000, the taxpayers have a right to prevent such illegal expenditure, which, in the legal sense, constitutes a loss to the city, although the injunction might result in the abandonment of the whole Hetch Hetchy project and the consequent business losses involved. The business exigencies which confront the city cannot justify the illegal expenditure of public money, even though such expenditure might result in a great profit to the city. We must, therefore, confine our investigation to the question of the legality of the contract.

The contract departs from the charter plan. It provides for the payment at the beginning of each year of a large installment of the fee, the first payment of which is the amount involved in this case. The charter provision in regard to installment payments during the progress of the work requires that no more than 75 per cent. of the value of the labor done and materials furnished and used shall be paid for as the work progresses. Article 6, c. 1, § 21. It follows that if these charter provisions apply to this contract it is illegal and void. That question will now be considered.

Does the charter authorize the supervisors to adopt the cost-plus-fee plan?

A bond issue of $45,000,000 was voted by the people of San Francisco in January, 1910, for the construction of the Hetch Hetchy project for the bringing of water from the Tuolumne river to the city. At the time the bonds were voted the charter authorized the city to acquire, construct, or complete public utilities from funds derived from the sale of bonds issued for that purpose. Article 12, §§ 1, 10, 14, 15. These powers were to be exercised by the board of supervisors; but by an amendment to the charter, adopted by the people of San Francisco, November 5, 1918 (article 6, c. 1, § 9, subd. 8), approved by the Legislature January 17, 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 1390), it was provided that the construction of all public utilities should be in charge of the board of public works of the city. Respondents claim that the full authority of the board of public works to contract for the construction of public utilities is controlled only by the ordinance of the supervisors enacted for that purpose. On the other hand, the appellants claim that section 14 of the same chapter (1 of article 6) with reference to the performance of all public work must control the action of both the supervisors and the board of public works, and that the provisions of section 14 and succeeding sections concerning the method of contracting are the measure of the power of both; that, such charter provisions having been disregarded, the contract is void, as is expressly provided in section 17:

"Any contract made in violation of any of the foregoing provisions, and in the case of improvement of streets any assessment for the work done under such contract, shall be absolutely void."

[2, 3] We will now consider the provisions of the charter involved in the determination of the question in issue, contained in sections 9 and 14 et seq. of article 6, c. 1, so far as material to the inquiry. Section 9, supra, provides:

"The board of public works shall have charge, superintendence and control, under such ordinances as may from time to time be adopted by the board of supervisors * * * 8. Of the construction, maintenance and operation of any and all public utilities, owned, controlled or operated by the city and county, or which may hereafter be so constructed, owned, controlled or operated. Full authority is vested in the board of public works to carry out the powers granted in this paragraph, and it may, in accordance with such ordinances as the supervisors may enact, contract for work to be performed, or materials or equipment to be furnished, or for expert, technical or professional services to be rendered, wherever such work, services, materials or equipment are certified by the city engineer to be necessary in connection with the construction, maintenance or operation of such utilities." (Italics ours.)

Section 14 provides:

"All public work authorized by the supervisors to be done under the supervision of the board of public works shall, unless otherwise determined by the board of public works, be done under written contract, except in case of urgent necessity hereinafter provided; and except as otherwise specifically provided in this charter, the following proceedings shall be taken in all cases in the matter of letting of contracts by said board. Before the award of any contract for doing any work authorized by this article, the board shall cause notice to be posted conspicuously in its office for not less than five days, and published for the same time, inviting sealed proposals for the work contemplated; except, however, that when any repairs or improvement, not exceeding an estimate cost of five hundred dollars, shall be deemed of urgent necessity by the board, such repairs or improvement may be made by the board under written contract or otherwise, without advertising for sealed proposals." (Italics ours.)

Section 14 was in the charter when originally adopted. At that time the charter did not authorize the construction of public utilities by the city. That authority has subsequently been conferred by amendment. The respondents contend that, although the phrase "public work" as used in section 14 is broad enough to cover all work controlled by the board of public works, whether done by the city in its proprietary or in its governmental capacity, the words should, in the light of the legislative history, be held to apply only to work done by the city in its governmental capacity.

It is true that in Vale v. Boyle, 179 Cal. 180, 175 Pac. 787, attention was called to the difference between the governmental and proprietary powers of the city in determining whether or not certain sections of the charter regulating the purchase of supplies (section 1, art. 2) applied to supplies purchased for public utilities. What was said on that subject was only to reinforce the construction of the language of the charter fully determined by other rules of construction and was wholly incidental to the question. This is made clear by the following language of the opinion, to wit:

"While it is true that this general consideration alone should not control the express language of section 1, chapter 3, article 2 of the charter, if applicable thereto, it aids us in construing such general provisions of the charter concerning the purchase of supplies, etc., to consider that they were adopted for the purpose of regulating the conduct of the board of supervisors, acting in their governmental capacity."

The point at issue must be determined by the language of the charter, and not by the fact that in its ownership and control of public utilities the city acts in a proprietary capacity. Returning, then, to a consideration of the language of the charter, we find that section 14, supra, first deals with "public work authorized by the supervisors to be done under the supervision of the board of public works," and provides that such work, "unless otherwise determined by the board of public works," must "be done under written contract, except in the case of urgent necessity." The board of public works thus have a right to determine whether such work shall be done under written contract. The first exception is in the case of "urgent necessity." The next clause, "and except as otherwise specifically provided in this charter, the following proceedings shall be taken in all cases in the matter of the letting of contracts by said board" (italics ours), would seem to include not only the matter of letting the contracts authorized by the supervisors, but also the letting of contracts directly authorized by the charter; in other words, "all cases." The next sentence confirms this view: "Before the award of any contract for doing any work authorized by this article, the board shall cause to be posted," etc. While the clause, "and except as otherwise specifically provided in this charter the following proceedings shall be taken in all cases in the matter of the letting of contracts by said board," is in a sentence dealing with only these clauses of contracts "authorized by the board of supervisors to be done under the supervision of the board of public works," it is evidently intended to have a broader application, namely, to apply to "all cases" where contracts are let by the board. The clause represents a break in the line of thought equivalent to the beginning of a new sentence, introducing the method of procedure to be followed as outlined in the next and succeeding sentences, which provide for "* * * the award of any contract for doing any work authorized by this article, * * " etc., so that all work contracted for by the board of public works, whether authorized by the board of supervisors or by article 6 of the charter, is to be contracted for in accordance with section 14, "unless otherwise specifically provided in the charter." The contention of the respondents is thus narrowed down to this proposition, namely, that the matter of contracting for the construction of public utilities is expressly regulated by subdivision 8 of section 9, and therefore comes within the above exception contained in section 14, to wit: "And except as otherwise specifically provided in this charter." The argument, then, is that the matter of letting of contracts for public utilities is controlled not by section 14 of the charter, but by the ordinances of the supervisors upon that subject, enacted by authority of the charter (section 9, subd. 8, supra), which provide that the board of public works " * * may in accordance with such ordinances * * * contract for work to be performed. * * *" It seems fairly apparent that the effect of this section, construed in connection with section 9, subd. 8, supra, is to require all contracts let by the board of public works to be let in accordance with the procedure prescribed by sections 14 et seq., except in case of those contracts concerning public utilities where the procedure to be followed is regulated by ordinances enacted by the board of supervisors.

It will be helpful, in determining the intent of the people in adopting these charter provisions, to consider the history of the adoption of section 9, subd. 8, supra. Such history is uniformly considered in dealing with kindred subjects, such as the interpretation of the Constitutions.

At the time of the formulation of the amendment to section 9, subd. 8, of chapter 1 of article 6, the action of Vale v. Boyle, supra, was pending. The limitations upon the power of the board of public works to deal with public utilities was raised by the plaintiff in that case, which was begun January 15, 1918. On May 27, 1918, the superior court of San Francisco granted a temporary injunction, holding that the board of public works was required to invite bids for supplies in accordance with section 1, c. 3, art. 2, of the charter. The charter amendment to section 9, subd. 8, supra, was formulated and by ordinance submitted to the people of San Francisco October 21, 1918, to be voted for at the next general election (November 5, 1918). Four days later this court reversed the decision of the trial court in Vale v. Boyle, supra, and held that section 1, c. 3, art. 2, did not apply to such purchase of supplies. At the election the proposed amendment was carried, and was approved by the Legislature January 17, 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 1376). The controversy in that case was as to whether or not the board of public works was required to follow the charter provisions for the purchase of supplies, or to follow the ordinance of the supervisors regulating the purchase of the automobile busses for the purpose of conducting a public utility. The existence of this controversy over the power of the board of public works to purchase supplies, in any other manner than in accordance with the charter provisions regulating the purchase of supplies, so seriously affecting, as it was claimed in that case, the power of the board to effectively operate the public utilities then owned, and to contract for supplies for the Hetch Hetchy project then under construction, shows that the purpose of the amendment was to exempt the board of public works when purchasing supplies for such utilities from following the routine method provided by the charter and held by the trial court to apply to purchases for the municipal street railroad. This purpose is readily deducible from the language used in the amendment, to wit:

"Full authority is vested in the board of public works to carry out the powers granted in this paragraph, and it may in accordance with such ordinances as the supervisors may enact contract for work to be performed or materials or equipment to be furnished," etc. (Italics ours.)

It is to be observed that the same provision is made concerning "materials or equipment" and concerning contracts "for work to be performed." Both are to be done in accordance with the ordinances of the board of supervisors. If it was the intent to relieve the board of public works from the charter provisions applying generally to the purchase of "all supplies," it would seem equally clear that the purpose was to also relieve them from similar restrictions concerning the making of contracts for public work. That this court, after the language of the charter amendment was formulated and submitted, held such charter provisions concerning the purchase of supplies not to be applicable, does not change the intent of the framers of the charter amendment. An examination of the language of the amendment, as well as a consideration of the circumstances under which it was formulated, tends to confirm this conclusion. The clause "full authority is vested in the board of public works to carry out the powers granted in this paragraph" has no force unless it relieves the board of public works of restrictions upon their authority contained in other portions of the charter. The expression "full authority" indicates a purpose to remove limitations upon authority and an intention to remove such general restrictions as might otherwise be deemed applicable. It focuses the attention upon the particular paragraph in which the powers are granted and to the limitations upon that power contained in that paragraph as alone applicable. This paragraph, in effect, reads thus: "Full authority is hereby vested in the board of public works over the construction, maintenance, and operation of all public utilities, and it may in accordance with such ordinances as the supervisors may enact, contract for work to be done," etc. The subdivision clearly deals with the method of contracting for public utility construction, and authorizes contracts therefor "in accordance with such ordinances as the supervisors may enact."

Under sections 14 and 22, c. 1, art. 6, the method of contracting for public work is rigidly prescribed. Those provisions may be summarized as follows: Notice inviting proposals for the work shall be posted and published for not less than five days. The notice must fix the day and hour when the bids are to be received. They must be sealed. The notice must contain the general description of the work, the time within which it shall be commenced and when completed, the amount of bonds to be required, and refer to plans and specifications on file in the office of the board for full detail and description of the work. They must be upon printed forms, accompanied by an affidavit of noncollusion. The bids must be clearly and distinctly written, without any erasure or interlineation. They must be accompanied by a certified check; only one bid to be presented by each bidder. The method of opening and considering the bids; the method of signing the contracts; the execution of the bond; the provision in regard to the method of payment of the contractor—are all regulated in great detail. The award must be to the lowest bidder. It is apparent that, if these charter provisions concerning the letting of contracts for public work by the board of public works control the letting of contracts for constructing public utilities, the whole field of regulation is quite fully covered, and there is nothing of importance left for the supervisors to provide for by any ordinance regulating the method of contracting. It is true that the phrase in subdivision 8 of section 9, "in accordance with such ordinances as the supervisors may enact," might be given some effect by construing it as authorizing the board of supervisors to determine what portions of the work are to be let by contract, leaving the method of advertising for and entering into contracts to be regulated by the charter. But this result is already fully accomplished by the opening clause of section 9: "The board of public works shall have charge, superintendence and control, under such ordinances as may from time to time be adopted by the supervisors; * * * 8. Of the construction," etc. This general introductory phrase in section 9 in regard to the ordinances of the board of supervisors relates to and affects every portion of subdivision 8 of section 9, and the above phrase in subdivision 8 of section 9, to wit, "in accordance with such ordinances as the board of supervisors may enact," is wholly unnecessary and redundant, unless we construe it to apply to the method of entering into contracts for work to be performed and to direct that such ordinance is to control upon that subject. If the phrase under consideration is eliminated from section 9, subd. 8, and it is thus made to read, "and it may * * * contract for work to be performed or materials or equipment to be furnished," such contracting would still be under the general power and supervision of the board of supervisors by virtue of the opening clause of section 9, giving the board of public works control, etc., "under such ordinances as may from time to time be adopted by the supervisors." The authority to let contracts in accordance with the method prescribed in the charter would be in the board of public works, and would be subject to the general regulatory power of the supervisors. In order to change the method of letting contracts it was essential that other and additional language should be employed in subdivision 8, supra, and this we think was done in a very direct and effective manner by the declaration that the board of public works might contract for work "in accordance with such ordinances as the supervisors may enact" for that purpose. It is a fundamental rule of construction that effect should be given to all the language of a charter, constitution, or statute, and unless this last-mentioned phrase accomplishes this much it accomplishes nothing, and the charter is to be construed exactly as it would be without such phrase. The use of this phrase in connection with the emphatic provision that "full authority is vested in the board of public works to carry out the powers granted in this paragraph" makes it plain that the supervisors are authorized by ordinance to regulate the method of entering into contracts for the work described in subdivision 8 of section 9, namely, the construction of public utilities, notwithstanding the general scheme for entering into contracts for public work contained in section 14 of that article (6).

Another consideration tends to the same conclusion. Previous to the amendment of the charter of 1919, supra, the power to acquire or construct public utilities was vested in the city. Article 12, § 14. No express provision being contained therein with reference to the construction of such utilities, the power to make provision for such construction would be vested in the legislative body of the city. The provisions requiring contracts for public work to be let by the board of public works, contained in the charter at that time in sections 14 et seq., supra, related solely to contracts executed by them, and had no application to contracts let by the supervisors, and therefore had no application to contracts for the construction of public utilities. Prior to the amendment of 1919, therefore, the supervisors by ordinance could provide the method of entering into contracts for the construction of public utilities, and when this power was taken from them, and vested by the charter amendment in the board of public works, it was not unreasonable to provide for the retention by the supervisors of the power of regulating the method of entering into contracts for such construction, and that is, in effect, what was done by the charter, which authorized contracts to be let under ordinances adopted by the board of supervisors regulating that subject. As has been pointed out, section 14 expressly excepted from its operation contracts otherwise specifically provided for in the charter. The provision for the letting of contracts in accordance with the ordinances of the supervisors in subdivision 8 of section 9, c. 1, art. 6, was no doubt intended to be such a specific provision therefor as was excepted from the operation of section 14.

What did the supervisors mean by the cost-plus-fee plan with a guaranty?

[4] Appellants contend that the board of public works failed to conform to this ordinance in advertising for bids and in letting the contract. We will next examine such contention. The ordinance of the board of supervisors, No. 5007, passed March 22, 1920, authorized the board of public works "to call for and receive sealed proposals and to enter into contracts on the basis of such proposals for the construction of one or more or all portions of said water supply and works, said proposals and contracts to be based on the so-called cost-plus-a-fee-plan with a guaranty by the contractor that the total cost to the city shall not exceed a specified maximum price per unit." With reference to the letting of such a contract it is provided, in section 2, "that after comparing proposals received for doing the work the board of public works may in its discretion award the contract either to the bidder submitting the lowest maximum cost guaranty, or to the bidder proposing to do the work for the lowest contractor's fee." The ordinance also contained the following provision:

"Sec. 3. All such contracts shall provide that inasmuch as the city and county is to pay the actual cost of doing the work, within the guaranteed limit, no expenditures chargeable to the city and county shall be incurred for labor, material, supplies or equipment required for such work, except upon the prior written authorization of the city engineer and board of public works, and only to the extent of such authorization. Said contracts may also provide for progressive payments of the contractor's fee. * * *

"Sec. 4. The provisions of the charter requiring the retention by the city and county of 25 per cent. of the amount of contractor's payments until completion of the work shall not be held applicable to such annual advance payments allowed contractors, but shall apply to all other payments on account of the contractor's fee. The provisions of the charter applicable to general contracts by the city requiring a bond for the protection of laborers and material men shall not be considered as applicable to cost plus a fee contracts where all labor and material bills are paid directly by the city and county, and no such bond shall be required."

Purporting to act under the authority of this ordinance, the board of public works, on April 6, 1920, advertised for bids "for the construction of aqueduct tunnels in the mountain division of the Hetch Hetchy project, on a cost-plus-fee basis. Contract No. 77C, Hetch Hetchy water supply." It was provided in this notice that "the amount of bond for faithful performance of contract has been fixed at $100,000." In pursuance of this proposal the Construction Company of North America made its bid, wherein it proposed and agreed, if its proposal was accepted,

"to take charge of and superintend the work mentioned in said advertisement and described in the specifications referred to in said advertisement, and to furnish the necessary organization for carrying out said work in accordance with the specifications, * * * and subject to all conditions contained in said specifications, for the total sum of $1,190,329.20. * * * The undersigned, in further consideration of the acceptance of this proposal, hereby guarantees that the unit costs to the city of said work, determined in the manner provided for in the specifications, including the total sum above mentioned, but excluding the general overhead costs of the city's engineering and administrative offices in San Francisco and at Groveland, will not exceed the sum named in the schedule of guaranteed maximum unit costs attached to and forming part of this proposal, and agrees that if the actual unit costs to the city of San Francisco, so determined, exceed such guaranteed costs, the total amount of such excess on all work to which the same applies may be deducted from any payments due to, or withheld from, the undersigned under the contract."

The award of contract followed the language of the proposal, awarding the contract No. 77C to the respondent Construction Company of North America—

"to take charge of and superintend the work mentioned in the advertisement for the above-mentioned contract, and described in the specifications referred to in said advertisement, and to furnish the necessary organization for carrying out said work in accordance with the specifications therefor, * * * for the total sum of $1,190,329.20."

It contains the same provisions with reference to guaranty of unit cost contained in the bid. Apparently the bids were made on blanks furnished by the board of public works. Contract No. 77C, executed in accordance with these proceedings, provided that the respondent contractor—

"promises and agrees * * * that it will do and perform all of the following work * * * for the construction of aqueduct tunnels in the mountain division of the Hetch Hetchy project on a cost-plus-fee basis, with guaranteed maximum units costs, and awarded to the contractor above named by the board of public works. * * *"

It also contained the same guaranty with reference to unit cost contained in its proposal and in the award of the contract hereinabove quoted. The board of public works on behalf of San Francisco, subject to the provisions of the specifications, agreed to pay a fee of $1,190,329.20. The specifications provide for payment of the contractor's fee as follows:

"First. In the event that the contractor has submitted a bid requiring annual advance payments, as soon as the contract has been signed and the contractor has undertaken the work, in order to cover the initial cost and expense to which the contractor estimates he will be put in undertaking his work for the first year, the city will pay to him the amount specified in his bid as his advance payment for the first year.

"Second. At the expiration of each successive period of three months succeeding the date on which the contract is signed, and during which the contract is in force, or until ten such payments have been made, the city will pay to the contractor one-eleventh of the entire amount of his bid fee (excluding the contractor's estimated annual advance payments, if they are required by his bid), less twenty-five per cent. of said one-eleventh, and also less the amount of any excess of actual unit costs over guaranteed unit costs, determined as hereinabove set forth.

"Third. At the commencement of the second and third years, respectively, succeeding the date of signing the contract, the city will pay to the contractor the entire amount of the advance payment estimated by the contractor for that particular year, if such an estimate is included in his bid, plus such addition or minus such deduction as the board of public works may find proper, to make such advance payment equal to the contractor's actual advance costs for that year. The finding of the board of public works as to the extent to which these annual advance payments shall be modified, if at all, shall be binding and conclusive; and if said finding is not acceptable to the contractor, or if he does not express his acceptance or rejection of said finding within ten days from the date at which he is notified of the same, the contract shall be declared terminated by the board of public works and shall be of no further force or effect.

"Fourth. When the contract shall have been completed to the satisfaction of the board of public works, or at the termination of the same if due to the failure of the contractor to accept the board's modification of his second or third annual advance payment, as above provided, the city will pay to the contractor the total sums withheld under the twenty-five per cent. retention clause in paragraph second of this section, plus the unpaid one-eleventh of the bid fee, less any deductions which the city engineer may find necessary or proper under the terms of this contract, either on account of the maximum guaranty clause or otherwise. The decision of the city engineer as to the items, amounts, and propriety of any such deductions shall be binding and conclusive upon both parties hereto. Acceptance of such final payment by the contractor shall constitute a complete settlement of all obligations of the city under this contract and a release of the city from the obligation to pay any further sums whatever.

"The contractor, in fixing the amount of the annual advance payment in his proposal, shall include in the amount of such payment only the initial cost and expense to which he considers he will be put in undertaking his work for each year, and not any current expenses or profit, which should be distributed through the year."

In considering the contention of the appellants that this contract and award does not comply with the ordinance, it will be necessary to further consider the terms of the ordinance. The fundamental inquiry is, what is meant by the "so-called cost-plus-a-fee" plan and guaranty, etc. The phrase "cost-plus-a-fee," disassociated from the other parts of the ordinance and construed solely with reference to its language, and not with reference to any technical significance attached to the term, would seem clearly to indicate that the city was to pay the cost of doing the work—that is, for labor and material and other expenses of the contractor—and to pay the contractor a fee for his services. The term is used to distinguish the plan of contracting by which the services of the contractor are secured for the management and oversight of the work in accordance with the usual custom of contractors, but without obligation on the part of the contractor to insure that the building will cost no more than the contract price, or, on the other hand, without an opportunity for him to make more than his previously agreed percentage or fee. This type of contract, we understand, is largely an outgrowth of war conditions. In a paper presented before the American Society of Engineers, printed in the proceedings, vol. 45, No. 46, pp. 443–449, and also printed in the Canadian Engineer, vol. 38, p. 183, Ernest W. Clarke discusses the distinction between ordinary contracts for the construction of buildings and improvements, which he refers to as "lump-sum contracts," and the "cost-plus" type of contract. He makes the following statement:

"The usual methods of paying for work are by lump sum, by item charges, and by cost plus a percentage. Under the first two methods the contractor takes the engineers' or architects' specifications and estimates of the quantities, possibly checks the latter by his own computation, guesses at the interpretation which will be placed by the owner's representatives on the terms of the specifications, and from his knowledge of cost of materials and cost of labor makes up a bid. In a lump sum contract the preliminary estimate of quantities is final, as are also the original plans of foundations, details, etc. Any changes must be a matter of settlement between the owner and the contractor. The latter takes all the gamble, and if conditions or quantities turn out more favorably than was anticipated he wins; otherwise he loses, or is tempted to decrease the cost to himself by some method which generally means a poorer grade of work than that contemplated in the specifications. If conditions turn out much worse than anticipated by the contractor, he may forfeit whatever bond he put up and leave the owner and bondsmen to settle." The tendency of such contracts, Mr. Clarke points out, "is to remove responsibility from the owner and his representatives and place it on the contractor; also, all the gamble on the weather, foundations, changes in labor and material market, and every other unknown or unknowable factor is carefully unloaded on him. The contractor accepts all this, but the owner pays. * * * In 'cost-plus' contracts, the owner accepts all risks, all costs, and receives the benefit of all favorable conditions; each job carries its own load only, without the addition of losses on other jobs, and without the percentage added by the contractor to offset possibly unfavorable conditions, ambiguous specifications, or captious owners. * * * The contractor furnishes the plant, organization, and expert knowledge of construction and buying; the owner supervises the work and pays the bills. * * * The sliding percentage with maximum fee, as used on government work, could be applied to any contract, large or small. Contracts could be let on the basis of fee demanded, both percentage and maximum, on the size, adaptability, and condition of the plant controlled by the bidder, and on his experience, reputation, and the size and character of his organization. It is true that the interest of the owner to keep down the cost, and that of the contractor to receive a large fee, would clash; but that is controlled by the sliding percentage, which can be arranged to give an actually larger fee for smaller total cost, and by the maximum fee, which is based on the owner's estimate of total cost."

Mr. A. E. Wells, president of a Chicago construction company, in The Heating and Ventilating Magazine for October, 1919, vol. 16, p. 27, under the title "Building Construction under the Cost-Plus-Fixed-Fee Contract," calls attention to the distinction between the lump-sum contract and the cost-plus-a-fee contract.

"The question being asked to-day is 'Should the contractor insure the owner that his structure will not exceed a definite contract price?' In competitive bidding the cost of this insurance is paid generally by the low bidder out of profits, or, as frequently happens, out of his capital, for the reason that he is more likely to get the contract as he scales down his allowances for contingencies. In fact, the man whose bid includes a safe allowance for insurance against higher costs cannot expect to obtain work under the competitive bidding system. The inevitable result is the bankruptcy of many contractors and an additional cost to the owner or the surety company to complete the unfinished contract. This situation has come to such a point that surety companies are refusing to write surety bonds on fixed price contracts except under especially favorable conditions and they frequently recommend to owners the cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contract. But from the owner's standpoint is it not preferable to know in advance what a certain project will cost? It is true that a careful estimate is due him. It should be made by a reliable contractor and checked by owner's architect and engineer. Such a figure should be more satisfactory than a competitive bid, which does not necessarily show the cost of the building, but only what some contractor is willing to gamble is the cost of the job." Mr. Wells concludes as follows: "Unquestionably the contractor is called in because he is an expert in building and not to absorb the risk entailed in the lump sum contract. If it is not the purpose of the owner to buy price insurance along with his building, then cost-plus-fixed-fee is a better basis."

In support of this conclusion, an address of Brigadier-General R. C. Marshall, Jr., chief of the construction division of the U. S. War Department, given before the Associated General Contractors of America, November 21, 1918, at Chicago, is quoted from. General Marshall said that as a result of war conditions "there was developed a form of contract known as the cost-plus-sliding-scale-fee contract." He had secured the opinion of a committee of eminent business men unqualifiedly indorsing this form of contract. General Marshall made the following statement:

"No contractor should be called upon nor permitted to undertake the performance of any contract that within the four corners of the paper upon which it appears is or may be written the financial bankruptcy of the contractor. It is unjust, it is inequitable, it is uneconomic. The great lesson of this war on the subject of the relationship between the contractor and the owner is the 'cost-plus' contract. This represents the only equitable basis under which a contractor may perform constructive and economic services for the owner. It is the only form of contract which affords protection to both parties. To me all the energies, the thought, and experience of this country within its own continental lines during the past year and one-half of this world struggle shall have been in vain unless out of it shall grow, as a permanent institution, solidifying the economic relationship between the contractor and owner, the 'cost-plus' contract." Mr. Wells further stated in his article: "Our standard contract calls for a return to the owner of 90 per cent. of such savings, all of which would have accrued wholly to the contractor under the lump-sum plan. We believe 10 per cent. of the savings to be an adequate incentive for the contractor."

George W. Fuller, consulting engineer, New York City, in Municipal and County Engineering for July, 1920, discusses the "cost-plus-a-fee" contract, and states:

"Prior to the great war, the 'cost-plus' form of payment on contracts in the waterworks held was limited to a relatively few large projects built as a whole under this type of contract for private corporations, and to numerous small, unexpected features of enterprises executed under municipal contracts where 'extra-work' clauses were attached to either lump-sum (bulk) or unit-price contracts. During the war a large amount of emergency government work which had to be performed in the shortest possible time gave great impetus to the 'cost-plus' form of contract. The unstable condition of the market for labor and materials now found in many places causes this form of handling construction work to come up repeatedly for discussion. Such discussion results from the necessity for finding expedients to meet present emergencies which, while not comparable with those of the war period, are nevertheless present during this reconstruction period to an extent which is perhaps not generally recognized. At this time when contractors are sorely puzzled to know how to bid on construction materials on which quotations are made by dealers only on the basis or changes in price contingent on the actual date of future deliveries, and when labor is uncertain in quantity and of reduced and somewhat uncertain efficiency as to output of work per hour, it is obviously necessary to look conditions squarely in the face. Add to this the difficulties in transportation of construction materials and the loss incident to the contractor having a substantial payroll for labor when materials to work with are lacking, and it is readily seen that this is a time for considering fundamental principles in handling construction work to an extent that would not be of interest under normal conditions. * * * Some waterworks construction must go forward. With conditions as they are at present the contractor, if he bids on a lump-sum or unit-price basis, he is bound to name a price which in his opinion will protect him from loss, and if possible assure a reasonable return on his capital investment and for the work of himself and his organization. Under these circumstances it is important to discuss briefly the cost-plus form of contract with a view to seeing if the burden of uncertainty in some respects cannot be shifted from the contractor to the owner to the advantage of all concerned. In fact, if construction work is to go forward there are some projects where such steps seem imperative. * * * It is claimed that under the cost-plus method a contractor has little inventive to keep down the cost of the work. This is frequently true of the cost-plus-percentage but need not be true of the cost-plus-lump-sum type. In any case it must be remembered that a contractor who will deliberately be inefficient on a cost-plus project is equally sure to attempt improper or inadequate construction on lump-sum or unit-price agreements. There have been a great many variations of the cost-plus contract applied to construction work, but the more important are:

"(1) Actual proved cost with labor and material furnished without restriction by the contractor, plus a fixed percentage or lump sum, to represent profit, supervision, financing, use of tools, and plant, or any or all of these.

"(2) Actual proved cost of labor furnished by the contractor and with materials furnished by the owner, with a fixed percentage or lump sum, as above.

"(3) Actual proved total cost for specified work, plus a percentage for specified or unexpected extra or unforeseen work in connection with lump-sum or unit-price contracts.

"(4) Actual proved total cost to the contractor, plus a sliding scale fee and upset maximum fee.

"(5) Actual proved cost to the contractor, plus a fixed charge and fixed construction fee."

Under the head of "Advantages Claimed for Cost-Plus Contracts," 10 specifications are given by Mr. Fuller. The eighth one is as follows:

"(8) Cost-plus contracts do away with the substantial sums usually added in lump-sum or unit-price contracts to cover the following uncertainties: (a) Weather; (b) foundations; (c) changes and shortages in labor market; (d) changes and shortages in material market; (e) delayed deliveries of materials."

Under the head of "Disadvantages" he gives 11 specifications, the first of which is as follows:

"(1) There is no way of determining the approximate cost in advance, and this upsets budgets where definite appropriations have been made or are required."

Mr. Fuller's paper, from which the above quotations are taken, was presented before the annual convention of the American Waterworks Association on June 24, 1920, at Montreal, Quebec. See, also, Engineering News Record, vol. 85, p. 78, July, 1920. In Engineering and Contracting, vol. 52, p. 728, a form of cost-plus contract used by Bent Bros. in Los Angeles is published. It appears from this contract that the constructor agrees to a definite estimated cost which it is stipulated is based upon certain unit prices, some of which are specified in the contract. It is agreed that the estimated cost may be increased or reduced by reason of the increase or decrease in price of the items. The constructor's fee is a percentage of the estimated cost and is known as the estimated fee. If the actual cost of the work is less than the estimated cost, the constructor, in addition to his estimated fee, is paid one-half of the amount saved over the estimated cost. If the cost of the work is more, the constructor pays half of the loss, "except that in no event shall the constructor be paid less than one-third of the constructor's estimated fee."

These quotations clearly indicate the distinction between the flat contract basis and the cost-plus-a-fee basis of construction contracts. It is apparent from the whole scheme that the purpose of the supervisors in authorizing this form of contract was to make a contract less hazardous to the contractor than the flat-price contract. If we accept the appellants' contention, that the guaranty of maximum unit cost places all the cost over that amount upon the contractor, it is difficult to conceive of a contract less favorable than this to the contractor. Without any hope of profit, he agrees to assume all possible loss. If the work costs less than the maximum guaranty he does not profit by that fact, but if it costs more he pays such additional cost. Not only that, if there is an advance in any one item of cost over the estimate the contractor suffers the loss, while if there is a lowering of cost on any other item the city gets the benefit of it. For instance, if the cement costs $1,000,000 more than the estimate, the contractor pays it. If there is a saving of $1,000,000 on labor and other items of cost, the city gets the advantage of this saving. The estimated or guaranteed cost would be the actual cost, but the contractor would suffer a loss of $1,000,000. Such a construction of the ordinance absolutely ignores the fact that the whole purpose of the cost-plus-a-fee contract is to shift the burden of market fluctuations upon the owner instead of on the contractor. Whatever name may be appropriate to the form of contract said to be devised by the board of supervisors of San Francisco, it certainly is not a "so-called cost-plus-a-fee contract"; that is, a contract "generally styled" a "cost-plus-a-fee contract" (Webster). The form of contract which shifted the hazard of increased cost upon the owner resulted from the fact that millions of young men were being withdrawn from industrial pursuits, that the government was calling millions of men to service and planning to call all the available men to service needed to overcome an enemy whose victories had already cost the world millions of lives. Our attention has been called to no contract approximating in character to that contended for by the appellants. The report of the United States Shipping Board of December 1, 1918, shows the letting of contracts aggregating over $2,000,000,000 for ships. The nearest approach to the contract here involved, as construed by appellants, is, to quote from the report, that on "a fee basis by which the bidder submitted a proposal to build for a sum not to exceed a certain figure, and to take a certain fee in return for his services, with provision for bonus shared between builder and corporation in case cost fell below the estimated cost." A consideration of this form of contract at once discloses that it does not purport to be on a "cost-plus-a-fee basis," and that the contractor has a chance of an additional profit over his fee. And it further appears from the report that the government pays any additional cost due to increased cost of labor or material. It should be noted, too, that the employés in such work were in the preferred service list, and thus the industry was relieved from the hazard of having its men called to service, and that every shipyard was given all the contracts it could possibly carry out, and that the government taxed excess profits. Such a contract could not be appropriately styled a cost-plus-a-fee contract, but rather "estimated cost plus a fee plus increased cost," or "estimated cost plus estimated profit plus a fee plus increased cost."

The interpretation of the ordinance contended for by appellants ostensibly throws the hazard of all loss on the contractor, but in fact it throws it on the materialmen and laborers. The laborers are employed and paid only with the consent of the city. The material is purchased and paid for only by such consent. The contractor is, in effect, the agent of the city up to the guaranteed maximum price unit. If this is the limit of the power of the board of public works and the contractor to bind the city, thereafter the contractor must pay all labor and material. The work then has arrived at a point where all future cost is a loss to the contractor and to be paid from his fee or from his private resources. There is no bond to protect the laborers or materialmen. Such a bond is expressly waived by the supervisors (Ordinance, § 4, supra), although ordinarily they would require a bond of over $4,000,000 on a contract of this amount. There is no retention of 25 per cent. (over $2,000,000) for the benefit of laborers or materialmen. In short, the facts that the supervisors waived this bond, that they provided for advance payments of actual cost, that they fixed no amount of bond for the faithful performance of the contract, that they made no provision for the payment of labor and material after the maximum guaranteed cost had been exceeded, except for payment direct by the city, and waived the usual bond to secure them, lead to the conclusion that it was their intention that in any event the city should pay the actual cost, and that the contract price should be such "cost plus a fee." The contract and specifications involved here seem to combine several features of the cost-plus-a-fee contract described by George W. Fuller, supra. The fourth form of such a contract provides for "an upset maximum fee."

Unless the innovations provided on the cost-plus-a-fee plan by the supervisors in their ordinance absolutely destroy the fundamental basis of such a plan, and substitute in lieu thereof a peculiar plan of their own, the guaranty of the contractor referred to in the ordinance must relate to and bear upon the amount of his fee. It must have been intended that the contractor was to agree that the maximum cost should be a certain amount, and that his fee was to be affected and limited by that agreement. The provision of section 3 that the contract shall recite "that inasmuch as the city is to pay the actual cost of the work, within the guaranteed limit, no expenditures" shall be incurred except upon the prior written authorization of the city engineer and board of public works might indicate otherwise. But the statement of the guaranteed limit contained in this provision is a mere recital as a basis for the agreement that the city engineer is to have supervisory power over the incurring of expenses. This recital ought not to control the fundamental basis of the whole scheme contemplated by the adoption of the cost-plus-a-fee plan. If the contractor instead of bidding a lump sum had specified a percentage of the cost as a basis of his compensation—and he might have bid on that basis—and if we substitute for the word "guarantee" the word "agreement"—for that is what is intended—we have an agreement that the contractor shall receive a certain percentage of the cost of the work coupled with an agreement that the work shall not exceed a certain maximum, and an implication that if it does exceed that maximum his percentage of profit shall be limited to the agreed maximum. If we assume there is any basis for the appellants' contention, we have to consider the additional fact that the board of public works received proposals upon the same basis from all contractors bidding on the cost-plus-a-fee basis; that these bids were a great deal less than the flat contract basis, that the contract was let in accordance with the proposal in the bids; and that afterwards the board of supervisors passed a resolution setting aside bonds for the payment of this contract, and, in effect, ratifying and confirming it.

With reference to the subsequent action of the board of supervisors, the rule is thus stated in Black on Interpretation of Laws, § 95:

"A construction put upon a statute by the Legislature itself, by a subsequent act or resolution, cannot control the judgment of the courts; but it is entitled to weight and consideration in case of doubt or obscurity. * * * Thus, while the Legislature cannot, by resolution, change the obligation of a contract made under a previous act, yet, if they instruct a public officer as to his duties under the contract, such legislative expression of opinion as to what has been done, and the resulting duties of the officer, may be resorted to in determining the intention of the Legislature in passing the act," citing Georgia Penitentiary Co. v. Nelms, 65 Ga. 67.

See, also, State ex rel. Lamkin v. Hackmann, 275 Mo. 47, 204 S. W. 513; Board of Commissioners v. Alexander, 58 Okl. 128, 159 Pac. 311, 316.

The fact that the board of supervisors, within a few weeks after the adoption of this ordinance authorizing the board of public works to solicit proposals for the performance of this work, in effect ratified and approved the contracts entered into by the board of public works under the authority of that ordinance, points significantly to the fact that in using the comparatively recent phrase "cost-plus-a-fee" they did not intend to throw upon the contractor all the hazards due to an increased cost of the work, and that the guaranty therein referred to had relation to the amount of the contractor's fee, and that the guaranty with reference to such maximum unit cost contained in the contract actually entered into was the kind of a guaranty they intended to secure in enacting the ordinance. In the resolution set up as Exhibit J to the complaint, adopted by the supervisors and approved by the mayor, appropriating $2,719,000 to be expended out of the proceeds of water bonds, it is stated:

"Which proceeds are to be placed in the water construction fund for the purpose of paying the estimated expenses of executing contract No. 77C, board of public works, for the construction of mountain division aqueduct tunnels on the Hetch Hetchy project, on a cost-plus-a-fee basis, with guaranteed maximum unit prices during the year commencing with and following the date of said contract."

This is an express declaration by the board of supervisors and the mayor that the contract in question was one "on a cost-plus-a-fee basis, with guaranteed maximum unit prices." If in the ordinance the supervisors had used terms of fixed legal significance, their subsequent interpretation would not be binding on the courts. But they have used a phrase in the formative stage, and we think accurately. But if these phrases lack precision, the subsequent conduct of the supervisors is sufficient, under the circumstances, to justify the interpretation which we place on the ordinance, namely, that it authorizes the contract entered into by the board of public works.

To recapitulate the argument bearing upon the proper construction of the ordinance of the board of supervisors authorizing the board of public works to advertise for bids on the basis of the so-called cost-plus-a-fee contract:

(1) The sine qua non of the cost-plus form of contract is the payment by the city of the cost of the work.

(2) Section 4 of the ordinance declares that in the cost-plus form of contract the city is to pay for all labor and material.

(3) There is no express provision in the ordinance that the contractor is to reimburse the city for the cost of labor and material paid to laborers and materialmen.

(4) No bond is required to secure laborers and materialmen, such a bond being expressly waived.

(5) The usual 25 per cent. of money due under the contract retained to secure laborers and materialmen and to secure the city in the faithful performance of the contract, is waived.

(6) No provision is made for an adequate bond to secure the city for the repayment to it of money paid to laborers and materialmen. While the usual bond for the performance of the contract would cover this agreement, the amount of such bond is not fixed by the supervisors, but is left to the discretion of the board of public works.

(7) The purpose of the guaranty of maximum unit cost by the contractor is to form a basis of his fee if the bid is on a percentage basis, or, if not, in such manner as the board of public works may determine by its form of proposals and contract.

(8) The board of supervisors have themselves interpreted the ordinance to mean exactly what the board of public works construed it to mean, and in case of doubt we should follow this interpretation.

As an answer to the foregoing considerations it is suggested that the guaranty contemplated that the contractor was to pay all cost over and above the agreed maximum; in other words, that the sine qua non of the guaranty is that the contractor pays the cost of the work. We would thus have the supervisors in one sentence using two irreconcilable terms, one phrase requiring the city at all hazards and in all events to pay the cost of the work, and the other requiring the contractor at all hazards and in all events to pay the cost of the work. On the one hand, we have a construction of the ordinance which resolves the ambiguities thereof in favor of the cost-plus basis, and, on the other, a construction which resolves the ambiguities in favor of the payment of the cost by the contractor.

In response to the considerations which point to the conclusion that the supervisors were seeking a practical solution of a practical problem, and were endeavoring to secure bids from contractors upon a basis more favorable to the city than the lump-sum contract, and that the contract which throws all the hazard upon the contractor and removes from him all hope of profit resulting from decreased cost is less favorable to him than a lump-sum contract, it is answered that the contractor will protect himself by making an outside estimate which will make it practically certain that he will not suffer loss. To this argument we reply that the imputation of such an intent to the board of supervisors is to assume that the provision in the ordinance in regard to a guaranty was considered by them to be absolutely valueless, because to secure a guaranty of a certainty would be of no value to the city; that is to say, if it was assumed that a contractor would bid two or three times the estimated cost of the work as his maximum guaranty, so as to be certain that he would suffer no loss, the guaranty becomes valueless. The guaranty is only valuable on any theory when it is assumed that it is possible, and even probable, that the actual cost will exceed the guaranteed maximum. If we assume that each bidder will fix an exorbitant maximum—say forty or fifty million dollars—then it is obvious that the only real competition in bidding would be as to the amount of the fee, for the maximum guaranty would be of no value to the city. We are thus brought by this process of reasoning to the very conclusion that we reached by the opposite course of reasoning, namely, that the intent of the board of supervisors was to secure competition in the amount of the fee bid. The difference in the two courses of reasoning is that by the former we uphold the validity of the contract here involved and permit the construction of the Hetch Hetchy project, as was clearly contemplated by the supervisors, and by the latter we hold the contract invalid and temporarily retard or permanently destroy the Hetch Hetchy project.

We have assumed in the foregoing discussion that the city attorney has correctly interpreted the contract entered into for the performance of this work, and that the provision in such contract for a guaranty that the maximum unit price should not exceed the amount therein specified was so far modified by the contract, with reference to the retention of parts of the fee due the contractor, that the maximum security of the city is $112,000. Mr. Justice SLOANE has taken a different view of the contract, and we do not enter into that discussion for the reason that we prefer to base our decision upon the interpretation adopted by the parties in the case. Upon this basis, if we assume that the aggregate of the maximum unit cost cannot exceed the amount of the respondent contractor's bid, to wit, $7,802,952.80, the contract should have been awarded to R. C. Storrie & Co., whose bid fee was $1,074,285.60, because in each case the city pays the cost of the work and the fee of the contractor, and the difference between the two fees is $116,044 in favor of R. C. Storrie & Co. It is only when we assume that the actual cost of the work would be $112,000 more than $7,802,952.80 that the basis of the two bids becomes at all equal, for the bid of the respondent contractor abates as the cost exceeds its guaranty, and it is for the reason that it was contemplated that the maximum unit cost would affect the compensation of the contractor, that the supervisors, in section 2 of the ordinance, provided that the contract might be awarded "either to the bidder submitting the lowest maximum cost guaranty, or to the bidder proposing to do the work for the lowest contractor's fee"; for, as has been said, if the maximum bid is so great that it bears no real relation to the cost, the bid should be let on the basis of the lowest contractor's fee.

Ratification.

The question as to whether or not the resolutions adopted by the board of supervisors subsequent to the execution of the contract, in furtherance thereof, constituted a ratification of the contract so as to bind the city is not discussed in the briefs. It is clear that the board of supervisors, having power to prescribe the method of entering into the contract, would have power to ratify a contract executed without the formalities prescribed by them, as distinguished from such formalities as might be required by the charter. The resolutions adopted by the supervisors are not only significant as pointing to the proper interpretation of the ordinance prescribing the method of the letting of the contract, but are also significant as legislative action ratifying the contract. There can be no question that if the resolutions passed by the board of supervisors subsequent to the letting of the contract are proper expressions of the legislative will, equal in effect to an ordinance, that the subsequent ratification makes immaterial the original intention of the board of supervisors as expressed in the ordinance authorizing the letting of the contract, and we see no escape from the proposition that under the charter of San Francisco the ordinance in question, having been enacted with the formality prescribed by the charter for both ordinances and resolutions, is equivalent to an ordinance in its effect. This matter will be more fully discussed in the consideration of the next point.

Does the Contractor's Bond Comply with the Ordinance?

[5-8] Appellants contend that the bond given by the contractor does not comply with the charter provisions regulating that subject (section 21, c. 1, art. VI), for the reason that it is not a bond for the faithful performance of the contract, and that, although signed by a surety company, there is only one surety instead of two. In this connection it is pointed out that although the Political Code authorizes the acceptance of one corporate surety company instead of two individual sureties, such section does not apply to the letting of contracts by a city, which is a municipal affair. Section 21, supra, provides as follows:

"At the same time with the execution of the contract, the contractor shall execute to the city and county and deliver to the secretary of the board a bond in the sum named in the notice for proposals, with two or more sufficient sureties to be approved by the board, or shall deposit with the secretary a certified check upon some solvent bank for that amount, for the faithful performance of the contract. No surety upon any bond other than the lawfully authorized surety companies shall be taken unless," etc.

The claim that the bond is not one for the faithful performance of the contract results from the fact that in the bond it is expressly provided that it is not intended as a guaranty of the estimated maximum cost. Inasmuch as the contract itself on that subject merely requires that the guaranty shall be the amount of the unpaid fee in the hands of the owner, the bond substantially complies with the requirements of a bond for the faithful performance of the contract. The respondents' only answer to the claim that the bond should have been signed by two sureties is that the universal practice of the city has been to require only one surety company, and that the point was not raised in the court below, but is raised for the first time on appeal. With reference to the latter point it is sufficient to raise the question in this court that the pleadings and stipulation of the parties and findings of the trial court show that the contract was signed by only one surety company. Nor would the proof of a contrary custom, directly in the face of the charter requirements, be of any value. If, as we have held, the board of supervisors have control over the subject of letting of contracts for public utilities, they also have control of the corollary matter of the execution of a bond for the faithful performance of the contract. In the ordinance providing for the letting of this contract by the board of public works no specific provision was made with reference to the giving of the bond for the performance of the contract. It was merely provided in the ordinance that the procedure outlined in sections 14 et seq. of article 6, c. 1, should control. The language of the ordinance is as follows: "Sec. 2. The procedure to be followed in soliciting proposals for and letting such contracts shall be, so far as applicable, that prescribed in article 6, chapter 1, of the charter for general contracts let by the city," with certain exceptions which need not now be considered. Assuming that the provision with reference to the method of procedure in letting a contract, contained in the ordinance enacted by the board of supervisors, required that the bond for the performance of the contract be signed by two sureties instead of one, the supervisors had the power to provide in the ordinance for only one surety, as is provided by general law in case of corporate sureties. Pol. Code, § 955. They also had power after the execution of the contract to waive the requirement of more than one surety. What they had a right to provide for in the first instance they could authorize by way of ratification. Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 Pac. 81. The resolution of the board of supervisors of May 3, 1920 (No. 17872), approved by the mayor on that date, reciting the execution of the contract in question, setting aside $8,000,000 in bonds to carry it out, appropriating $2,719,000 for the first year, accepting the bid of the Construction Company of North America, was a formal ratification of the contract. This ratification was repeated on the same date by a resolution setting aside and appropriating $2,719,000 from the proceeds of the sale of said bonds authorized by the foregoing resolution, and directing that the "proceeds are to be placed in the water construction fund, for the purpose of paying the estimated expenses of executing contract No. 77C of the board of public works and for the construction of mountain division aqueduct tunnels on the Hetch Hetchy project on a cost-plus-a-fee basis, with guaranteed maximum unit prices during the year commencing with and following the date of said contract"; and on the same date, by another resolution, appropriating $276,776.40, "in payment to the Construction Company of North America as the first annual advance payment contract 77C Hetch Hetchy water works supply construction (claim dated May 3, 1920)." It is suggested that these resolutions were not effective to ratify the letting of the contract, for the reason that the charter required the supervisors to act by ordinance in providing a method of letting of contracts (section 8, c. 1, art. 6, supra), and that a ratification by resolution would therefore not be effective. McCracken v. San Francisco, 16 Cal. 591; Grogan v. San Francisco, 18 Cal. 608, 610, 614; Pimental v. San Francisco, 21 Cal. 362, 363. But in the absence of statutory or charter provision to the contrary, a legislative act may be either in the form of a resolution or of an ordinance. San Francisco Gas Co. v. San Francisco, 6 Cal. 190; note, 34 Am. Dec. 631; Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1321; Ruling Case Law, 19, § 194. For many purposes resolutions and ordinances are equivalent terms. Los Angeles v. Waldron, 65 Cal. 283, 3 Pac. 890; Pollok v. City of San Diego, 118 Cal. 593, 50 Pac. 769; Hellman v. Shoulters, 114 Cal. 136, 157, 44 Pac. 915, 45 Pac. 1057; Jacobs v. Board of Supervisors, 100 Cal. 121, 34 Pac. 630; Hopping v. City of Richmond, 170 Cal. 605, 150 Pac. 977. "And it has been held that even where the statute or municipal charter requires the municipality to act by ordinance, if the resolution is passed in the manner and with the statutory formality required in the enactment of an ordinance, it will be binding and effective as an ordinance." 19 Ruling Case Law, § 194, p. 895; Gleason v. Barnett, 115 Ky. 890, 61 S. W. 20; Barre v. Perry, 82 Vt. 301, 73 Atl. 574; McGilvery v. Lewiston, 13 Idaho, 338, 356, 90 Pac. 348; Steenerson v. Fontaine, 106 Minn. 225, 119 N. W. 400. The charter of San Francisco, although providing that all legislative action shall be by ordinance (article 2, c. 1, § 8), expressly authorizes in section 13 the passage of resolutions providing for the appropriation or disposition of public property or the expenditure of public money. It is thus provided that this particular form of legislative action may be had by either ordinance or resolution. After providing the identical procedure for the passage of ordinances and resolutions, it is provided that bills and resolutions of the type specifically described in section 13, which includes resolutions for the "appropriation or disposition of public property or the expenditure of public moneys," etc., shall after passage be presented to the mayor for approval. It is then provided: "The mayor shall return such bill or resolution to the board within ten days after receiving it. If he approve it he shall sign it and it shall then become an ordinance." With reference to the passing of such ordinance or resolution over the veto of the mayor, it is provided that after such passage "the presiding officer shall certify that fact on the bill or resolution, and when so certified the bill shall become an ordinance with like effect as if it had been approved by the mayor. If the bill or resolution shall fail to receive the vote of fourteen members of the board, it shall be deemed finally lost." The only difference that we have noted concerning the passage and authentication of ordinances and resolutions is that relating to the enacting clause of an ordinance. It is provided in the charter (section 8, c. 1, art. 2) as follows: "Every legislative act of the city and county shall be by ordinance. The enacting clause of every ordinance shall be in these words: 'Be it ordained by the people of the city and county of San Francisco as follows:' No ordinance shall be passed except by bill, and no bill shall be so amended as to change its original purpose." But the provision in regard to the enacting clause has been held to be directory. City of Napa v. Easterby, 76 Cal. 222, 18 Pac. 253.

[9] We see no escape from the proposition that the proceedings of the board of public works in the letting of the contract and the taking of the bond were ratified by the subsequent resolutions of the board of supervisors in the appropriate manner for such ratification; that is, by the appropriation of the money for the purpose of carrying out of the contract. Such appropriations were made in accordance with the provisions of the charter. The resolutions in question were adopted in accordance with the charter and approved by the mayor, and were equivalent to ordinances for the same purpose, if they did not in fact become ordinances by reason of such approval and in accordance with the above-quoted provision of section 16, c. 1, art. 2.

Taxpayer Cannot Complain of Informality in Bond.

There is another reason why the judgment cannot be reversed, because there was only one surety on the bond.

[10, 11] This action being by a taxpayer, the question is whether he is in a position to raise the point as to the insufficiency of the bond where it is executed by a surety company, and where the general law specifically provides that only one surety company is essential upon a bond in any case provided by law. Section 955, Pol. Code; section 1056, Code Civ. Proc. The appellants are no doubt correct in the contention that the giving of such bond was a municipal affair, and therefore controlled by the city charter, but no allegation is made and no contention raised that the surety is not amply sufficient. The bond has been approved both by the board of public works, as required by section 21 of the charter, and inferentially by the board of supervisors. The bond would be binding upon the surety company, notwithstanding there was only one surety. Kurtz v. Forquer, 94 Cal. 91, 29 Pac. 413; Weir v. Mead, 101 Cal. 125, 35 Pac. 567, 40 Am. St. Rep. 46; Stimson Mill Co. v. Riley, 42 Pac. 1072.[1] No case has been called to our attention in which it has been held that a contract such as this is invalid by reason of the failure to give a proper bond, and in a number of cases it has been assumed that the giving of a bond expressly required by statute is not essential to the validity of the contract. Plummer v. Kennedy, 72 Mich. 295, 40 N. W. 433; Wells v. Board of Education, 78 Mich. 260, 44 N. W. 267; Huebner v. Nims, 132 Mich. 657, 94 N. W. 180; Smith v. Hubbell, 142 Mich. 637, 106 N. W. 547. In this state we have been very liberal in the application of the rule permitting taxpayers to bring a suit to prevent the illegal conduct of city officials, and no showing of special damage to the particular taxpayer has been held necessary. Gibson v. Trinity County Supervisors, 80 Cal. 359, 22 Pac. 225; Winn v. Shaw, 87 Cal. 631, 25 Pac. 968; Barry v. Goad, 89 Cal. 215, 26 Pac. 785; Santa Rosa Lighting Co. v. Woodward, 119 Cal. 30, 50 Pac. 1025; Clouse v. City of San Diego, 159 Cal. 434, 114 Pac. 573; Osburn v. Stone, 170 Cal. 480, 150 Pac. 307. The rule has now been crystallized into a statute (section 526a, Code Civ. Proc.). We think that our decisions point to the conclusion that the taxpayer should not be permitted to maintain an action based upon the mere informality of a bond, where no showing is made or suggested of injury either to the public or to the taxpayer. In Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Bennett, 177 Cal. 560, 171 Pac. 304, plaintiff sued upon a street assessment. The proceedings were in invitum. The charter provided that where a bond for the faithful performance of a contract for street work was executed by a surety company such company must be organized under the laws of the state of California. The bond given was not executed by a company so organized. The court said:

"The question is whether under these circumstances the fact that the surety on these bonds, otherwise good and sufficient, was not of the class designated by the charter, is available as a defense in an action to foreclose the lien of the assessment. We think this question is correctly answered in the negative by what was said and held in Miller v. Mayo, 88 Cal. 568, 26 Pac. 364, and Greenwood v. Morrison, 128 Cal. 350, 60 Pac. 971, and on further consideration we are satisfied that Manning v. Den, 90 Cal. 610, 27 Pac. 435, decided nothing to the contrary. It follows that the facts embraced in this finding constitute no defense to plaintiff's action."

If in proceedings in invitum the failure to give the kind of bond required by the charter is insufficient to avoid the contract made in the exercise of the taxing power of the city, it follows irresistibly that a taxpayer ought not to be allowed the extraordinary remedy of injunction to prevent the carrying out of a valid contract because of such informality, where no showing whatever is made of actual injury to the taxpayer. It has been said that injury will be presumed from a failure to comply with the law (Santa Rosa Lighting Co. v. Woodward, supra) but such presumption cannot be applied under the circumstances here shown.

[1] Reported in full in the Pacific Reporter; reported as a memorandum decision without opinion in 110 Cal. xviii.

The Auditor's Certificate Concerning Availability of Proceeds of Municipal Bonds.

[12] Appellants contend that the indorsement by the auditor upon the contract in question was insufficient to comply with the requirements of article 3, c. 1, § 10, of the charter, and that the proceedings for the setting aside of the sale of the water bonds for the payment of the expenses of the contract does not conform to the charter provisions in that regard. The charter provision in regard to the indorsement upon the contract is as follows:

"Provided, that where the expense of executing such contract is to be paid entirely from the proceeds of bond issues, the requirements of this section may be satisfied through an indorsement by the auditor that a sufficient number of bonds have been set aside to be sold as payments under the contract fall due, and from the proceeds of which sale the estimated expense of executing such contract may be paid, as certified by the board or officer making the same."

The certificate of the auditor upon the contract is in the following language:

"In accordance with the provision of article III, chapter 1, section 10 of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, I hereby indorse upon the within contract my certificate that by Resolution No. 17872, New Series, of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco Water Bonds of the issue of 1910, in the amount of eight million ($8,000,000) dollars, have been set aside, to be sold as payments under the contract to which this indorsement is attached fall due, from the proceeds of which sale the estimated expense of executing such contract may be paid; that said amount of bonds is sufficient for such purpose, according to the certificate of the board making such contract; that prior to this indorsement the contractor has agreed in writing to purchase such bonds, in such amount and at such periods of time, for par and accrued interest, as will enable the treasurer to make payments in cash under such contract as such payments fall due and are approved."

The agreement of the contractor was to purchase on or before the day when each advance annual installment of the fee became due an amount of bonds sufficient to take care of the total amount of expenditures required under the contract for the next ensuing year, and the amount agreed to be purchased for the first year was $3,052,000, the bonds to be purchased at par and accrued interest. The contention of the appellants is that this arrangement for the sale of bonds did not conform to the charter provisions, and that therefore the certificate was in effect untrue. The contention is as follows:

"The contract in question assumes to be one not for the present sale, but for the future sale in installments, upon the happening of future events, one of which may not happen within one year, and one of which may not happen within two years, from the date of the contract. The sales assumed to have been consummated by this contract were not sales to the highest bidder, nor are the sales over the treasurer's counter to any applicant at a price not less than par and accrued interest fixed by the supervisors, which are the only methods of sale prescribed by the charter."

We think this position is not well taken. The purpose of requiring the auditor's certificate was to submit to him the question of whether or not he would have in the treasury at the time payments were due under the contract sufficient funds to meet these payments. Under the agreement entered into between the contractor and the city he would have such funds on hand for the payment of the amounts due under the contract. The charter (section 10, supra) specifically provides:

"If bonds are withheld, arrangements shall be made prior to the auditor's indorsement for the sale of such bonds in such amounts and at such periods of time as will enable the treasurer to make payments in cash under such contract as such payments fall due and are approved."

This provision of the charter specifically requires that the arrangement for the sale must be made before the auditor's indorsement. It contemplates the future delivery of the bonds "in such amounts and at such periods of time as will enable the treasurer to make payments in cash under such contract as the payments fall due." The charter contemplates two things: First, an indorsement upon the contract of the fact that there is a balance in the treasury available for the payment of the moneys to fall due under the contract. It matters not that this money may have been derived from the sale of bonds. If the bonds have been sold and the money is in the treasury, the certificate of the auditor is in accordance with the fact. Second, if, on the other hand, the bonds have not been sold and have been set apart by the supervisors to meet the obligation under the contract, it is essential that such arrangement be made for the sale of the bonds at future times and in such amounts as will make it certain that the city will have cash on hand to fulfill its obligation to pay cash. The mere setting aside of bonds would not take care of the obligation of the city, and there could be no assurance of the ability so to do in the absence of an actual arrangement or contract for the sale of the bonds at such times and in such amounts as is needed to meet its obligation under the contract. If the arrangements for the sale of bonds were violative of such fundamental provisions of the charter as that the bonds should be sold for not less than par and accrued interest, we should go behind the certificate of the auditor to inquire into the actual facts in the suit of a taxpayer alleging those facts. So far as we can see no direct requirement of the charter is violated, and the very provision of the charter which requires the certificate of the auditor to be attached to the contract certifying that bonds have been set aside to be sold, and that "from the proceeds of which sale the estimated expense of executing such contract may be paid," implies a sale in advance of delivery. We think that the supervisors have regularly followed the authority vested in them with reference to the sale of bonds, and that the auditor has complied with the requirements of the charter essential to the validity of the contract.

Fraud in Sale of Bonds not Charged.

[13, 14] In the oral argument it was claimed that the arrangement for the advance fee each year was a subterfuge, to take care of the discount necessary to market the bonds. The argument is substantially as follows: That the court will take judicial notice of the fact that government bonds and other similar bonds bearing 4½ or 5 per cent. interest cannot be sold on the market for par; that therefore the agreement of the contractor to purchase the bonds at par is not in good faith for the reason that he could not afford to purchase the bonds at a loss, and hence it must be assumed that the advance payment to be made before or at the time of the purchase of the bonds was intended as a discount on the bonds. The question of whether or not the form of the contract entered into by the city with the contractor was a subterfuge to avoid the provision of the charter requiring the bonds to be sold at par and accrued interest was not raised in the trial court. It is suggested, however, that the facts speak for themselves, and from the admitted facts it must be held that this was the purpose of the city and of the contractor. If there is any fraud or collusion in the matter it was not alleged and cannot be considered by us. All presumptions of law are in favor of the good faith of public officials, and there is nothing in the case other than the facts as stated which give color to any complaint of collusion. Assuming that it is true that the contractor will use a part of his fee in the purchase of bonds, it is no more illegal than it is for him to use any other money belonging to him for the purchase of the bonds. It is his money, and, in the absence of fraud or collusion, he can do with it as he pleases.

We conclude that the contract was valid and that the injunction against the payment of the contract price should be denied.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: LAWLOR, J.; LENNON, J.

SLOANE, J. (concurring). I concur in the conclusion reached by Mr. Justice WILBUR, but I do not agree with his opinion construing the contract of guaranty as specified in the ordinance. I cannot accept the construction placed upon ordinance 5107 that the requirement for a contractor's guaranty that the "cost to the city shall not exceed a specified maximum cost per unit" applies alone to the contractor's fee. There are four references to this guaranty in the ordinance. First, the board of public works is authorized to invite proposals and let contracts "on the basis of cost-plus-fee with guaranteed maximum cost to the city and county." Second, the board is authorized to enter into contracts for the construction of "said water supply and works, said proposals and contracts to be based on the so-called cost-plus-fee plan, with a guaranty by the contractor that the total cost to the city shall not exceed a specified maximum price per unit." Third, there is the provision that the board of public works may in its discretion award the contract to the bidder submitting the "lowest maximum cost guaranty, or to the bidder proposing to do the work for the lowest contractor's fee." Whatever this last paragraph may mean, it seems clear that the maximum cost guaranty referred to in the first clause is not the contractor's fee indicated in the second clause. The fourth reference is to the fact that "the city and county is to pay the actual cost of doing the work within the guaranteed limit," and providing that no expenditure chargeable to the city and county shall be incurred for labor and material, supplies, or equipment, required for such work, except on written authorization, etc. The cost and work here referred to as being within the guaranty are clearly the cost and work of the whole contract. It furthermore is an incontrovertible fact that all the parties to the proceedings under this ordinance, in the proposals, specifications, acceptances, and contract, have treated this required guaranty as applying to the total maximum cost of the entire work, including the contractor's fee.

These considerations are conclusive to my mind that the guaranty named in the ordinance was intended as a security against any excess unit cost of the entire construction work.

But, with this interpretation of the ordinance, I concur in the conclusion of Justice WILBUR that the contract cannot be held invalid for failure of compliance with either the charter or the ordinance—First, because, as pointed out in Justice WILBUR'S opinion, the resolutions adopted by the board of supervisors were in legal effect a ratification of the contract; and, second, because, if there was not a valid ratification, the acceptance of the contract rests upon a reasonable interpretation by all the parties of the guaranty requirement.

This court is agreed upon the vital point of the opinion that the supervisors had the power under the amended charter to authorize by ordinance a departure from the procedure therein prescribed for negotiating public contracts. They did by ordinance change the procedure not only in adopting the cost-plus-fee plan, but by demanding a guaranty from the contractor where the charter required a surety bond. It is fair to presume that the contract of guaranty as executed and accepted was the security contemplated by the ordinance.

The ordinance authorizes the board of public works to enter into a contract on the so-called cost-plus-a-fee plan, "with a guaranty by the contractor that the total cost to the city shall not exceed a specified maximum price limit."

Pursuant to this requirement the contractor, in the contract as executed with the board of public works, agrees as follows:

"The contractor hereby guarantees that the unit costs to the city of such work determined in the manner provided in the specifications, including the contractor's fee hereinafter mentioned, but excluding the general overhead costs of the city's engineering and administrative offices in San Francisco and Groveland, will not exceed the sum named in the schedule of guaranteed maximum unit costs; and agrees that if the actual unit costs to the city of San Francisco, so determined, exceed such guaranteed costs, the total amount of such excess on all work to which the same applies may be deducted from any payments due or withheld from the contractor under the contract."

Stopping with the words "unit costs" preceding the semicolon, we have, so far as is necessary to bind the contractor, an express guaranty as required by the ordinance.

I doubt if there is anything in the subsequent language which modifies the liability of the contractor. The added terms are not a limitation upon the guaranty, but a supplementary provision for securing the liability assumed to the extent of any unpaid moneys due the contractor.

It is claimed that the bond which was given to secure performance of the contract expressly construes the above agreement, and exempts both the surety and the principal from any liability "on this bond" for the guaranty, and limits the liability of the principal to "a charge against said principal as provided in such specifications."

The provisions of the specifications referred to do not contain any limitation upon the liability of the contractor under the guaranty, but it is the manner of ascertaining the amounts to be deducted from the contractor's fee that is referred to as being "provided in the specifications."

This proviso in the bond, of course, destroys any recourse on the bond for such maximum excess costs, but it cannot, and does not purport to, construe the extent of the principal's liability on the guaranty, but, on the contrary, refers to the contract for the measure of his liability; and, in my opinion, after having made an express guaranty covering any extent of excess maximum cost, it cannot be held to have been limited by a supplemental agreement in the nature of an assignment of moneys remaining in the hands of the debtor, as partial security for the promise.

But even conceding, as seems to be the construction of the parties themselves, that the contract of guaranty limits the contractor's liability thereon to such deductions as may be made from his stipulated fees, is there such a failure to comply with the requirement of the ordinance in this regard as to nullify the contract? There is at least a partial guaranty, and who shall say that it is not a full and complete protection to the city against its liability for any excess maximum unit costs that may happen or that were within the contemplation of the board of supervisors?

In this consideration of the sufficiency of the guaranty most of the reasoning in the opinion of Mr. Justice WILBUR in his analysis of the nature and purposes of a cost-plus-a-fee contract applies. In determining the character and extent of the guaranty required, we may properly consider the nature and limitations of the relation of the parties under the contract. All of the purchases and expenditures were to be made by the city and were under its immediate control. No greater liability need be assumed than the city approves. The specifications provided for frequent estimates of the progress of the work and the maximum unit costs indicated. The city reserved the right to curtail expenditures and suspend operations at any time it saw fit, and was empowered to hold out from the contractor's fees 25 per cent. of all amounts other than the advance payments, and after the first year such portion of the yearly advance payments as the board of public works from its investigations finds necessary to cover any excess over the maximum unit costs.

Before this contract was finally entered into it had been certified by the city engineer as his opinion that the work could be completed within the agreed maximum limits. The contract and guaranty was accepted and ratified by the city with knowledge of the form of the guaranty. No question is raised in the pleadings as to there not having been a sufficient compliance with the terms of the ordinance in this respect. Indeed, the plaintiffs recite in their complaint that the board of public works, "acting under authority of ordinance No. 5107 and not otherwise," awarded this contract on the contractor's bid, and that thereafter "a contract in writing in accordance with such proposal made by Construction Company of North America, and such acceptance thereof by the Board of Public Works, * * * was executed." This proposal referred to contained the same provision of guaranty as is incorporated in the contract. The answer of the city and county of San Francisco avers that under the authority of ordinance No. 5107 the successful bidder was to assume charge and superintendence of the construction of said waterworks under the direction and control of the city engineer. All labor and material bills were to be paid directly by the city and county of San Francisco, "but no such expenditures were to be incurred except upon the previous written approval of the board of public works." Materials, supplies, and expenditures were to be purchased directly by the city in accordance with the usual procedure. The contractor, however, was to guarantee that the unit costs of the various classes of work involved would not exceed the sums specified in the bids. It is further alleged in the answer that a bid was received from the defendant Construction Company of North America; that the guaranteed maximum price of the bid was approximately two million dollars less than any competing bid; that its acceptance was recommended by the city engineer; that it was accepted by the board of public works, and the contract "was finally awarded, under specification No. 76C, to the Construction Company of North America."

It is stipulated in the record that all the allegations of the answer are to be taken as true. These recitals constitute an admission that the contract contained a guaranty as required under the ordinance.

Even on this appeal no serious question is raised by appellants as to a sufficient compliance with the ordinance in the matter of this guaranty.

Certainly, in the light of all these facts, there cannot be said to have been such a failure to comply with the requirements of the ordinance as will render the contract void and inoperative at the petition of a taxpayer.

The point is urged that the contractor's guaranty should have been secured by the statutory bond required by section 21 of article 6, ch. 1, of the charter. It is there provided:

"Every contract entered into by the board of public works shall be signed," etc.; "and at the same time with the execution of the contract the contractor shall execute to the city and county, a bond named in the notice for proposals, for the faithful performance of the contract."

Ordinance No. 5107 directs that in soliciting proposals and letting such contract the provisions of the charter shall be followed so far as applicable.

But the performance of the guaranty is not an obligation that comes within the terms of the charter provision quoted. The primary contract here was the agreement on the part of the contractor to organize, superintend, and carry on the work of construction, which was to be financed by the city itself. As security for the faithful performance of this service, he furnished a bond in the penal sum of $100,000 fixed by the board of public works. It was the city's part of the obligation to authorize the expenditures, purchase the materials, employ the labor, and pay the bills. It was further required of the contractor in consideration of his employment that he secure the city against loss by a guaranty that the work would be completed for a specified maximum unit cost. This might have been accomplished by requiring the execution of a surety bond. Instead, the supervisors by ordinance elected to take as their security the personal guaranty of the contractor. They might have stipulated that he furnish the guaranty of John D. Rockefeller, or John Smith, in which event it would not be claimed that by virtue of the charter requirements he must supplement such guaranty by a bond for its faithful performance. His performance of the guaranty was no part of the original obligation of employment. It was a secondary obligation of indemnity against possible excess in cost in the city's part of the contract. In the absence of this agreement, the burden of any excess cost would fall on the city.

Let us suppose, again, that the ordinance had required the contractor to execute a mortgage, or place in escrow a sum of money, to secure against this excess cost, would it be contended that he must secure the performance of this condition by a bond? On the contrary, the execution of the mortgage or escrow would be performance, just as here the contract of guaranty, with the creation of a lien on the contractor's fee, was performance. Not performance of the secondary obligation to pay in the event of an excess cost, but performance of the agreement to pledge his credit as security against such excess, the agreement to guarantee.

When the supervisors elected to take the contractor's personal obligation for security rather than to exact a bond, they exercised the power possessed under subdivision 8 of section 9 of article 6, ch. 1, of the charter, empowering them to vary by ordinance the method of procedure in the matter of public utilities.

The provision of the ordinance for the contractor's guaranty was a modification in this respect of the charter procedure, and it may be fairly inferred was intended to supply such indemnity as would otherwise be required under the charter by a bond. It may be conceded that just what form of guaranty was contemplated does not appear from the ordinance. The board of public works, interpreting and acting upon this authorization, entered into this agreement with the contractor fixing the maximum unit costs and accepting in lieu of the charter bond this form of guaranty or indemnity against an excess cost. It certainly is some form of a guaranty. Both the board of public works and the board of supervisors have recognized and ratified it as a compliance with the charter and the ordinance.

It is a recognized rule of construction of a statute or ordinance that its contemporaneous interpretation by those charged with its execution is entitled to consideration. 25 R. C. L. 1043; Edwards v. Darby, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.) 206, 209, 6 L. Ed. 603; U. S. v. Ala. G. S. R. R. Co., 142 U. S. 615, 12 Sup. Ct. 306, 35 L. Ed. 1134; Arnett v. State, 168 Ind. 180, 80 N. E. 153, 156, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1192.

Another salutary rule is that where a statute is uncertain as to its interpretation, or fairly susceptible of more than one construction, a construction to which it is fairly susceptible may be followed, which will avoid unreasonableness, hardship, or even inconvenience (25 R. C. L. 1018).

"If * * * the language is not clear, and it is obvious that, by a particular construction in a doubtful case, great public interests would be endangered or sacrificed, the court ought not to presume that such construction was intended by the makers of the law." Pickering v. Day, 3 Houst. [Del.] 474, 95 Am. Dec. 291; People v. Lambier, 5 Denio (N. Y.) 9, 45 Am. Dec. 273.

I think in this case it sufficiently appears that the requirement of the guaranty was intended by the ordinance as a substitution for the bond, and that the guaranty executed was in substantial compliance with the ordinance.

WASSERMAN v. LOS ANGELES RY. CORPORATION. (L. A. 5170.)

1. Carriers ⟸356(7)—In case of mistake in ticket, passenger could not refuse to pay fare.

Under Civ. Code, § 2188, a passenger, with a ticket affirmatively showing he had no right to transportation on the street car, could not insist that the conductor accept his explanation of mistake by another conductor in issuing the ticket, and when he refused either to pay cash fare or to leave the car, the conductor and motorman were justified in attempting to eject him, using as little violence as possible, and at some stopping place or near some dwelling house.

2. Carriers ⟸267—Regulation of road that transfer good only at point for which it read reasonable.

Regulation of defendant street railway that a conductor could not accept a transfer except at the transfer point where its face read it might be used is reasonable, and a transfer is not valid for passage when presented elsewhere, so that, under Civ. Code, § 2188, when a passenger presents a transfer void at the point and refuses to pay cash fare, a conductor can use reasonable force to eject him.

3. Carriers ⟸385—Findings held not to indicate car crew used more than reasonable force to eject passenger.

In an action against a street railway by its passenger for injuries sustained when the conductor and motorman attempted to eject him for refusal to pay cash fare after tendering an invalid transfer, findings that the conductor pulled plaintiff passenger from his seat to the rear platform, called the motorman to his assistance, and that both with great force pulled, twisted, and jerked plaintiff, held not expressly or by implication to indicate that the car crew used more force than was reasonably necessary to remove plaintiff from the car, so as to render defendant railway liable.

4. Evidence ⟸471(17)—Whether a motorman used more than necessary force to eject passenger not a conclusion.

In an action against a street railway by its passenger for injuries sustained when the conductor and motorman attempted to eject him for refusal to pay cash fare after tendering an invalid transfer, testimony of a witness as to whether or not the motorman used more force than was necessary in attempting to eject plaintiff, held not inadmissible as constituting a conclusion.

5. Appeal and error ⟸856(2)—New objection that question called for conclusion cannot be urged by appellee.

In an action by passenger for injuries sustained when attempt was made to eject him for refusal to pay cash fare, where the only ground on which proffered testimony as to whether the car crew had used more than necessary force was rejected was that the railway's employés did not use enough force to remove plaintiff from the car, plaintiff appellee will not be heard to urge to sustain ruling that the question was not properly framed and called for a conclusion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by M. L. Wasserman against the Los Angeles Railway Corporation. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and Norman S. Sterry, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank Karr, of Los Angeles, R. C. Gartner, E. E. Morris, of Los Angeles, amicus curiæ (W. R. Miller, of counsel), for Pacific Electric Ry. Co.

Humphrey Marshall and Frederick A. Preston, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by the defendant, Los Angeles Railway Corporation, a corporation, from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, M. L. Wasserman, in the sum of $350, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained as the result of an attempt by defendant's employés forcibly to eject plaintiff from one of defendant's cars.

There is practically no dispute as to the facts. On October 6, 1915, respondent boarded one of defendant's cars bound north on Grand avenue, in the city of Los Angeles. He paid his fare, and requested and received a transfer to the East First street line. According to his testimony, he was without his eyeglasses, and therefore unable to read the transfer, so that he asked the conductor where he should change cars, to which the conductor answered "Transfer at Seventh and Broadway." The transfer point as printed on the slip was First and Spring. Respondent descended from the Grand avenue car at Seventh and Broadway, and there boarded a car of the East First street line. When his fare was demanded he presented the transfer, but the conductor told him it did not entitle him to ride from Seventh and Broadway, refused to accept it, and demanded that respondent either pay a cash fare or leave the car. Respondent refused to comply, and explained that he had been told by the first conductor the transfer was good at Seventh and Broadway, that he did not have any money with which to pay a cash fare, and that he was hurrying "to go to work on a job." The conductor reiterated his refusal to accept the transfer and his demand that respondent pay a cash fare or get off the car, and, upon the latter's continued refusal to do either, attempted to eject him. Respondent resisted, the motorman was called, and together he and the conductor seized respondent. A struggle ensued, in the course of which respondent suffered the injuries complained of. Finally the conductor accepted the payment of a cash fare for respondent from one of the other passengers, and respondent was allowed to remain on the car. The cause was tried before the court without a jury. The court made findings of fact and conclusions of law, and, as already noted, rendered judgment for the respondent in the sum of $350.

[1] 1. Appellant concedes that respondent "was negligently misdirected by the conductor of the Grand avenue car," but claims that "a passenger, * * * with a ticket which affirmatively shows he has no right to transportation, cannot insist on the conductor * * * accepting his explanation against the face of the ticket," and that when respondent refused either to pay a cash fare or voluntarily to leave the car, the employés were justified in using the force necessary to eject him. This contention must be sustained. Section 2188 of the Civil Code provides:

"A passenger who refuses to pay his fare or to conform to any lawful regulation of the carrier, may be ejected from the vehicle by the carrier. But this must be done with as little violence as possible, and at any usual stopping-place or near some dwelling-house."

This section merely states the general rule which is thus expressed in 10 C. J. 730:

"A carrier has a right to adopt reasonable rules and regulations for the conduct, comfort, and protection of its passengers, and may enforce such rules or regulations by ejecting from its cars or premises one who wrongfully fails or refuses to comply therewith. * * *"

See, also, Krueger v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 68 Minn. 445, 71 N. W. 683, 684, 64 Am. St. Rep. 487.

[2] In the case at bar, appellant offered in evidence "Bulletin No. 357, Notice to Conductors," which set forth certain of the regulations governing the acceptance of transfers. Among these regulations was the rule under which the second conductor acted in refusing to accept respondent's transfer at Seventh and Broadway. An objection to the admission in evidence of this bulletin was sustained, but it was marked for identification, "Defendant's Exhibit A," and is included in the record on appeal. Furthermore, W. G. Miller, the conductor who refused to accept respondent's transfer and a witness for appellant, testified with reference to said transfer:

"I told him I could not accept it; it was contrary to our rules to accept it only at First and Spring. * * * I told him at the time I handed it back to him that the transfer was only good where it was punched, First and Spring."

Was this a reasonable regulation? We think it was. As was said in the note to Shortsleeves v. Capital Traction Co., 28 App. D. C. 365, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 287:

"The right of a street railway company to designate the place of transfer of passengers from one car to another in making a continuous trip for one fare clearly falls within the power which common carriers possess to make reasonable rules and regulations for the conduct of their business. Such a regulation is frequently necessary to prevent crowding at transfer points and to insure honesty in the use of transfers."

See, also, Ex parte Lorenzen, 128 Cal. 431, 435, 61 Pac. 68, 50 L. R. A. 55, 79 Am. St. Rep. 47; Percy v. Metrop. St. Ry. Co., 58 Mo. App. 75. The principle thus announced is clearly applicable to the facts herein. In a city the size of Los Angeles, thousands of transfers must be issued daily. If it were held that a transfer, which shows on its face that it is "good only at First and Spring streets," must be accepted for passage at Seventh and Broadway upon the oral statement of the passenger that he had been misdirected by another conductor, it would follow that any other condition or limitation appearing on the transfer could be disregarded upon the ex parte declaration of a passenger. If this were so, it would be incumbent on the conductor to decide then and there whether the representation of the passenger was correct, and thus assume the risk of defrauding his employer. To make the conductor the judge of the truth of the pas-senger's statements against the conditions printed on the transfer itself would tend to demoralize the orderly conduct of the business of the carrier, and give rise to disputes and breaches of the peace. We think the correct and more practicable rule is that the passenger must present the transfer only at the place or places thereon indicated, and that the transfer is not valid for passage when presented elsewhere. It must be held, therefore, that the regulation under which rspondent's transfer was rejected was a reasonable one, and that, under section 2188 of the Civil Code, if appellant's employés used reasonable force to eject respondent, their conduct was justified.

Several authorities are cited by respondent in support of his contention that where a passenger is ejected from a car on the ground that a tendered transfer erroneously issued by another conductor is defective the carrier is liable for the ejection. None of these authorities is applicable here. In Sloane v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 111 Cal. 668, 44 Pac. 320, 32 L. R. A. 193, the plaintiff had been wrongfully deprived of her ticket by the first conductor. She was required to change cars, and the second conductor refused to accept her explanation of the loss of her ticket. She voluntarily left the car and sued to recover damages, not for personal injuries received in an attempt to eject her, as in the instant case, but for the humiliation, delay, and inconvenience primarily caused by the negligence of the first conductor and aggravated by the breach by the second conductor of the defendant's original contract. Appellant concedes that—"If the carrier has not furnished the passenger with the proper evidence of his right to transportation he has, notwithstanding, the right to such transportation, when he has acted in good faith and is without fault, and the carrier will be liable in damages if he is expelled from the car."

This is the well-established rule, but, to repeat, the injuries for which respondent here seeks damages were the result of his attempt to resist an ejection, and were not proximately caused by the appellant's negligence in misdirecting him as to the transfer point, and our conclusion is that a passenger who does not comply with the reasonable regulations of the carrier as to the proper transfer point, even though such noncompliance be the result of a misdirection by another of appellant's employés, is not justified in resisting an attempt to eject him from the car in the event of his refusal to pay a cash fare.

Clare v. Northwestern R. R. Co., 21 Cal. App. 214, 131 Pac. 323, may be distinguished on the same ground as the Sloane Case.

In Gorman v. So. Pac. Co., 97 Cal. 1, 31 Pac. 1112, 33 Am. St. Rep. 157, the plaintiff had paid his fare, and, upon the conductor's demanding it again, refused to pay a second time. It appeared that the conductor thereupon ejected him, using more force than was reasonably necessary so to do. It was properly held there was no regulation with which plaintiff was bound to comply that a passenger must pay his fare a second time, and recovery was allowed for damages resulting from the use by the conductor of excessive force.

[3] 2. Since appellant is not liable for the attempt of its employés to eject respondent, if such attempt was not accompanied by unnecessary force, we shall next consider whether there was unnecessary force. The theory upon which the court decided the case is made apparent from its ruling in excluding certain testimony of the witness Miller:

"Q. Did you or the motorman use any more force than was necessary?

"The Court: I think objection would be good to that. It is evident they didn't use enough." (Italics ours.)

It is plain that the court regarded it as immaterial whether or not the force used by the conductor and motorman was excessive, on the theory that the respondent was entitled to recover if any force was used. And the findings, after setting forth the misdirection by the first conductor, the respondent's boarding of the East First street car, the refusal of the second conductor to accept the transfer, and respondent's explanation, state that the conductor seized the respondent by the arm, "pulled him from his seat to the rear platform of said car, and then attempted to eject him from said car"; that he was unsuccessful in removing respondent, and called the motorman, whereupon "both conductor and said motorman seized plaintiff by the hands and coat collar, and with great force pulled, twisted, and jerked plaintiff in the attempt to eject him from said car." It will be noted it is not found that any "unnecessary" or "excessive" force or violence was used. Giving the findings the construction most favorable to respondent, it cannot be said that, either expressly or by implication, they indicate appellant's employés used more force than was reasonably necessary to remove respondent from the car. For it might be necessary to use "great" force in a justifiable attempt to remove respondent. In the absence of a finding of "excessive" or "unnecessary" force, or language of similar import, we must assume that it was because of its misconception of the law on the first point we have discussed, and not because appellant's employés used excessive force in attempting to eject respondent, that the court gave judgment in his favor.

[4, 5] Inasmuch as the cause must be remanded for a new trial, we shall consider the assignment of error in the court's refusal to allow Miller to answer the question already quoted. The testimony should have been admitted. Upon the issue of excessive force it was competent for appellant to controvert the evidence of respondent tending to show that the employés used such force. Respondent defends the ruling on the ground that the question called for a conclusion of the witness. But no objection whatever was interposed to the question by respondent. It is clear that the only ground upon which the proffered testimony was rejected was that appellant's employés did not use "enough" force to remove respondent from the car, and not that the question called for a conclusion of the witness. In this state of the record respondent will not be heard to urge for the first time on appeal that the question was not properly framed.

Judgment reversed.

NATIONAL PACIFIC OIL CO. v. WATSON.

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 22, 1920. Rehearing Denied in Bank. Nov. 18, 1920.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⟸334(6)—Purchaser entitled to recover payments made, on his rescission of contract.

If a contract of sale of land is rightfully rescinded by the buyer by reason of a breach by the seller in failing to give possession, the seller is liable for the return of the money which he has received.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⟸214(1)—Assignee of contract entitled to recover payments made by assignor on rescission.

One, who holds a contract for sale of land by assignment, and because of a breach of the contract by the seller rightfully rescinds it, has the right, by virtue of his ownership of the contract, to recover all moneys paid under the contract, whether paid by him or by those who held the contract prior to him.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⟸159—Three years and nine months more than reasonable time for giving possession.

Three years and nine months was more than a reasonable time for the vendor of the land to delay compliance with his obligation to give vendee, under contract of sale, possession of the land, and vendee had right to rescind.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⟸157—Immediate possession construed by parties to obligate vendor to place vendee in possession.

A provision in a contract to give a quitclaim deed to land that "said buyer shall be entitled to immediate possession of said premises" held to evidence an obligation on part of the vendor to put the vendee in peaceable possession, and not simply that the vendee was privileged to take possession if he could get it, in view of subsequent arrangements between the parties, on discovering that the property was claimed by third persons by adverse possession, whereby vendor was not to receive more installments until vendee was put in possession.

5. Novation ⟸4—Arrangement held not novation of contract of sale.

An arrangement, after it was discovered that immediate possession could not be given under a contract of sale of land, relating to matter of payments, in view of continued failure of defendant to give possession, held not a novation of the contract of sale, but only a change in the agreement of the parties as to when the purchase price should be paid.

6. Pleading ⟸32—Legal effect of writing set forth need not be alleged.

Where a writing is set forth in a pleading, it is not necessary to plead its legal effect in addition.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⟸116—Tender of purchase price before rescission not necessary where futile.

A purchaser, under a contract of sale of land, in order to rescind by reason of failure of defendant to perform his obligation to place him in possession need not make tender of the balance of the purchase price due, where it would have been wholly futile, in that defendant admittedly could not give possession.

8. Vendor and purchaser ⟸52—Agreement to convey by quitclaim may obligate putting vendee in possession.

The rule that an agreement to convey by quitclaim does not require the vendor to convey a good title, and Civ. Code, § 1113, have no application to a case where from other considerations it is plain that contract is conditioned upon the vendee's being let into actual possession.

9. Vendor and purchaser ⟸114—No waiver of right to rescind contract to purchase on failure to put in possession.

Although vendee in contract of sale of land waived right to rescind for vendor's failure to give possession immediately, as required by contract, by entering into an arrangement with the vendor whereby the payments were placed in escrow until such time as vendor might give peaceable possession, right to rescind for failure of the seller to perform within a reasonable time was not thereby waived.

10. Vendor and purchaser ⟸116—No demand for possession necessary, where possession could not be given.

It was not necessary for vendee, under a contract of sale, in advance of rescinding, to demand possession, where it was definitely understood on both sides that the vendor could not give possession.

Goodwin & Morgrage, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gibbon & Shelton and W. C. Shelton, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff in an action brought upon the alleged breach of a contract for the sale of real property to recover payments on account of the purchase price made the defendant as vendor. The facts are practically undisputed, and are these:

The defendant by written contract agreed to sell to one Reynolds a certain 40 acres of land in the oil district of Kern county for $25,000. Although it is not so specified in the contract, which calls directly for the sale of the land as distinguished from a sale of the defendant's title, the land was government land, and the defendant's only title thereto was under an unpatented mineral location. Twenty-five hundred dollars of the purchase price was paid down, and the balance was to be paid in subsequently maturing installments. Upon the payment of the last installment, the vendee was to receive a quitclaim deed to the property. Time was expressly made of the essence of the contract, and it was also provided that the buyer should be entitled to immediate possession and to the right to take oil from the property. Shortly after the making of the contract, Reynolds, the buyer, assigned it to the Consolidated Midway Oil Company.

Not long after the execution of the contract and before the date fixed for the payment of the first deferred installment of the purchase price, it was found that the land was, and since before the execution of the contract had been, in the adverse possession of others than the defendant, and that, because of this adverse possession, the vendee and his assignee could not have possession under the contract. To cover this situation, a further arrangement was made, evidenced by written escrow instructions signed by both parties, whereby the installments of the purchase price as they became due were to be paid to a certain bank, to be by it paid over to the defendant, when, but not before, peaceable possession of the land was delivered to the assignee of the buyer. The escrow instructions contain no provision whatever for the possible contingency that peaceable possession might not be delivered for an indefinite time or at all, and in fact make no mention whatever of that contingency.

Three installments, aggregating $12,500, were paid into the bank as they became due. When the last of them was paid the property was still being held adversely, and shortly thereafter, and before the next installment became due, a third arrangment was made, also in writing, whereby the money in escrow was divided between the parties, $7,500 to the vendor and $5,000 to the vendee's assignee, and it was provided that no further payments on the purchase price need be made until 30 days after the delivery of possession, when all of the purchase price unpaid, including the $5,000 to be received back from the escrow by the vendee's assignee, should be paid. In the case of this arrangement also, although it was called forth by the continuing inability of the defendant to deliver possession, no provision is made for the contingency that such inability might continue indefinitely.

The money in escrow was divided in accordance with this last arrangement, and not long afterwards the vendee's assignee in turn assigned the contract to the plaintiff. The date of the last arrangement was May 27, 1910. After it was made, the inability of the defendant to give possession continued, and from time to time proposals were made on both sides for a final settlement of the transaction. None of these proposals, however, came to anything, and after the matter had run along in this fashion until February 18, 1914, with the defendant still unable to give possession, the plaintiff notified the defendant that because of his failure and inability in this respect it demanded back the $10,000 which the defendant had received, $2,500 as the original payment on account, and $7,500 from the money in escrow. This demand, which was practically a notice of rescission, was refused, and the plaintiff immediately brought the present action, which resulted, as we have said, in a judgment in its favor, from which the defendant appeals.

[1] It is manifest at once that the primary question in the case is whether or not the defendant's continued failure and inability to give possession from the date of the last arrangement between the parties, May 27, 1910, to the date of the notice of rescission, February 18, 1914, a period of nearly four years, constituted a breach of the contract in such an essential particular as to entitle the plaintiff to rescind it. If it did, the contract having been rightfully rescinded, the defendant is liable for the return of the money which he received. Before considering this question, however, there is another, which should be disposed of preliminarily. It is contended on behalf of the defendant that, even if the contract were properly rescinded, the defendant's obligation to return the money he received is one to return it to the parties who paid it, who were not the plaintiff, but the original vendee, Reynolds, and his immediate assignee, the Consolidated Midway Oil Company, that the plaintiff cannot recover except as the assignee of these last-named parties of the right to the money, and that the assignment of the contract to the plaintiff was not an assignment of this right. The crux of the contention, of course, lies in the proposition that an assignment of the contract was not an assignment of the right to recover moneys paid upon the contract in case of its breach and consequent rescission.

[2] It is to be noted that the assignment of the contract was prior to the rescission, so that upon this point the question is, has one, who holds a contract by assignment, and who because of a breach of the contract rightfully rescinds it, the right, by virtue simply of his ownership of the contract, to recover all moneys paid under the contract, whether paid by him or by those who held the contract prior to him. The answer to this question is not doubtful. It is said, first, that the money must be regarded as money in the defendant's hands had and received for the use of those who paid it, who were not the plaintiff, but his assignors. But this begs the question. It is true, that, the contract being rescinded, the money paid upon it is considered as if originally paid the defendant for the use and benefit of those paying it. But the real question is, Did the assignment by those parties of the contract under which they paid the money have the effect of assigning their right to recover that money in case the contract were subsequently rescinded for a breach. Upon this point it would seem plain enough that when the assignor assigns the contract, he intends to assign, and does assign, all benefits under it, including the benefit of any payments that have been made on account of it.

It is said, second, that the recovery of the money is upon an implied contract to repay, that this implied contract is wholly distinct from the contract of sale, which is ended by the rescission, and that the conclusion follows that an assignment of the contract of sale is not an assignment of the separate and distinct implied contract for the return of the moneys. This argument is in point, but the fallacy of it lies in its failure to appreciate the essential character of the so-called implied contract. The implied contract has no existence in fact. It is but a fiction of law, designed for the sole purpose of affording relief under the limited forms of action permitted by the common law and necessitated by the fact that only certain forms of action were recognized by the common law. Essentially the so-called implied contract is, in such a case as the present, but a remedy given for a breach of the contract. In this respect it differs in no wise from the other remedy afforded by law as distinguished from equity, that of the recovery of damages. The two remedies are inconsistent in the sense that the injured party cannot have both, but if the breach goes to the essence of the contract, he can have one or the other, as he chooses. They are nothing more than different kinds or measures of relief for the same wrong. This being the case, it follows that he, who is the owner of the breached contract and who by virtue of his ownership is the one entitled to whatever relief the law may give for the breach, is the one entitled to recover the moneys paid on the contract, since that recovery is but a form of relief given by law for the breach.

The exact contention which the defendant now makes was made in Latimer v. Capay Valley Lumber Co., 137 Cal. 286, 290, 70 Pac. 82, and the same answer was given to it, although in a much more condensed form. We would not have felt under any necessity to amplify the discussion in that case or to do more than refer to it as determinative, had it not been for the importance given the point by the District Court of Appeal, which, because of it, reversed the judgment. We deem it only right to say, however, that the responsibility for not following this previous decision rests primarily, not with the District Court of Appeal, but with counsel for the respondent. The point was clearly and emphatically urged by the appellant in his opening brief. No adequate reply whatever was made in the respondent's brief, and in particular attention was not called to the fact that the point had already been determined both in this state and elsewhere. The court was practically left in the dark to grope its way as best it might, and it was not until this court was petitioned for a hearing that attention was called to the fact that the question was now hardly a controvertible one, in view of the decision referred to, a decision which would undoubtedly have been followed by the District Court of Appeal if it had been brought to its notice.

Coming now to the primary question in the case, it is, as we have said, this: Was the defendant's continued inability and failure to give possession for a period of nearly four years after the last arrangement between the parties a breach of the contract in such an essential particular as to give the plaintiff a right to rescind it? It is evident at once that if there was a breach of the contract in this respect, it was a breach in so essential a particular as to give the right to rescind. A more important feature of the performance of the contract than that of giving possession it would be difficult to imagine, and a failure of performance in this respect would go to the very essence of the contract. Without possession, the contract was practically valueless.

[3] It is also evident that if the defendant was obligated to give possession, the lapse of nearly four years was more than a reasonable time for performance by him. Time is expressly made of the essence of the contract, and it is stipulated that the vendee should have the right to possession forthwith. The very nature of the property, oil land, with its sharp fluctuations in value and the possibility of its being drained of oil either by those in adverse possession or by wells adjoining it, would without any express provision that time was of the essence, make it of the essence that possession as contracted for be had within a short time. The period of three years and nine months, during which possession was delayed, was more than a reasonable time for the vendor to comply with his obligation in this particular, if such obligation existed. The finding of the lower court that possession had been delayed for more than a reasonable time was clearly correct.

[4] The question, therefore, is reduced to the simple one as to whether or not the vendor was under any obligation to put the vendee in peaceable possession. The language of the original contract is that "said buyer shall be entitled to immediate possession of said premises." Simply taking this by itself, it might be said to mean either one of two things, either that the buyer is entitled to have possession from the seller, or, as was held of very similar language in Tewksbury v. Laffan, 1 Cal. 129, that he was privileged to take possession if he could get it, but without any responsibility on the part of the seller to see that he did get it. But while, perhaps, either of these constructions is possible, taking the language by itself alone, the parties themselves, by their subsequent conduct, plainly took the view that the vendor was bound to give possession, and this is conclusive as to their real intent and the true construction of the contract. The conduct by which the parties manifested their view of the contract was the making of the two subsequent arrangements as the result of the continued inability of the defendant to give possession. There would have been no occasion for making these arrangements, if the vendor were under no obligation to give possession, since the failure of the vendee in that case to obtain possession would not have affected the rights of the parties, and the defendant could have insisted that the payments of the purchase price be made to him as the contract provided. Instead of this, it was provided by the first arrangement that all payments should go into escrow until he gave possession, and by the second arrangement, the vendor's inability to give possession still continuing, that the money already in escrow should be divided, and no further payments whatever be required until possession was given. These arrangements both plainly interpreted the original contract as requiring possession of the defendant, and imply that that obligation was a continuing one.

[5] It is contended on behalf of the defendant that the last arrangement was a novation, meaning by that that it was in complete substitution for the previous contract and arrangement between the parties. But there is not a word in the new arrangement to that effect, and it refers to the original contract, and then goes on to provide merely for the matter of payments in view of the continued failure of the defendant to give possession. It does not purport to do anything more than to change the agreement of the parties as to when the purchase price should be paid. It was clearly intended simply to change the old contract in that particular and nothing more. Considering together the original contract and the two modifications made of it, the understanding between the parties was very evidently that the vendor should put the vendee in possession, and that if he did not do so there was an essential failure to perform upon his part.

[6] The conclusion just stated is practically decisive of the case, but there are a number of points made on behalf of the defendant which should perhaps be noticed. It is claimed that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, for the reason that, while it sets forth in full the three writings between the parties, it fails to allege that by these writings the defendant was bound to deliver possession to the vendee. But such an allegation would be nothing more than pleading the legal effect of the writings, and the rule is familiar that where a writing is set forth in a pleading it is not necessary to plead its legal effect in addition.

[7] It is contended that no tender of the balance of the purchase price was alleged or shown. But such tender was not necessary, since it would have been wholly futile. The plaintiff had the right to insist as a condition of the tender that it receive possession, and this admittedly the defendant could not give.

[8] It is urged that the deed called for by the contract was a quitclaim deed only, and that the rule is that an agreement to convey by quitclaim does not require the vendor to convey a good title. This may or may not be the rule in this state, where, unlike many states, warranty deeds are not usual, and the form of deed usually employed, a a grant deed, does not, any more than a quitclaim deed, imply a warranty of good title. Section 1113, Civ. Code. Furthermore, we are not concerned in this case with the question as to whether the vendor had to give a good title, but with that as to his being required to give peaceable possession. But, however all this may be, the conclusive consideration is that the rule stated by counsel is at most a rule as to the construction and meaning to be given a contract. It can have no application to a case where from other considerations it is plain that, although only a quitclaim deed was called for, the contract was conditional upon the vendee being let into actual possession. Of this sort is the present case.

[9] It is next objected that a party desiring to rescind must not subsequently affirm the contract, and must rescind promptly on the occurrence of the cause for rescission, and that in this case the vendee waived the right to rescind upon the failure of the defendant to deliver possession immediately, both by making the two arrangements which in effect affirmed the contract and by failing to rescind promptly at that time. The answer to this is that, while the vendee for both these reasons undoubtedly waived or lost the right to rescind for the vendor's failure to give possession immediately upon the execution of the contract, that is not the ground upon which rescission is now claimed. By the arrangements between the parties, the vendor's original obligation to give immediate possession was transformed into one to give possession within a reasonable time after the making of the last arrangement, that of May 27, 1910. It is for the failure to perform this obligation that the plaintiff finally sought to rescind, and there was no waiver of this failure in any manner.

[10] The point is also made that the plaintiff failed to demand possession of the defendant in advance of endeavoring to rescind, and that without such demand the defendant could not be put in the wrong. Such a demand would have been necessary, if the defendant had been in a position where he could have complied with it. But he was not, and the demand would have been wholly futile. At the time the plaintiff demanded back the payments on the purchase price, it was definitely understood on both sides that the defendant could not give possession, and the plaintiff's demand for the money was made upon that basis. There are no further points which require discussion.

Judgment affirmed.

OUTER HARBOR DOCK & WHARF CO. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES. (Civ. 2076.)

1. Taxation ⊂⊃178—Leasehold interests in tidelands subject to tax.

Leasehold interests in tidelands belonging to the state are subject to taxation.

2. Courts ⊂⊃91(1)—First of two conflicting decisions of Supreme Court deemed wrong.

Where there are two conflicting decisions of the Supreme Court, the former must be deemed wrong and the latter right.

3. Courts ⊂⊃100(3)—Taxes paid not recovered under theory of right under a decision overruled.

Decision of the Supreme Court, to the effect that leasehold interests in tidelands belonging to the state were not subject to taxation, did not have the effect of a statute, and one paying taxes on such an interest under protest was not entitled to a refund, where the Supreme Court subsequently, in another case, declared such interests to be taxable.

4. Pleading ⊂⊃214(1)—Demurrer admits facts alleged.

A demurrer admits the facts as alleged.

5. Taxation ⊂⊃178, 180—Possessory right in improvements on public lands subject to tax; improvements not taxable if part of land.

Where improvements made on tidelands owned by the state have become a part of the land to the extent of the reversionary interest, or the fee, they are not subject to taxation, but the lessee has a possessory interest that is subject to taxation, Const. art. 13, § 2, providing for separate assessment of land and improvements, not converting realty into personalty.

6. Taxation ⊂⊃543(3)—Actions for refunded taxes must be filed within three years.

In view of Pol. Code, § 3804, actions cannot be maintained for the repayment of taxes paid under protest, unless brought within three years.

7. Taxation ⊂⊃543(3)—Action to recover taxes may be brought within three years.

Pol. Code, § 3819, providing that one, claiming an assessment to be void, may bring action within six months to recover back the tax paid, affords a concurrent remedy with that afforded by section 3804, providing that claims for refunds must be filed within three years, and an action may be brought any time within three years after the payment of the tax.

8. Estoppel ⊂⊃62(4)—City not estopped from levying tax by reason of action to quiet title.

A city was not estopped from assessing taxes against a leasehold interest in tidelands owned by the state, although a suit by it against the lessee was pending to quiet title to and obtain possession of the property; the lessee actually remaining in possession and enjoying the fruits of its claim.

9. Taxation ⊂⊃537—No recovery of undue assessment paid; the remedy being an application to proper tribunal for relief.

When a party believes that his property has been unduly assessed, in order to obtain relief he must make application to the tribunal created for that purpose, and cannot pay the assessment under protest and subsequently bring an action for a refund; his remedy being an application to the proper tribunal.

10. Estoppel ⊂⊃62(2)—Not to be lightly invoked against power to levy tax.

The doctrine of estoppel is not to be lightly invoked against the exercise of the sovereign power of the state to levy and collect taxes for the support of the government.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Actions by the Outer Harbor Dock & Wharf Company against the City of Los Angeles.

Judgments for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Judgment in one case affirmed, and judgment in other reversed, with directions.

Andrews, Toland & Andrews, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Chas. S. Burnell, Jesse E. Stephens, and William P. Mealey, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal involves two cases between the same parties in which the same questions are raised, and which by stipulation are presented in one record and as one appeal. The actions were brought to compel the city of Los Angeles to refund taxes alleged to have been illegally and erroneously collected by the tax officers of said city during the years 1911, 1912, 1913, and 1914, from plaintiff, on assessments against "improvements" upon the tidelands within the city of Los Angeles and fronting upon the navigable waters of Los Angeles harbor, and for the years 1915 and 1916 against plaintiff's leasehold interest in a certain wharf and two warehouses upon said tidelands, and for the year 1915, against plaintiff's leasehold interest in said tidelands, said tidelands being owned by the state of California and held by plaintiff under lease from the city of San Pedro, the municipal predecessor of the city of Los Angeles. The lease was made in February, 1906, and was approved and ratified by the Legislature by an act of March 23, 1907. The lease was rewritten in July, 1907, in order to conform to certain changes in the harbor lines as made by the United States War Department. The general scope and purpose of said lease may be gathered from the following quotation from Koyer v. Miner, 172 Cal. 448, 156 Pac. 1023:

"This lease and agreement were given by the city as a means for improving the harbor of San Pedro, and facilitating navigation and commerce therefrom. The agreement provided that Miner and his successors should erect a sea wall on the harbor front line as soon as same was located by the federal government, should improve the same for purposes of navigation, should reserve a certain portion thereof to the city for a public harbor front, should fill in and reclaim the land between said front and the shore, and dedicate appropriate parts thereof to public use for streets, and that he and his successors should thereupon have * * * a lease thereof for the term of 50 years."

Plaintiff entered upon said work as required by said lease, and within the time therein provided made and constructed said improvements. In addition to said work of reclamation the lessee proceeded to build and construct bulkheads, warehouses, dry docks, and other structures. The said wharf and warehouses were constructed as a necessary part of the reclamation, and are imbedded in or permanently rest upon said land. For the years 1911 to 1914, inclusive, the city assessed, without further designation or segregation, all the "improvements" upon said leased tidelands. For the recovery of the money so collected the first action herein was brought. The second action was to recover money paid as taxes upon an assessment as follows:

"1915. Leasehold interest in tidelands, Val. $222,200, tax $3,198.78; two warehouses situated on tidelands, Val. $75,000, tax, $1,080.02; 5,200 feet of wharf situated on tidelands, Val. $195,000, tax $2,807.26. 1916. Two warehouses situated on tidelands, Val. $75,000, tax, $855.00; 5,200 feet wharf situated on tidelands, Val. $195,000, tax, $2,233.00."

These taxes were paid involuntarily and under protest and to prevent a sale of plaintiff's property. Thereafter plaintiff presented to and filed with the city clerk of the city its claim, duly verified, demanding the repayment to it of said taxes. Said demand was thereafter rejected at a regular meeting of the city council of said city. Subsequently said actions were instituted for the recovery of said amounts. Demurrers to the said complaints were sustained by the court without leave to amend; and from the judgments rendered thereon the appeals were taken.

[1-3] The first point made by appellant is that—

"Plaintiff's leasehold interest in said tidelands was not and is not a property to be assessed or taxed and the assessment and collection of taxes against the same for the years 1915–1916 were, and each thereof was, erroneous and illegal."

In support of its position appellant cites San Pedro, etc., Ry. Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 167 Cal. 425, 139 Pac. 1071, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 991. It was, indeed, in that case expressly held that—

"A leasehold is property under certain circumstances and for certain purposes, but it is not property for purposes of taxation under our revenue and fiscal laws, notwithstanding the fee is owned by the state, and hence is not taxable."

But that decision was just as clearly and unequivocally overruled in San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 179 Pac. 393, wherein it is held that—

"Leasehold interests in tide lands belonging to the state are subject to taxation."

That there might be no possible doubt of the effect of the later decision, it was declared therein:

"Upon the views thus expressed, it follows that the decision in 167 Cal. 425, 139 Pac. 1071, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 991, must be deemed overruled."

It is due, however, the learned counsel for appellant to say that their opening brief was filed before said later decision was rendered. Respondent in its answering brief, having called attention to said case in 179 Pac., appellant takes this position:

"We had a right to rely upon the declared law of the state at that time, and we did rely upon that case as the law, and we paid the tax as in the case of any other erroneous and illegal assessment and collection of taxes, and to avoid a seizure and sale of our property, and thereafter instituted proceedings to recover the same as provided by law. Our money and our right to recover our property became vested on the strength of the former ruling of the Supreme Court in effect at that time,"

—and, it is further declared that the former ruling in the San Pedro Case was the declared law of the state for four years and was as effective as a statute. Hence it is argued that the collection of said tax was unlawful and could not be validated by a subsequent decision to the contrary, any more than the operation of a statute in full force and effect would be nullified by a subsequent repeal. Before considering the citations, we may remark that if said decisions had been in the inverse order, if, for instance, in 1914, the Supreme Court had decided that such assessment was entirely legal, and in 1919 that it was illegal, appellant could hardly derive any comfort from the doctrine that a decision of the Supreme Court has the effect of a statute. However, as in two conflicting decisions the former must be deemed wrong, and the latter right, in the case suggested, appellant having paid the tax, it would undoubtedly appear that, by reliance upon a wrong decision, appellant had been injured, and therefore, having paid out money to which the tax collector was not entitled, in equity and good conscience the money should be refunded. But the case here is different, inasmuch as appellant paid to the tax collector what was due, although the Supreme Court had held that it was not a legal tax. How can it be said that appellant was injured by doing right, although it was erroneously thought to be wrong?

How does the question appear in the light of the cases cited by appellant? In Kelley v. Rhoads, 7 Wyo. 160, 51 Pac. 593, 39 L. R. A. 594, 75 Am. St. Rep. 904, it is said:

"The effect of a decision of the Supreme Court construing a statute renders it the law for the time being as so construed. Parties have a right to act upon such a decision, and no injury ought to be allowed to result, by reason of a dependence thereon, if the decision is subsequently changed, any more than in case of a repeal of a statute."

But in that case the change in the decisions affected only the remedy to be pursued by the party claiming to have been illegally assessed. There was no conflict in the decisions as to the validity of the assessment, and the claimant therein acted upon and in accordance with the earlier decision, whereas herein appellant acted contrary and in opposition to the earlier decision.

In Taylor v. Ypsilanti, 105 U. S. 60, 26 L. Ed. 1008, it is said:

"The rights of the plaintiff, as the owner of bonds issued under a statute which, when passed, was valid by the laws of Michigan, as declared and acted upon by departments of its government, are not affected by decisions of the Supreme Court of the state rendered after the railroad company, to whose rights plaintiff succeeded, had earned the bonds under contract with the city, made in conformity with the statute."

In that case it is clear that to have made the bonds subject to the later decision would have been to impair vested contract rights, and the Supreme Court properly followed its own adjudications in similar cases. It is not necessary to notice specifically the other decisions of the United States Supreme Court further than to quote from Douglas v. Pike Co., 101 U. S. 687, 25 L. Ed. 968, the following clear statement of the generally recognized principle:

"The true rule is to give a change of judicial construction in respect to a statute the same * * * operation on contracts and existing contract rights that would be given to legislative amendment, that is to say, make it prospective, but not retroactive. After a statute has been settled by judicial construction, the construction becomes, so far as contract rights acquired under it are concerned, as much a part of the statute as the text itself, and a change of decision is to all intents and purposes the same in its effect on contracts as an amendment of the law by means of a legislative enactment."

The two California decisions In re Dorris, 93 Cal. 612, 29 Pac. 244, and Schoonover v. Birnbaum, 148 Cal. 548, 83 Pac. 999, add nothing to the situation. They simply emphasize the reluctance of appellate tribunals to overrule former decisions when the effect would be to disturb and impair vested interests.

But, as already intimated, we are not dealing with a case of contract, or contract rights acquired under the former decision. It is, rather, an instance of the payment of a just obligation to the government, although mistakenly supposed at the time to be unjust. Of course, if in such cases a decision of the Supreme Court is to have the full effect of a statute, the contention of appellant would be sound, but, as we understand it, that rule is to be applied only when considerations of justice and equity demand it. Such is not the case here.

It is perhaps unnecessary to add that if said decision in 167 Cal. had been rendered in this cause, it would, of course, constitute the law of the case, and we would be bound by it, but since this is entirely different litigation, we are at liberty to apply the just and correct rule.

[4] Again, it is claimed that the "improvements" were improperly assessed, since they were exempt as a part of the realty. In response to the suggestion of respondent that the lease did not contain any agreement to that effect, or that they should become the property of the lessor, appellant points out that the complaints expressly allege that said improvements belong to the public, and that, since it appears that the lessee affixed said improvements to the land of the lessor without any agreement permitting their removal, it follows as a matter of law, by virtue of section 1013 of the Civil Code, that the improvements belong to the owner of the land. The demurrer, of course, admits the facts as alleged, and we must therefore necessarily consider appellant as the owner of said improvements.

[5] The question then arises whether they are assessable. That the land and the improvements are to be separately assessed for purposes of revenue is not disputed. The Constitution of the state so provides (article 13, § 2), and the Legislature and the courts have recognized the validity of such procedure. San Francisco v. McGinn, 67 Cal. 110, 7 Pac. 187. The separate assessment, however, cannot in the least affect the character of the improvements or their ownership. If they constitute real property, the assessment does not and cannot convert them into personalty. If they belong to the public, they will remain so, notwithstanding they have been separately assessed. If the entire title to the improvements belongs to the state, they are not taxable at all any more than is the land itself. But, like the land, they are subject to a possessory right in a private person, while the fee is in the state. Such is the case here as disclosed by the complaint. The land, and the improvements which have become a part of the land, to the extent of the reversionary interest or the fee, undoubtedly belonged to the public; but appellant had a possessory interest, the right to the use and occupation of the land and the improvements, and that was subject to taxation. This is made clear by a careful consideration of said decision in 179 Pac., and the cases therein cited. This possessory right, therefore, and no more, should have been assessed to appellant. Such was the course pursued as to the land itself, the assessment being against the "leasehold interest in tidelands."

As to the improvements a similar situation exists as to the assessments for 1915 and 1916. It is true that the complaint alleged:

"That within the time provided by law, the assessor of the city of Los Angeles, without authority or right so to do did assess the said leasehold interest in said lands and the improvements on said leased land, above described, to this plaintiff, * * * at and for the following sums," etc.

But when we turn to the exhibits attached to the complaint containing the demand that was made upon the treasury for the return of the money claimed to have been illegally exacted, we find it recited by appellant that the assessment was made upon and against "the possessory interest of claimant in and to two warehouses," and "against and upon the possessory interest of claimant in and to 5,200 feet of wharf," etc. While the express allegation of the complaint might leave the matter in doubt, therefore, whether it was the complete title or merely the possessory right that was assessed, taking in view the exhibits, we must conclude that the assessment was levied upon the interest that was subject to taxation, namely, the right to the possession and use of said improvements under the terms of said lease.

The case is different as to the assessments for the earlier years. The allegation as to 1911 is:

"The assessor of the city of Los Angeles, without authority or right so to do, did assess the said improvements on said leased land above described, under the designation of 'improvements on leased land' to the plaintiff."

The allegations are similar as to 1912, 1913, and 1914. The claims presented to the treasurer also recite that said taxes were levied and assessed against "said improvements on said leased tidelands." It cannot be doubted that such assessment covers the entire title and interest in and to said improvements. If there had been a similar assessment of the land, no one would dispute that it included the entire interest. If the leasehold or possessory right alone had been intended, it should have been so designated. The reversionary interest, however, both in the land and the improvements, was not subject to taxation, and since the assessment of the improvements included this interest and is indivisible, it is difficult to see how it can be sustained.

Respondent, though, claims that the decision in 67 Cal. is to the contrary. Therein it was said:

"It is not necessary to follow and answer in detail the various reasons given by defendant why he should not be held liable; it is sufficient to say that, for the purposes of revenue, the Legislature of this state has observed a distinction between real estate and improvements, and that distinction has been recognized by this court. * * * We are of opinion that, for the purposes of revenue, the defendant was the owner of the property assessed, and that he is liable for the taxes."

But in that case attention was not directed to the distinction between the possessory right and the title to the improvements. Indeed, it was claimed by the city that McGinn was the owner of said improvements, and entitled to remove them, and it was so found by the trial court. While ownership was denied by him, yet his counsel in their opening brief filed in the Supreme Court declared:

"There is no admission that the improvements belong to defendant, but that proposition is immaterial under the statutes,"

—the main contention being that under the contract of the parties the city was obligated to pay the taxes.

A recent decision upon the subject is the case of City of Oakland v. Albers Bros. Milling Co., 184 Pac. 868, wherein it was held that improvements erected by the lessee upon land belonging to the public were not subject to taxation. It is true that in the lease therein it was expressly provided that the improvements should be the property of the city, while herein a similar result is effected by operation of the statute. The material fact, though, appears to be the same; that is, that the improvements belonged to the public. In that case, as in this, the assessment was to the lessee upon "the buildings and improvements as improvements on leased land." An examination of the briefs in that case discloses that the attention of the appellate court was called to the fact that "a tax on the leasehold interest of the defendant or on its beneficial use of the property of the plaintiff (either land or improvements), is not the subject of this controversy."

[6, 7] It was also emphasized in the briefs for respondent that in the McGinn Case the trial court had found that the improvements therein belonged to McGinn, and the Supreme Court seemed satisfied with that finding. If the improvements belonged to McGinn, of course, they were taxable, and the conclusion of the Supreme Court based upon that premise is unassailable.

But section 3804 of the Political Code, under which these actions were brought, provides that—

"No order for the refund of taxes, penalties or costs under this section shall be made except upon a verified claim therefor * * * which said claim must be filed within three years after the making of the payment sought to be refunded."

It appears from the complaint herein that the claims for the repayment of the taxes for 1911 and 1912 were not filed within said three years, and hence as to those amounts the demurrer was properly sustained. The same objection does not apply to 1913 and 1914, but respondent contends that the whole action is barred by reason of section 3819 of the Political Code, providing that one claiming his assessment to be void "may at any time within six months after such payment bring an action against the county, in the superior court to recover back the tax so paid under protest." But it was held by the Supreme Court in Stewart Law & Collection Co. v. Alameda County, 142 Cal. 660, 76 Pac. 481, that said section and section 3804 of the same Code afford concurrent remedies, and that, in accordance with the latter, the action may be brought within three years after the payment.

[8] Another important contention of appellant is that the municipality was estopped from levying this tax. The theory is based upon the fact that in August, 1911, the city commenced a suit against the company to quiet title to and to obtain possession of said property, averring in the complaint that said city was the owner and entitled to the possession of the property, and that the defendant had no interest therein or right to the possession thereof; that the trial of said action was had in the superior court in June, 1915, and that the decision of said court was in favor of said city as to a large portion of said property; "that, because of said claims of said city of Los Angeles to said property, and because of said litigation affecting the same, brought and instituted by the city of Los Angeles against this plaintiff, and still pending, said plaintiff has suffered great loss and damage in its possession thereof and in its operations thereon, and said property has been thereby at all of said dates and times herein mentioned, and still is, greatly depreciated in value, and rendered practically of no value for sale, rental, or any other purpose, and should it be held by this honorable court that said property hereinabove described, or any part thereof, is or was, at any of the dates and times herein mentioned, taxable as against this plaintiff, plaintiff alleges that the assessed valuation placed thereon by said city assessor, as aforesaid, was and is greatly inflated and in excess of its said value, or any reasonable value, and that said value, if such or any assessment was or is lawful, should not be, nor should it be upon the whole thereof, fixed at more than the sum of $100,000." In support of its claim appellant cites Moore v. Morledge, 42 Iowa, 26; Iowa R. Land Co. v. Story Co., 36 Iowa, 48; Calhoun County v. Am. Emigrant Co., 93 U. S. 124, 23 L. Ed. 826.

In the first of these the county was under obligation to convey the lands to the railroad company, but it refused to do so, and in the meantime, and while the county was thus refusing to convey said lands to the railroad company, and was itself holding the title and denying the claim of the railroad company to it, the said county caused said lands to be taxed, and afterwards caused the same to be sold for such taxes. It was in view of this situation that the Supreme Court of Iowa said:

"Under these facts we do not stop to inquire what would be the rule respecting liability for taxes, as between vendor and purchaser, in cases where the latter, by performance of his contract, has become the owner, though the legal title is in the former, because we grounded our support of the plaintiff's case upon this plain rule of fair dealing and the broad principle of equity, that a party shall not wrongfully withhold the title to property and the benefits of ownership thereof from one entitled thereto and at the same time subject the property to burdens for the benefit of the party thus wrongfully withholding the title. In other words, the county having, during those years, denied the right and title under which the plaintiff claims, is now equitably estopped from asserting that it then had the title."

The later case from Iowa involved similar facts, and the Supreme Court based its decision upon the ruling in 36 Iowa, 48.

In the County of Calhoun Case, supra, the county in levying the tax violated its stipulation and agreement that the property should not be assessed, and in view of the bad faith of the county the Supreme Court of the United States deemed it proper to say:

"Corporations, quite as much as individuals, are held to a careful adherence to truth and uprightness in their dealings with other parties; nor can they be permitted, with impunity, to involve others in onerous obligations, by their misrepresentations or concealments, without being held to just responsibility for the consequences of their misconduct or bad faith."

In those cases, it is to be observed that a degree of perfidy characterized the conduct of the taxing power, and that the burden was wrongfully and unjustly imposed; whereas, in the case at bar, there is no suggestion of mala fides or oppression. We must assume that there was an honest difference of opinion as to whether appellant was entitled longer to remain in possession of the property, and we must remember that appellant actually did remain in possession all these years and enjoyed the fruits of its claim. This possessory right was subject to assessment; and, while it was actually enjoyed by appellant, we can see no injustice in requiring the payment of the tax. The situation is somewhat like that of American Emigrant Co. v. Iowa Railroad Land Co., 52 Iowa, 323, 3 N. W. 88. Therein, after referring to certain decisions, including two of those cited by appellant herein, it is said:

"We are now asked to go a step further, and hold, if the county brings an action to set aside a conveyance alleged to have been obtained by fraud, that it is estopped from levying taxes on the land conveyed. The proposition amounts to this: That if the county seeks to set aside the conveyance it is estopped therein by a levy of taxes, and if it levies taxes it is estopped from bringing an action to set aside the conveyance. We do not believe the estoppel should work both ways. Under the circumstances the county had done all it contracted to do. It never agreed not to bring an action to set aside the conveyance on the ground of fraud. The intervener received the conveyance subject to this contingency. The lands were therefore taxable."

[9] Of course, if there had been a final judgment in this case or if appellant had been deprived of the use and enjoyment of the property before the assessment was levied, we would have a different situation. But no judgment has been rendered, and appellant has remained in possession. There is an allegation, it is true, that the value of appellant's interest has greatly depreciated in consequence of said litigation, but manifestly, this was a consideration to be presented to the board of equalization. When a party believes that his property has been unduly assessed, in order to obtain relief, he must make application to the tribunal created for that purpose. Fall v. City of Marysville, 19 Cal. 391. There is no pretense that such course was pursued herein.

[10] It may be added that the doctrine of estoppel is not to be lightly invoked against the exercise of the sovereign power of the state to levy and collect taxes for the support of the government. This authority is so important and commanding that, assuredly, it cannot be successfully challenged upon the showing made herein. There may be instances of such gross injustice, as suggested by the decision cited, wherein it would be proper to say that the government is estopped to claim a tax, but, ordinarily, where a mistake is made in the assessment or levy or an unjust burden has been imposed, the aggrieved party, in order to obtain relief, must pursue the remedy provided by the statute.

We think the judgment in the case "No. B 52531" is correct, and should be affirmed; that the judgment in "No. B. 38539" is erroneous as to the assessments for 1913 and 1914, and that the complaint states a cause of action to recover the same, and that said judgment should be reversed and such further action taken as herein indicated.

It is so ordered.

OUTER HARBOR DOCK & WHARF CO. v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (Civ. 2077.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 21, 1920. Rehearing Denied May 21, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 17, 1920.)

Taxation ⟸180—Improvements on public lands taxable.

Though land may be exempt from taxation because it belongs to a city, the state, or to the United States, yet improvements, made thereon by an individual for his own use and benefit, are subject to assessment and taxation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by the Outer Harbor Dock & Wharf Company against the County of Los Angeles. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Andrews, Toland & Andrews, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. J. Hill and Robert B. Murphy, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought to compel the defendant to refund taxes assessed and collected on a wharf and two warehouses constructed by plaintiff on certain lands at San Pedro, owned by the state of California, and leased to the plaintiff. The case, in some general respects, is similar to that by the same plaintiff against the city of Los Angeles (No. 2076), the opinion in which is filed herewith (Outer Harbor Dock & Wharf Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 193 Pac. 137 [1]), and we shall not repeat the facts therein set forth. The only contention of appellant herein is that said improvements are exempt from taxation by reason of the fact that, being attached to the land, they are in contemplation of law a part of the land, and therefore in the same category as the land itself, which is not taxable, since it belongs to the state. In San Francisco v. McGinn, 67 Cal. 110, 7 Pac. 187, the question, though, is directly met and unequivocally decided contrary to appellant's claim. Therein a certain school lot in the city of San Francisco, which had been dedicated for school purposes forever (and therefore incapable of private ownership) was, pursuant to a special statute, leased to McGinn for a period of 50 years. The lease contained no provision relating to the construction of improvements by the lessee, or entitling the lessee to remove any improvements. McGinn constructed a four-story frame building, with basement, with a brick foundation, permantly imbedded in and attached to the soil. The improvements were assessed for taxation to McGinn for the year 1881–1882, and the suit was brought to collect said taxes. In McGinn's answer to the complaint he alleged that—

"Said property mentioned in the complaint, and the whole thereof, at the time of the making of said supposed assessments and the levying of said supposed taxes, * * * was, and the whole thereof, and still is, the property of the city and county of San Francisco, and lawfully dedicated to public school purposes forever, for the public school educational purposes of said city and county, and of the state of California.

"That the improvements mentioned in the complaint are and always have been permanently attached to and are part of said real estate and lot of land described in the complaint, and themselves real estate.

"That the property mentioned in the complaint as having been assessed is not, nor any part thereof, and has never been, personal property."

The foregoing indicates the theory of McGinn upon which he claimed his exemption from taxation. The lower court however, rejected his contention, and the Supreme Court affirmed an order denying the motion for a new trial. Appellant suggests that the opinion in said cause is extremely short, and that probably the question involved was not thoroughly considered. There is also an intimation that the case is distinguishable by reason of the fact that therein the fee was capable of private ownership. But, in answer, it may be said that the decision has not been overruled; on the contrary, has been recognized since as sound by the Supreme Court, and that on appeal substantially the same points were made by counsel for McGinn as appear in appellant's brief herein. It should be sufficient, therefore, to quote from said decision the following:

"It is not necessary to follow and answer in detail the various reasons given by defendant why he should not be held liable; it is sufficient to say that, for the purposes of revenue the Legislature of this state has observed a distinction between real estate and improvements, and that distinction has been recognized by this court. * * * We are of opinion that, for the purpose of revenue, the defendant was the owner of the property assessed, and that he is liable for the taxes."

Indeed, the rule is thoroughly settled in California that, though the land may be exempt from taxation because it belongs to the city, to the state, or to the United States, yet improvements made thereon by an individual for his own use and benefit are subject to assessment and taxation. In support of the proposition, we may cite these additional decisions of our Supreme Court: Fall v. City of Marysville, 19 Cal. 391; People v. Shearer, 30 Cal. 645; Los Angeles v. The Los Angeles Water Works Co., 49 Cal. 638; San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake R. R. Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 179 Pac. 393.

The doctrine of the law as thus expounded relieves us of the necessity for a consideration of other cases cited by the parties herein or any independent investigation of the subject.

It is due appellant's counsel to say that they have filed no reply brief, having concluded, no doubt, that respondent's position is impregnable.

The judgment is affirmed.

49 Cal. App. 206

HUGHES v. HUGHES. (Civ. 3501.)

1. Frauds, statute of ⊂⊃4—Oral agreement to convey property in consideration of marriage invalid.

Under Civ. Code, § 178, all contracts for marriage settlements must be in writing, and executed, acknowledged, or proved in like manner as a grant of land, and an antenuptial agreement, made orally by defendant husband to convey plaintiff wife valuable lands in consideration of marriage, etc., was invalid, not only under the statute specified, but also under the statute of frauds (Civ. Code, § 1624, subds. 3, 7).

2. Frauds, statute of ⊂⊃129(1) — Subsequent marriage does not lift bar of statutes from oral antenuptial agreement.

The fact that the parties were afterwards married does not operate to lift the bar of Civ. Code, §§ 178, 1624, subds. 3, 7, from defendant husband's oral antenuptial agreement to convey valuable land to plaintiff wife in consideration of the marriage.

3. Frauds, statute of ⊂⊃129(1) — Husband's making of will not part performance of invalid oral antenuptial agreement.

Subsequent making of defendant husband's will in favor of plaintiff wife following their marriage held not such part performance of the oral antenuptial agreement between them to make such will as to take the alleged contract out of Civ. Code, §§ 178, 1624, subds. 3, 7.

4. Frauds, statute of ⊂⊃129(1)—Act done by husband does not estop husband to invoke statute against wife seeking to enforce invalid antenuptial agreement.

An alleged act of performance by the husband, lifting the bar of the statute from the invalid oral antenuptial agreement sought to be enforced, not having been done by plaintiff wife, does not estop defendant husband from invoking the bar of the statute.

5. Frauds, statute of ⊂⊃119(1)—Husband not guilty of fraud entitling wife to enforcement of invalid antenuptial agreement.

Defendant husband, sued by plaintiff wife for specific performance of his invalid oral antenuptial agreement to convey valuable property to her in consideration of marriage, held not guilty of such actual fraud as to entitle plaintiff wife to equitable relief against him, despite the unenforceable character of the oral agreement under Civ. Code, §§ 178, 1624, subds. 3, 7.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by Gertrude O. Hughes against Thomas Hughes. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 193 Pac. 148.

Thos. K. Case, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

G. P. Adams, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action against her husband, seeking specific performance of an alleged oral antenuptial agreement to convey real and personal property after marriage. A demurrer to the amended complaint was sustained, and, plaintiff declining to further amend, judgment was entered for the defendant, from which plaintiff appeals.

It is alleged in the amended complaint that the defendant is 72 years of age, and possesses property of the value of more than $5.000,000. Between April 30, and December 24, 1918, the defendant importuned plaintiff to marry him, and offered, if she would do so, to convey to her property worth $600,000. To all these proposals the plaintiff turned a deaf ear. While the plaintiff was absent from the state of California, the defendant, pursuant to a design and intention to compel the plaintiff to marry him, moved himself and his personal belongings into the residence of plaintiff in Los Angeles, and there took up his abode. He caused to be inserted and published in various newspapers, statements to the effect that the plaintiff and himself were to be married about Christmas time, and caused copies of a photograph of plaintiff, which he took without her knowledge, or consent, from her residence, to be published in connection with these notices.

Finally, so it is alleged, the defendant, by pretending he was seriously ill, induced the plaintiff to go to him at Santa Barbara, where he then was. On her arrival there she found that the defendant was not ill, but had so represented himself, in order to cause her to come to him. She then learned for the first time of the stories the defendant had published in the newspapers concerning the approaching nuptials. She discovered that he had also invited guests to be present at a certain time, had provided a wedding dinner, secured a marriage license, and had arranged for a minister to be present to perform the wedding ceremony. Plaintiff still persisted in her refusal to marry defendant. He thereupon stated that he would be ruined politically, that his social standing would be impaired, he would be disgraced and humiliated, and his opportunity to represent the state of California in the United States Senate, which he asserted had been entirely arranged and determined upon between himself and the Governor of the state, would thereby be lost to him. He promised that if plaintiff would marry him he would give her, as her own, a valuable diamond ring, a diamond stickpin, an ermine coat, and an automobile. At the same time defendant orally reiterated his promises that, if plaintiff would marry him, he would, immediately after the marriage, convey to her the real property formerly agreed to be given to her, and would erect an imposing residence on land owned by plaintiff. He promised, also, to purchase other land for her, and erect thereon an apartment house, at a cost of $100,000. He further agreed to pay off, and discharge, a $60,000 mortgage upon property belonging to the plaintiff. Believing and being deceived by all of these representations, so plaintiff alleges, she relied upon the oral promises of the defendant to transfer and convey the property to her, and married him upon the day set.

As a part of said oral antenuptial agreement, it is further alleged, defendant promised to execute and deliver to plaintiff his last will and testament, devising and bequeathing certain real and personal property to her. In apparent keeping with this promise defendant did, on the second day of January, 1919, execute and deliver to the plaintiff a will, which is set out in the complaint, whereby he devised and bequeathed to her real and personal property, and wherein he nominated plaintiff sole executrix without bonds. In no other respects have the antenuptial promises been carried out. On the contrary, so it is alleged, the defendant has refused to perform his agreement. Plaintiff seeks a decree requiring the defendant to transfer, convey, and assign to her the real and personal property which she alleges he agreed to give to her, and asks for the appointment of a receiver to carry out its provisions. She further asks that, in case specific performance cannot be decreed as to any of said property, she be awarded damages to the extent of its value. The demurrer was both general and special, but the principal question to be considered on this appeal is the sufficiency of the allegations of the amended complaint, in view of the lower court's determination that it does not contain facts sufficient to state a cause of action. The conclusion we have reached upon that point is determinative of the entire case.

[1] According to the allegations of the amended complaint, the plaintiff and defendant "by and through said oral antenuptial agreement, * * * and pursuant to the defined terms thereof, as stated by said defendant to said plaintiff, * * * were to effect a disposition of defendant's properties in plaintiff's favor, so that upon the assumption of the marital relation said property rights of said plaintiff should become fixed and determined." Plaintiff has thereby pleaded an agreement required by the statute to be in writing. All contracts for marriage settlements must be in writing, and executed and acknowledged, or proved, in like manner as a grant of land is required to be executed, acknowledged or proved. Civ. Code, § 178. It is equally clear that the agreement alleged by the plaintiff to have been made by the defendant, and pleaded as an antenuptial contract, is not only one required to be in writing, but also falls within the inhibition of the statute of frauds, and is therefore invalid. Agreements made upon consideration of marriage, other than mutual promises to marry, and agreements to devise or bequeath any property, or make any provision for any person by will, are invalid, unless the same, or some note or memorandum thereof, is in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged, or his agent. Civ. Code, § 1624, subds. 3, 7; Peek v. Peek, 77 Cal. 106, 108, 19 Pac. 227, 1 L. R. A. 185, 11 Am. St. Rep. 244; Monsen v. Monsen, 174 Cal. 97, 98, 162 Pac. 90.

[2] The fact that the parties were afterwards married does not operate to lift the bar of the statute. "A promise made in anticipation of a marriage, followed by a marriage, is the exact case contemplated by the statute. It is plain that the marriage adds nothing to the very circumstances described by the statutory provision which makes a writing essential; in fact, until a marriage takes place, there is no binding agreement independent of the statute, so that the marriage itself is a necessary part of every agreement made upon consideration of it, which the Legislature has said must be in writing." Hunt v. Hunt, 171 N. Y. 396, 400, 64 N. E. 159, 160 (59 L. R. A. 306); Pomeroy's Equitable Remedies, par. 829; Welch v. Whelpley, 62 Mich. 15, 22, 28 N. W. 744, 4 Am. St. Rep. 810; Adams v. Adams, 17 Or. 247, 254, 20 Pac. 633. The allegations of the amended complaint bring the promises of the defendant in the instant case squarely within this rule. Again and again it alleged that the defendant promised plaintiff "that if she would marry him he would transfer and convey (the property) to her immediately after said marriage." In fact, every single promise is predicated upon the proposition, that, "if she [plaintiff] would marry him [defendant] he would" do thus and so, "soon after," or "immediately after," marriage. The only consideration, therefore, for the defendant's promises was the marriage of the parties, which was not of itself sufficient to take the contract out of the statute of frauds. Peek v. Peek, supra; Trout v. Ogilvie, 182 Pac. 333.

[3, 4] The subsequent making of defendant's will, in favor of the plaintiff, following the marriage, was not such part performance of the oral agreement to make such will as to take the alleged contract out of the statute of frauds. Gould v. Mansfield, 103 Mass. 408, 409, 4 Am. Rep. 573; Swash v. Sharpstein, 14 Wash. 426, 44 Pac. 862, 32 L. R. A.

796; In re Edwall's Estate, 75 Wash. 391, 134 Pac. 1041, 1046; McClanahan v. McClanahan, 77 Wash. 138, 137 Pac. 479, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 461. Furthermore, the alleged act of performance in that regard was not done by the plaintiff, who is the party seeking to enforce the contract, and does not estop the defendant from invoking the bar of the statute. Foster v. Maginnis, 89 Cal. 264, 267, 26 Pac. 828; Fritz v. Mills, 12 Cal. App. 113, 118, 106 Pac. 725; Rathbun v. Rathbun, 6 Barb. (N. Y.) 98, 106.

Conceding that the marriage of the parties was not, of itself, sufficient part performance of the parol contract to convey the property in consideration of the marriage, the appellant yet seeks to avoid the interposition of the bar of the statute, upon the ground of equitable fraud. Her marriage, she contends, was brought about by the actual fraud of the defendant, and she takes the position that the acts, representations, and promises of the defendant induced her to so irretrievably change her condition as to afford her ground for relief in equity. Her allegation is that her marriage with the defendant was procured by artifice and fraud, and upon the faith that the settlement of the property rights would be made. Her contention, therefore, is that the defendant should be required to make good his agreement, and not permitted to defeat it by pleading the bar of the statute. Peek v. Peek, 77 Cal. 106, 19 Pac. 227, 1 L. R. A. 185, 11 Am. St. Rep. 244, a case claimed by her to be almost exactly similar to the one at bar, is relied upon by appellant as conclusively establishing the doctrine contended for by her. In that case Peek orally promised his intended wife that if she would marry him he would, on or before the marriage, convey to her certain property. She relied upon this promise, and married him "for no other reason, or consideration." The conveyance was not made. Peek put it off by excuses and protestations, and on the morning of the marriage, without the knowledge of the intended wife, conveyed the property to his minor son by a former marriage. After the wedding, the parties went to live upon the property. A year later Peek deserted his wife, and the minor, by his guardian, brought suit against her to recover possession of the property, and obtained a judgment in his favor. The Supreme Court, in its opinion reversing the case, held that the foundation of the wife's claim, set up by way of cross-complaint, being the promise of Peek, was within the statute of frauds, and that the subsequent marriage of the parties was not such part performance as would induce a court of equity to give relief. But the fact that the marriage was brought about by the actual fraud of Peek, in inducing his wife to marry him, by promising to convey the property to her, when at that very time he had no intention of so doing, and was conveying it to some one else, seemed to the court to make a difference, and it held that, as the fraud had brought about an irretrievable change of the position of the wife, to wit, the marriage, equity should enforce the agreement.

The particular language of the opinion of interest in this discussion is found in the following quotation:

"We do not say that the mere fraudulent omission to have an agreement reduced to writing would of itself be ground for specifically enforcing the agreement. But where the fraudulent contrivance induces an irretrievable change of position, equity will enforce the agreement. And the marriage brought about by the fraudulent contrivance is a change of position within the meaning of the rule. In Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 24, 3 Am. Rep. 418, in reasoning upon somewhat different facts, to the conclusion that, in order to be ground for the enforcement of the oral contract, the fraudulent contrivance must have induced some irretrievable change of position, the court said: 'The cases most frequently referred to are those arising out of agreements for marriage settlements. In such cases the marriage, although not regarded as a part performance of the agreement for a marriage settlement, is such an irretrievable change of situation that, if procured by artifice, upon the faith that the settlement had been made, or the assurance that it would be executed, the other party is held to make good the agreement, and not permitted to defeat it by pleading the statute.' This, we think, is a correct statement of the law." Peek v. Peek, supra.

The case of Glass v. Hulbert, quoted from in the Peek Case, was one relating to an oral contract for the sale of real property, and the language so strongly approved by our Supreme Court was pure dictum. The Massachusetts court, however, cites the early English case of Maxwell v. Mountacute, Prec. in Ch. 526, another and better report of the same case being found in Mountacute v. Maxwell, 1 Eq. Cases Abr. 19. The full report of these cases will be found in 24 English Reports (full reprint) Precedents in Chancery, at pages 235 and 541, respectively. In that case the plaintiff, the wife, brought a bill against the defendant, her husband, "setting forth that the defendant before her intermarriage with him did promise that she should enjoy all her own estate to her separate use; that he agreed to execute writings to that purpose, and had instructed counsel to draw such writings, and that when they were to be married, the writings not being perfected, the defendant desired this might not delay the match, in regard his friends being there it might shame him, but engaged that upon his honor she should have the same advantages of the agreement, as if it were in writing drawn in form by counsel and executed, upon which the marriage took effect, and afterwards the plaintiff wrote a letter to the defendant, her husband, putting him in mind of his promise, to which the defendant, her husband, wrote her an answer under his hand, expressing that he was always willing she should enjoy her own fortune as if sole, and that it should be at her command." To this bill the defendant pleaded the statute of frauds and perjuries which Lord Chancellor Parker allowed, saying:

"In cases of fraud, equity should relieve, even against the words of the statute; as if one agreement in writing should be proposed and drawn, and another fraudulently and secretly brought in and executed in lieu of the former; in this or like cases of fraud, equity would relieve; but where there is no fraud, only relying upon the honor, word, or promise of the defendant, the statute making those promises void, equity will not interfere." Mountacute v. Maxwell, supra.

In the earlier citation of the case the Chancellor said:

"That where, on a treaty for a marriage, or any other treaty, the parties come to an agreement, but the same is never reduced into writing, nor any proposal made for that purpose, so that they rely wholly on their parol agreement, that unless this be executed in part, neither party can compel the other to a specific performance, for that the statute of frauds is directly in their way; but if there were any agreement for reducing the same into writing, and that is prevented by the fraud and practice of the other party, that this court will in such case give relief; as where instructions are given, and preparations made for the drawing of a marriage settlement, and before the completing of it the woman is drawn, by the assurances and promises of the man, to perform it, and after to marry him." Maxwell v. Mountacute, supra.

See, also, Browne on Statute of Frauds, par. 444.

When read in the light of what we believe to be the only reasonable and true rule, as announced by the Chancellor, and having in mind the actual facts upon which the decision was based, the case of Peek v. Peek, supra, loses the weight of authority appellant would impart to it. It ceases to have compelling force in the instant case, in which, as we shall presently show, the circumstances relied upon by the appellant did not amount to such fraud as to bring the situation of the parties within the purview of a court of equity. To give that case, disassociated from its facts, the full construction sought by the appellant would have the practical effect of making it an authority for holding that marriage is such part performance of oral antenuptial agreements as to remove them from the operation of the statute of frauds, which is not the law. We think the broad application of the doctrine contended for by appellant is not warranted by the principle, or sustained by the authorities.

The other cases, relied upon by the appellant, are either based upon facts, as was the Peek Case, bringing the decisions within the application of the doctrine announced by the English Chancellor, or they may be otherwise distinguished from the case at bar. In each there has been something more than mere failure, or refusal upon the part of the promisor, to execute an oral antenuptial agreement for a property settlement. In Petty v. Petty, 43 Ky. (4 B. Mon.) 215, 39 Am. Dec. 501, the wife charged that her husband promised that immediately after marriage he would settle on her at his death certain property, on which promise she closed the contract of marriage. A few days after the marriage, her husband disclosed to her that he had been induced to, and had, by an irrevocable deed of gift executed just before the marriage, made over all of his property to his children by a former marriage. On appeal the court held that it had no power to enforce the marriage settlement, but upon the theory that the transfer was a fraud upon the dower right of the wife, allowed by the laws of that state, it directed the entry of a decree annulling the deed for the lands, so far as the same affected or incumbered the complainant's right to dower thereon. In Offutt v. Offutt, 106 Md. 236, 67 Atl. 138, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 232, 124 Am. St. Rep. 491, it was held that a definite and specific proposition in writing, made by the husband before the marriage, and accepted by the intended wife, followed by the consummation of the contract, entitled the wife to specific performance. Moore v. Allen, 26 Colo. 197, 57 Pac. 698, 77 Am. St. Rep. 255, was an action in ejectment by one claiming under the husband. The wife, by way of cross-complaint, alleged a parol antenuptial agreement between herself and husband, who at the time was the owner of the property, whereby he agreed to convey the same to her after their marriage. In compliance with his promise, he placed her in actual possession of the property before the marriage. She made lasting and valuable improvements thereon, but the husband neglected and refused to convey the property to her. It was held that the facts stated took the parol agreement out of the statute of frauds. In Daily v. Minnick, 117 Iowa, 563, 91 N. W. 913, 60 L. R. A. 840, the deceased orally agreed to convey land to a child, in consideration of being allowed to name it. The child was named according to his wishes, and continued to bear such name to the time of the trial of the action. It was held that such contract was not void under the statute of frauds, since the naming of the child, and his bearing the name, constituted payment of the purchase price of the land, within the exception prescribed by the Code of Iowa, declaring that an oral contract to convey land shall not be void where the purchase money, or any portion thereof, has been received by the vendor. In Green v. Green, 34 Kan. 740, 10 Pac. 156, 55 Am. Rep. 256, a widow possessed of 160 acres of land, which was all her property, and her sole means of support, induced Green, a cripple, possessed of only a few hundred dollars, to make a matrimonial engagement with her and marry her, upon her verbal promise and agreement that the farm was her own, and that its proceeds should go to their support after their marriage, as long as they lived. After the marriage Green furnished the rooms, bought food and clothing for the family, including the children of his wife by a former marriage, and with his own money paid off a mortgage upon the farm. As a matter of fact, the widow had secretly deeded the property to her daughters by the former marriage, on the eve of the wedding with Green, the consideration being love and affection. It was held that the deeds to the daughters were a fraud upon the rights of the husband, and that he was entitled to have them set aside. In Kelly v. McGrath, 70 Ala. 75, 45 Am. Rep. 75, it was held that a court of equity should set aside, as a fraud on the marital rights of the husband, a secret conveyance, or settlement of her property by the intended wife, executed without his knowledge and in contemplation of the marriage. An almost identical situation was considered in Freeman v. Hartman, 45 Ill. 57, 92 Am. Dec. 193.

[5] From our examination of the foregoing, and many other authorities, we are convinced that the distinguishing feature of the case at bar did not amount to such actual fraud as to entitle the plaintiff to any equitable relief. The facts present nothing more than the mere omission to put the contract into writing before the marriage, and a failure to perform it thereafter. It does not appear that the defendant in any manner prevented the due execution of a valid marriage settlement in writing, such as would have satisfied the statute. It is not alleged, or contended, that the plaintiff was induced through deceit, false statement, or concealment of the defendant to waive a written agreement and rely upon the promises in parol, before entering into the marriage relation. 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, Fourth Edition, par. 921. For aught that appears in the amended complaint, the defendant may have entered into his engagements in the highest good faith, and with every good intention, and with full ability to perform. Granting, for the purpose of the discussion, that the plaintiff may have been led into the marriage by the Lochinvar courtship of the aged swain, the inducement went only to that relation. By no fraud, trick, or device, so far as the record discloses, was she prevented from securing what the law sanctions, a written marriage settlement. Equity, therefore, can afford her no relief.

The judgment is affirmed.

HUGHES v. HUGHES. (Civ. 3502.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 7, 1920.)

1. Costs ⊂=154—May be allowed for taking of deposition unsigned.

Costs may be allowed for taking of a deposition not finally signed, it being for the trial court to determine under all circumstances whether the taking of the deposition was really essential to the rights of the party taking it.

2. Costs ⊂=154—Defendant not required to force plaintiff to sign deposition.

In an action by wife against her husband for specific performance of his alleged antenuptial agreement with her, it was not incumbent on defendant husband to take steps, by means of court proceedings, to force plaintiff to sign her deposition, taken at defendant's instance, before it could become a legitimate item of cost in preparing for the defense of the action; he having become liable for the expense before the trial court sustained demurrer to the complaint and entered judgment for him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Gertrude O. Hughes against Thomas Hughes. From an order after judgment allowing costs to defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 193 Pac. 144.

Thos. K. Case, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

G. P. Adams, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order made after judgment, which allowed as costs claimed by defendant the sum of $101.40 for a deposition.

Plaintiff filed her complaint against the defendant, her husband, seeking specific performance of an alleged oral antenuptial agreement. In anticipation of being compelled to go to trial the defendant applied for, and the court made an order based upon an affidavit, that the deposition of plaintiff be taken before a notary public. At the time appointed plaintiff appeared with her attorney and stipulated that the deposition be taken in shorthand, and when transcribed, should be sworn to and subscribed by the witness. Plaintiff was sworn, and her testimony was taken. The testimony was long, the examination taking parts of two days, and it was stipulated that the matter of taking the deposition should be continued to a definite date, on which the plaintiff would read over, correct, and sign it. When the deposition was transcribed the plaintiff requested, and was furnished with a copy, that she might go over it at the office of her attorney, or at her home, compare it with a transcription of her testimony prepared by a stenographer of her own choosing who was present at the examination, and make any corrections necessary. Many discrepancies, over 100 the appellant says in her affidavit, were noted and corrected. There appear to have been several conferences by the respective counsel, over the matter, and the signing of the deposition dragged along for a month. Before it was signed the court sustained a demurrer to the plaintiff's amended complaint. She declined to further amend, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendant. Plaintiff appealed, and the judgment has been affirmed. Hughes v. Hughes, No. 3501, 193 Pac. 144, this day decided.

After judgment entered, defendant filed his cost bill, including the expense of taking the deposition. Plaintiff objected to the item, and moved to strike it out, which motion the court denied. Plaintiff appeals from the order, claiming that, as the deposition was never completed and signed, and was not used on the trial, it was an improper item of costs.

[1] The fact that the deposition was not finally signed does not, in our opinion, alter the situation of the parties. A special reason is not presented thereby why the costs incurred in the taking should be disallowed. It is frequently proper, and often it seems necessary, for a party to have a deposition taken, although afterward the case may take such a course as to make it unnecessary to use it. It is for the trial court to determine whether, under all the circumstances, the taking of the deposition was reasonably essential to the protection of the rights of the party taking it. Lindy v. McChesney, 141 Cal. 351, 353, 74 Pac. 1034; California, etc., Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra, 151 Cal. 732, 745, 91 Pac. 593; Lomita Land & Water Co. v. Robinson, 154 Cal. 36, 52, 97 Pac. 10, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1106; Welch v. Alcott, 178 Cal. 530, 532, 74 Pac. 34.

[2] The deposition in this case was secured by the defendant after he appeared in the action, and in a bona fide initiative on his part to prepare for a trial, which he had reasonable grounds to anticipate would be had. The plaintiff says, in her affidavit used on the motion to tax costs in the court below, that while she would, if requested, have signed her testimony as transcribed by her own stenographer, she would, had she been asked to do so, have refused to sign what purported to be her deposition as taken by the reporter for the notary. We do not believe that it was incumbent upon the defendant to have taken steps, by means of court proceedings open to him to force the plaintiff to sign the deposition, before it could become a legitimate item of cost in preparing for the defense of the action. He had become liable for the expense of taking the deposition before the lower court sustained the demurrer, and entered its judgment. It has determined that the cost was properly and necessarily incurred. We are convinced that the evidence before it showed a case warranting such a conclusion.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

WHITNEY v. WEST COAST LIFE INS. CO.
(Civ. 3537.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 10, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 9, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸1213—Evidence at second trial held insufficient to change law of the case.

Where the Supreme Court on a previous appeal had held that a verdict allowing recovery on a life policy was contrary to evidence that assured had consulted physicians and been informed he had heart disease which he concealed from the insurance company, evidence at a subsequent trial by another physician and by personal friends that they did not know of assured having such disease does not change the effect of the former ruling as law of the case, so that a directed verdict for defendant was proper.

2. Appeal and error ⟸1099(7)—Prior decision as to sufficiency of evidence is law of the case, in absence of new evidence.

A decision on a former appeal that the evidence was insufficient is the law of the case, and must be followed by the trial court at a subsequent trial if the evidence was the same.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Anna St. John Whitney against the West Coast Life Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant on directed verdict, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from the order denying new trial. Affirmed.

Norman A. Eisner, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Myrick & Deering and Scott, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover upon a life insurance policy for $10,000, issued by the defendant on the life of her husband, and in her favor. In the first trial of the cause a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. A motion for a new trial was made and denied. On appeal to the Supreme Court, the judgment and order were reversed. Whitney v. West Coast Life Insurance Co., 177 Cal. 74, 169 Pac. 997. On the second trial the court directed the jury to bring in a verdict in favor of the defendant, which was done, and judgment thereupon entered. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and the plaintiff has appealed.

Mr. Whitney died June 10, 1914, of acute myocarditis, a disease of the heart. The defense at the first trial was based upon the assertion that Arthur L. Whitney, the assured, made false representations in his application to the defendant for insurance, and was guilty of fraud in securing the policy, in that he concealed from the defendant's medical examiner the fact that, before making his application, he had consulted certain physicians as to his physical condition, and failed to report the results of their examination, as given to him. By the terms of the policy all insurance thereunder was based upon the written and printed application therefor, which, by attached copy, was made a part of the contract. In his answers to questions contained in the application for insurance, Mr. Whitney made, among others, the following representations:

"Q. Have you now or have you ever had shortness of breath? A. No.

"Q. Have you now or have you ever had disease or palpitation of the heart? A. No.

"Q. Give particulars of any injury or illness or attendance of physician that may have occurred during the past seven years. A. Burn of arm and chest. Dates, 1911. Duration, one week. Physician consulted, Dr. Chidester."

Whitney had been afflicted with a shortness of breath, which seemed to him so alarming as to cause him to seek the advice of a physician some four months prior to the time when he sought life insurance. He was examined by Dr. Cheney, who informed him that he was suffering from myocarditis, a weakness of the heart, an incurable condition, which would persist as long as the patient lived. He also consulted Dr. Hewlett, who advised him that he probably had weakness of his heart muscles. After a careful review of the evidence and a consideration of the authorities relied upon by the respondent on the first appeal, the Supreme Court held that, notwithstanding the liberal rules which properly favor the upholding of verdicts of the sort rendered in this case, the fact remained that by the uncontradicted testimony of two physicians of standing, Mr. Whitney was shown to have concealed facts about his condition and his consultations with medical men, which could not have been unconsciously withheld, and the withholding of which information clearly amounted to fraud. The court then said, in reversing the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial:

"We are therefore forced to the conclusion that he consciously and intentionally withheld from the examining physician information which might have prevented, nay, probably would have prevented, the issuance to him of a policy of insurance. Of course, we cannot tell what new evidence may be forthcoming if the cause be retried, but unless some very positive proof be available to overcome the necessary deductions arising from the conduct of the assured, it would be the duty of the trial court to decline to submit the question of fact to a jury."

[1] Much of the testimony introduced at the first trial was read into the record on the second hearing, and practically the identical evidence considered by the Supreme Court appears to have been before the trial court at the conclusion of the case. Four witnesses, who had not appeared in the first trial, testified at the second. Dr. Ebright, produced by the plaintiff, testified that he was a personal friend of Mr. Whitney, knew him intimately, met him frequently, and noticed nothing wrong about decedent, and never heard him complain of his heart or shortness of breath. When examined as an expert, he gave as his opinion that Whitney was suffering from indigestion, and not from heart disease. If that were true, we are unable to perceive how the testimony of Dr. Ebright in any way assists the appellant. On the contrary, it tends to add to the gravity of the concealment alleged to have been perpetrated by the decedent, for in his application he also stated that he had never had either dyspepsia or indigestion. Dr. Ebright would not say that the decedent did not have myocarditis, and admitted that Dr. Cheney and Dr. Hewlett were "probably accurate" in their diagnosis. The other three witnesses, Hand, Hardy, and Peterson, were intimate acquaintances of the decedent, Whitney, and merely testified to the fact that Whitney appeared to them to be in good health, and that they never observed him exhibiting any symptoms of shortness of breath. There is nothing in the evidence of any of these witnesses to change, or in the least moderate the effect of, the uncontradicted testimony, which the Supreme Court held on the former appeal so clearly established the fact that the insured was guilty of fraud in securing the policy. The facts and the evidence are the same upon both appeals, with the immaterial exception noted. The decision in the former appeal therefore becomes the law in this. Snyder v. Jack, 140 Cal. 584, 586, 74 Pac. 139, 355; Blankenship v. Whaley, 142 Cal. 566, 568, 76 Pac. 235; Kent v. Williams, 146 Cal. 3, 7, 79 Pac. 527; Brett v. Frank & Co., 162 Cal. 735, 739, 124 Pac. 437.

[2] There was nothing new in the case. The views expressed by the Supreme Court on the former appeal must control the law of the case; and it was the duty of the trial court to give effect to those views by declining to submit the question to the jury, if convinced that the evidence was the same upon both trials. Muller v. Swanton, 17 Cal. App. 232, 235, 119 Pac. 200.

The outstanding fact remains unchallenged that Mr. Whitney died of myocarditis. In directing the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, the trial court said:

"There has been no evidence introduced which would explain in any way the reason why the decedent did not disclose to the company the information that he had been consulting, or had been attended by Dr. Cheney and Dr. Hewlett. And in my opinion that is the point upon which the case is reversed. * * *"

We are satisfied the trial court was correct in both its conclusions. No good can be accomplished by a review of the authorities cited by the appellant. Every contention made, which seems worthy of consideration, was decided against her by the Supreme Court, on the appeal following the first trial. The decision of that court so convincingly settles the matter that we feel further discussion is unnecessary.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WILHITE. (Cr. 528.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 10, 1920.)

1. Indictment and information ⟸161(5) — Amended information for similar offense held valid.

Where the original and first amended information charged defendant with contributing to the dependency of a minor, a second amended information which substituted the word "wrongfully" in place of the word "feloniously" in the first information, and the words, "female under the age of twenty-one years" in place of the word "minor," the second amended information charged the same offense, and a motion to strike it out and demurrer to it were properly overruled, under Pen. Code, § 1008, allowing such amendments.

2. Criminal law ⟸369(2) — Instruction that evidence of other offenses was competent only to show disposition held proper.

In a prosecution for contributing to the dependency of a female minor by sexual intercourse with her, an instruction that the prosecution had elected to rely upon a specific act, and that evidence of other similar acts could be considered only as showing the disposition of accused and as corroboration to support the specific act, was correct.

3. Infants ⟸20—That minor was dissolute before defendant's contributory acts no defense.

It is no defense to a prosecution for contributing to the dependency of a female minor that the minor had been leading a dissolute or immoral life before the acts with which defendant was charged.

4. Infants ⟸20—Instruction that defendant's acts need not be sole cause of minor's dependency is correct.

Under St. 1915, p. 1246, § 21, making it an offense to commit any act or omit any duty which causes, or tends to cause, dependency of a minor, an instruction that defendant's acts need not be the sole cause of the dependency, but that he could be convicted if the jury found that his acts tended to cause or encourage such dependency, was correct.

5. Criminal law ⟸554—Denials by accused only raise conflict of evidence for jury.

Where the evidence offered by the prosecution was ample to sustain a conviction, denial of the charge by accused's testimony, which showed his innocence, at most raised a conflict in the evidence, which was for determination by the jury, but did not render the evidence insufficient to support a conviction.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. The defendant was accused of contributing to the dependency of a minor under the age of 21 years. He was tried and convicted of the offense charged, and from the judgment and order denying the motion for new trial the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

The information against the defendant was filed on the 16th day of June, 1919, and was thereafter followed by two amended informations covering the same offense which was charged in the original information. The second amended information was filed December 11th, 1919, and alleges that:

"The said E. C. Wilhite, on or about the 21st day of June A. D. 1918, at and in the said county of Stanislaus, state of California, and prior to the filing of this information, did then and there, to wit, in said county of Stanislaus, state of California, willfully, unlawfully, and wrongfully have and accomplish an act of sexual intercourse with and upon one Bessie Robertson, then and there a female under the age of 21 years, to wit, of the age of 18 years, and not then and there the wife of said E. C. Wilhite. That said act by the said defendant did then and there manifestly cause, encourage, and contribute to the said Bessie Robertson, then and there a female under the age of 21 years, to wit, of the age of 18 years, to become and remain a person coming within the provisions of section 1 of the Juvenile Court Law of the state of California, to wit, a person under the age of 21 years who is leading or from any cause is in danger of leading an idle, dissolute, lewd, and immoral life, and from which said act of sexual intercourse the said Bessie Robertson conceived and bore a child, contrary," etc.

The defendant interposed a motion to strike out this second amended information, and also filed a demurrer to the same.

[1] The difference between the original and the first and second amended informations may be briefly stated as follows: The original and the first amended informations alleged that the defendant did "willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously" and the second amended information contains the word "wrongfully" in place of the word "feloniously." The first amended information contains the words "acts of sexual intercourse" at two different places, and the second amended information contains a reference at those two places to an "act of sexual intercourse." The first and second amended informations contains the words "female under the age of 21 years" and the original information contained the word "minor" in place of the word "female." The original and the first amended informations, in referring to the said Bessie Robertson, contain the words "and who has violated the laws of the state of California, relative to living in cohabitation and adultery." These last-quoted words are not contained in the second amended information.

It is provided by section 1008 of the Penal Code that:

"An indictment or information may be amended by the district attorney without leave of court, at any time before the defendant pleads. Such amendment may be made at any time thereafter, in the discretion of the court where it can be done without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant. * * *"

It is clear that the offense charged in the second amended information is the same offense that is charged in the original and first amended informations, and it is apparent that the motion to strike out said second amended information was properly denied, and the demurrer to the same was properly overruled by the trial court.

[2] The appellant claims that the court erred in giving the following instruction to the jury:

"The prosecution in this case has selected the alleged acts of the defendant set forth in the information and testified to by witness Bessie Robertson, as having occurred on or about the 21st day of June, 1918, and has elected to rely on proof of such acts for a conviction in this case. Testimony has been introduced by the prosecution tending to prove other acts and conduct of the defendant towards said Bessie Robertson of a similar character to those alleged in the information. This evidence is introduced for the purpose of proving the disposition and tendency of the defendant to commit acts such as those alleged in the information and relied upon by the prosecution, and such evidence is not introduced to prove distinct offenses, but as corroborative evidence tending to support the one specific offense for which the defendant is being tried."

The giving of this instruction was not erroneous. It expressly states that the defendant was upon trial for the alleged acts set forth in the information and claimed to have occurred on or about June 21, 1918, and that evidence of similar acts or conduct of the defendant was admitted for the purpose as stated in said instruction, and not for the purpose of proving distinct offenses. The instruction is substantially in the same language as the instruction that was sustained in People v. Gasser, 34 Cal. App. 541, 544, 168 Pac. 157.

[3] Instruction No. 9, which defendant claims to be erroneous, was to the effect that, even though it may appear that the said Bessie Robertson had been leading a lewd or immoral life before the alleged offense charged in the information, that fact alone would not warrant a verdict of acquittal. This instruction contains a correct statement of the law, and finds ample support in People v. Hanford, 35 Cal. App. 800, 171 Pac. 112. In that case the defendant was convicted of the crime of violating section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law. The evidence showed that the defendant knowingly permitted the prosecuting witness to commit acts of prostitution in defendant's house, and encouraged the commission of the same. The court said:

"It is no defense that the prosecuting witness may have been leading an idle, dissolute, and immoral life prior to and at the time she went to the house of the defendant. * * *

"Thus it is apparent that the juvenile court law not only denounces and condemns acts which tend to make a minor a prostitute, but also those which tend to cause one, already a prostitute, to remain a prostitute. In short, the clear purpose and intent of the statute is to reclaim the fallen as well as protect the virtuous."

[4] There was no error in the court instructing the jury:

"That it is not necessary for you to find, in order to convict the defendant in this case, that any act or acts of said defendant charged in the information, if you find that he committed said acts or any of them, were the sole or entire cause of said Bessie Robertson leading, or being in danger of leading, an idle, dissolute, lewd, or immoral life, if you find that she was leading, or was in danger of leading, an idle, dissolute, lewd, or immoral life, but it is sufficient upon that point if you find that said act or acts, or any of them, although not the sole or entire cause thereof, did tend to cause, or tend to encourage, or tend to induce, the said Bessie Robertson to lead, or become in danger of leading, an idle, dissolute, lewd, or immoral life."

This instruction was proper as informing the jury that it was not necessary that the evidence should actually show that the alleged acts of defendant caused the prosecuting witness to lead an idle, dissolute, lewd, or immoral life, but that it was only necessary to show by the evidence that the alleged acts did "tend" to cause said prosecuting witness to lead an idle, dissolute, lewd, or immoral life. Section 21 of the statute under which the defendant was convicted, among other things, provides, that:

"Any person who shall commit any act or omit the performance of any duty, which act or omission causes or tends to cause or encourage any person under the age of twenty-one years to come within the provisions of any of subdivisions 1 to 13 inclusive of section one of this act, or, which act or omission contributes thereto, or any person who shall, by any act or omission, or by threats, or commands, or persuasion, induce or endeavor to induce any such person, under the age of twenty-one years, to do or to perform any act or to follow any course of conduct, or to so live as would cause or manifestly tend to cause any such person to become or to remain a person coming within the provisions of any of subdivisions 1 to 13 inclusive of section one of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. * * *" Stats. 1915, p. 1246. People v. Hanford, 35 Cal. App. 799, 800, 171 Pac. 112.

[5] The final contention of the defendant is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The evidence produced by the prosecution is ample and sufficient to establish the crime charged. The defendant in his testimony denies absolutely that he committed the act charged against him. The most that can be said is that thereby a conflict in the evidence was created. His own story undoubtedly exculpates him, but it was for the jury to say whether or not that story should be believed. People v. Rongo, 169 Cal. 71, 75, 145 Pac. 1017.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WYETT. (Cr. 909.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 15, 1920.)

1. Criminal law ⊂=507(7)—Ten year old complaining witness held not an accomplice.

In prosecution for the infamous crime against nature in violation of Pen. Code, § 286, complaining witness, under 10 years of age, held not an accomplice, within rule requiring corroboration of an accomplice's testimony.

2. Criminal law ⊂=822(13)—Instruction as to proof on information charging two crimes held not misleading.

In prosecution of a defendant charged in two counts with different crimes, where court fully instructed as to duty of each juror to be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt as to first count, and in a separate charge required each juror to be satisfied as to guilt of crime charged in second count, instruction that district attorney was "not required to allege or prove the exact date of the commission of either of the offenses charged, and if you are satisfied from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed the crimes, or either of them, as charged, at any time within three years of the date of the filing of the information, you should render a verdict of guilty," held not so indefinite, taking the charge as a whole, as to have misled jury to find defendant guilty on each count on proof satisfying them as to guilt of either offense.

3. Criminal law ⊂=369(1)—Testimony as to commission of other crime against other person held inadmissible in solving prosecution.

In prosecution for the infamous crime against nature, in violation of Pen. Code, § 286, evidence as to commission of a similar offense against a boy other than the complaining witness, committed subsequent to the commission of crime charged, held inadmissible.

4. Criminal law ⊂=1186(4) — Admission of testimony as to other acts held reversible error.

In prosecution for infamous crime against nature, in violation of Pen. Code, § 286, where defendant was convicted on testimony of the prosecuting witness alone, whose testimony was in some respects uncertain, and was strongly supported in the minds of the jury by corroborating evidence as to similar act committed on a person other than the prosecuting witness, the admission of the testimony as to such other acts held reversible error, notwithstanding Const. art. 6, § 4½, prohibiting reversal except in case of a miscarriage of justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Frank Wyett was convicted of the infamous crime against nature, and he appeals. Reversed.

H. L. Meyers, of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment against the defendant upon his conviction of the charge of having violated section 286 of the Penal Code, relating to the infamous crime against nature.

[1] The appellant makes three contentions upon this appeal, the first of which is that he was convicted upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. The complaining witness was one Ernest Houx, a boy under 10 years of age at the time of the trial, and the victim of the defendant's alleged offense. In claiming that the witness Ernest Houx was an accomplice of the defendant in the commission of the crime the appellant relies on the case of People v. Robbins, 171 Cal. 466, 154 Pac. 317. In that case, however, the complaining witness was a boy of the age of 16 years, and in holding that he was an accomplice the Supreme Court expressly differentiated between that case and the case of People v. Dong Pok Yip, 164 Cal. 143, 127 Pac. 1031, in which latter case the child upon whom the crime was committed was of the age of 9 years, and was held not to be accomplice. We are of the opinion that this case comes within the rule laid down in People v. Dong Pok Yip, supra, and hence that the trial court was not in error in holding that the complaining witness herein was not an accomplice whose testimony required corroboration.

[2] The appellant's second contention is that the court erred in submitting to the jury the following instruction:

"In this connection you are instructed that the district attorney is not required to allege or prove the exact date of the commission of either of the offenses charged; and if you are satisfied from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed the crimes, or either one of them as charged, at any time within three years of the date of the filing of the information, you should render a verdict of guilty."

There were two counts in the information against the defendant herein, in one of which he was charged with the infamous crime against nature, and in the other of having been guilty of certain lewd and lascivious conduct toward the complaining witness. The criminal act charged to have been committed in each count was stated in each to have been committed on or before the 1st day of May, 1919. The foregoing instruction was expressly disapproved in the case of People v. Elgar, 36 Cal. App. 114, 171 Pac. 697, and would seem to be subject to the strictures made upon it in that case. The trial court, however, fully instructed the jury in other portions of its charge with respect to the duty of each member of the jury to be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant upon the first of said counts, and also and in a separate and distinct charge as to the second of said counts in the information. It would seem, therefore, that, taking the charge of the court as a whole, the jury could not have been so far misled by the indefiniteness of the above instruction as to have expressly found the defendant guilty upon each of said counts separately, but that their verdict as to each was the result of their unanimous conclusion as to his guilt upon each of said counts. We do not, therefore, feel that we should reverse this case upon that ground.

[3, 4] The defendant, however, makes a further objection to the verdict and judgment herein, based upon his contention that evidence was offered and admitted over his objection with relation to the commission of another offense by him similar to that charged in the first count in said information, but against a person other than the prosecuting witness. One Floyd Menasco was called as a witness by the prosecution, and was permitted to testify to the commission of said crime by the defendant upon his person upon a date after that upon which the defendant was alleged to have committed a like offense upon the present prosecuting witness. This evidence was offered and permitted to be introduced for the purpose of showing the lewd and lascivious disposition and tendency of the defendant to commit acts of that character. The respondent herein undertakes to justify the action of the trial court in the admission of such evidence under the authority of People v. Gasser, 34 Cal. App. 541, 168 Pac. 157. The record of that case, however, discloses that the evidence therein consisted of proof of other acts of a lewd and lascivious nature committed upon the person of the complaining witness, and it was therein held that such evidence was admissible for the limited purpose for which it was offered. But neither that case, nor any other case to which our attention has been called, which upholds the admission of such evidence, has gone so far as to approve the admission of evidence of lewd and lascivious acts committed upon other persons than the complaining witness in the particular case, but, on the other hand, in every case to which we have been cited, the courts of this and other jurisdictions have held that such testimony constitutes evidence of another and distinct crime, for which the defendant could have been informed against and tried, but for which he cannot be tried in the particular case. People v. Letoile, 31 Cal. App. 166, 159 Pac. 1057; People v. Elliott, 119 Cal. 593, 51 Pac. 955; People v. Stewart, 85 Cal. 174, 24 Pac. 722; People v. Bowen, 49 Cal. 654; State v. Williams, 36 Utah, 273, 103 Pac. 250; Janzen v. People, 159 Ill. 440, 42 N. E. 862; Shaffner v. Commonwealth, 72 Pa. 60, 13 Am. Rep. 649. We are of the opinion that the error of the trial court in the admission of this evidence was sufficiently prejudicial to compel a reversal in the present case. The defendant was convicted upon the testimony of the prosecuting witness alone, whose evidence, while it would seem to be sufficient to uphold the verdict, was in some respects quite uncertain, and was doubtless strongly supported in the minds of the jury by the corroborating evidence as to similar acts of the defendant committed upon the person of the boy Menasco. We are therefore of the opinion that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution cannot be given application to the case at bar.

Judgment reversed.

In re HUNTER et al. (Cr. 521.)

1. Infants ⇐19—Child's welfare is test in removing from parental control.

Under Juvenile Court Law, § 1, subds. 2, 11, providing that the law applies to minors who have no parent or guardian willing or capable of exercising proper control, etc., or who are in danger of leading an idle and dissolute life, and section 9b, declaring that no ward of the juvenile court shall be taken from custody of his legal parent or guardian without the consent of such parent, etc., unless the parent shall be incapable of providing, or shall have neglected to provide proper maintenance, training, and education, the primary consideration in determining whether custody of a child shall be taken from the parent is the child's own welfare.

2. Infants ⇐19—Custody of infant girls held properly taken from their parents.

Where the parents were not educating their infant daughters, aged 16 and 17, and were encouraging one of them to marry a Hindu, and it appeared that the children were in danger of being led into a life of immorality, it was proper, under the Juvenile Court Law, to declare them wards of the court, and remove them from the custody of the parents.

W. E. Davies, of Marysville, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

BURNETT, J. These minors, of the age of 17 years, were found to be delinquent and neglected children, and were committed to the Boys' and Girls' Industrial School, at Lytton Springs, conducted by the Salvation Army. The court found that their parents were incapable of exercising over these children proper parental control; that their home, by reason of neglect on the part of the parents, was an unfit place for them; that for a long period of time they were not properly disciplined or controlled; that they were in great danger of being led astray into bad and immoral practices; that their education has been neglected, due to the indifference or carelessness of the parents; that they are in great need of proper parental training, care and control; and that it is for the best interests of these minors that they be declared wards of the juvenile court, and that their care, custody, training, and education be committed to other hands than their parents.

[1] The legal foundation for the action of the court is found in subdivisions 2 and 11 of section 1 and section 9b of the Juvenile Court Law (Stats. 1915, p. 1225). It is therein provided that among the persons to whom the law applies is one "who has no parent or guardian willing to exercise or capable of exercising proper parental control; or who has no parent or guardian actually exercising such proper parental control and who is in need of such control" and one "who is leading, or from any cause is in danger of leading, an idle, dissolute, lewd or immoral life." A limitation upon the authority of said court to deprive the parents of the custody of the delinquent is found in said section 9b, as follows:

"No ward of the Juvenile Court as defined in this act shall be taken from the custody of his parent or legal guardian, without the consent of such parent or guardian unless the court shall find such parent or guardian to be incapable of providing or to have failed or neglected to provide proper maintenance, training and education for said person * * * or unless the court shall find that the welfare of said person requires that his custody be taken from said parent or guardian."

Taking up first the general consideration of the welfare of these girls, it is quite apparent that the determination of the court that their interests both material and intellectual, would be promoted by committing them to said institution, is amply justified. They were taken away from an abode of abject poverty, encompassed by circumstances utterly unfavorable to comfortable and decent living, the family of five occupying one small room, in which all the ordinary functions of the domestic relations, cooking, dining, and lodging were centered, there being only a partition between this room and the shed or stable wherein were housed the horses and cattle. But of more importance is the fact that the education of these girls was not receiving the attention that its importance demands, and they were permitted to associate with men of an alien race, and one of them even encouraged by the parents, if not openly at least tacitly, to become the wife of a Hindu, with whom she seems to have been quite intimately acquainted. Other circumstances appear also which we need not detail specifically, that justly excite apprehension that the girls were likely to be led into a life of lewdness and immorality. To exchange such a situation for the comfortable, wholesome, educational, and moral surroundings of the home at Lytton Springs would be immediately characterized as favorable to the welfare of these girls by every right-thinking person.

[2] It is to be observed that the statute makes the actual welfare of the minor the chief consideration, but conceding, as stated by Mr. Justice Sloane in the case of In re Gutierrez, 190 Pac. 200, that "it is only in instances where there is demonstrated incapacity or something akin to criminal neglect that the law is justified in interfering with the natural relations of parent and child," there is evidence in the record to support the inference that the parents manifested such incompetence. This was due, no doubt, to their ignorance. They are not, of course, to be condemned for their poverty. It excites pity rather than condemnation, although, as suggested by appellant, it is often a blessing in disguise. But most people, no doubt, would prefer to have more of the material comforts of life. Indeed, no one without the deepest regret that his declining days should be spent in discomfort can contemplate the condition of this old man, who offered his life for his country and who fought under the gallant Custer in the war for the preservation of the Union. He deserves a better fate than seems to have befallen him, but in this connection we do not overlook the fact that there are two grown sons who should see that the necessities of their parents are supplied.

In the other matters, though, we think there is room for the opinion that the parents are not altogether blameless, due, as we have suggested, to their inability to appreciate the greatest and most imperative needs of their daughters. That they should have at least a common school education no one will deny. That their intimate companions should be people of their own race goes without saying. And, of course, marriage between a white girl and a Hindu, whatever his character, is abhorrent and unthinkable to every enlightened and right-thinking Caucasian. From the foregoing impending evils, no doubt, the trial judge thought to rescue these girls, and being in a much better position than this court to appraise at their true value all the surrounding circumstances of the case, his judgment should not be disturbed without more cogent reasons than appear in the cause.

The orders are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DEWAR. (Cr. 893.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 13, 1920.)

1. Criminal law ⟸1144(18)—Presumed that motion for new trial was based on all grounds specified in Code.

Where respondent, convicted of grand larceny, whose motion for new trial was granted, on the state's appeal from the order, in his brief says it was based on each and every ground specified in Pen. Code, § 1181, in the absence of showing to the contrary, the appellate court will presume the motion was so made.

2. Criminal law ⟸1144(18)—Rule of presumption on appeal from order granting new trial applicable in civil cases not applicable.

There is nothing in the Penal Code, in its provisions relative to new trials, making applicable to the procedure in the trial of criminal cases the rule applicable in civil cases under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, that when new trial is granted on grounds of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain verdict the order shall so specify; otherwise, on appeal from the order, it will be presumed it was not based on such grounds.

3. Criminal law ⟸938(1)—New trial for newly discovered evidence discretionary.

In a prosecution for grand larceny, order granting defendant's motion for new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence held within the trial court's discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

William Dewar was convicted of grand larceny, and from an order granting him a new trial, the People appeal. Affirmed.

E. D. Knight and E. V. McKenzie, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The defendant, after conviction on a charge of grand larceny, moved for a new trial. His motion was granted, and from the order made in that behalf the people appeal.

[1, 2] The record is silent as to the grounds upon which the motion for a new trial was made and granted. Respondent, in his brief, says it was based upon each and every ground specified in section 1181 of the Penal Code. In the absence of a showing to the contrary, therefore, we will presume that the motion was so made. One of the grounds specified in that section is that the verdict is contrary to the evidence. Appellant seeks to eliminate that ground from consideration on this appeal by invoking the rule, applicable in civil cases, that when a new trial is granted upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict the order shall so specify; otherwise, on appeal from such order, it will be presumed that the order was not based upon that ground. Code Civ. Proc. § 657. But we find nothing in the provisions of the Penal Code relating to new trials making the rule in civil actions applicable to the procedure in the trial of criminal causes. From the the transcript of the proceedings on motion for a new trial we are given some evidence that the question of the sufficiency of the evidence, newly discovered evidence, and possibly the alleged improper admission of certain testimony, entered into the trial court's consideration of the matter.

The defendant was charged with stealing and carrying away five boxes of cyanide precipitates, of the value of $4,000, the personal property of Paul Hahnewald. It is the contention of the prosecution that the evidence of defendant's guilt was overwhelming. Paul Hahnewald, a witness for the state, testified that the precipitates had been stolen from his mill in Storey county, Nev., in 1919, and were later found in the possession of the defendant, who had been employed at his mill during that year. The defendant shipped the precipitates as paint to the Selby Smelting Works of San Francisco, to which concern he sought to sell them, alleging that he had secured them in Mexico. He seems to have made a number of conflicting statements as to the source from which the precipitates came, finally asserting that he found them in a woodshed, where they had laid unnoticed for nearly 10 years. Defendant testified that the precipitates originally belonged to a man named Tobner, his wife's first husband. The precipitates found in the possession of the defendant and produced in court were identified by Hahnewald and by his mine superintendent and other experts, who also testified that the precipitates were fresh in appearance, were not discolored, and were apparently not of the age as claimed by the defendant. Defendant's testimony as to the age and ownership of the precipitates was also rebutted by Tobner, who was corroborated by his former partner, Jurian. Tobner and Jurian had engaged in the mining business some 10 years previously, and it appeared that Jurian had kept a sample of the precipitates from their mill. This was produced in court and submitted to the jury for comparison with the precipitates claimed to have been stolen from Hahnewald.

In support of his motion for a new trial, defendant produced the affidavits of Henry Tobner and John L. Martell, witnesses for the prosecution; of Richard Beckert, a witness for the defense; the affidavit of his attorney, E. D. Knight; and one made by himself. The purpose of these statements was to discredit the evidence of the witnesses for the prosecution as to the means of identifying the source from which derived and the age of the alleged stolen precipitates. Their further effect was to indicate that the defendant and his counsel were not prepared for the testimony to be given by Tobner and Jurian, and did not, at the time of the trial, appreciate its probable effect upon the jurors. After the trial Beckert and Martell made an independent examination of a portion of the alleged stolen precipitates and the sample produced by Jurian as coming from the Tobner mill. The alleged result of this examination was that there was no discernible difference in the degrees of, or the extent of, oxidation as between the two; that it was impossible to discern which was the older of the two; that both might have been produced by the same cyaniding process, in the same mill, at the same time, from the same ore, and thereafter differently kept. These matters are made to appear from the affidavits. Tobner, who had been one of the chief witnesses for the prosecution on rebuttal, made similar statements, and added some details concerning the disposition of the precipitates and bullion from his mill some 10 years previously. The result of his affidavit was to weaken the effect of his previous testimony and in a sense to widen the scope of his testimony, which might have been done upon cross-examination at the trial. The affidavit of the attorney for the defendant, in substance, is based upon an alleged hurried conclusion of the trial, by reason of the pressure of the business of the court, a preliminary misunderstanding of what Jurian and Tobner would testify to, and a misapprehension of the apparent effect upon the jury of their testimony and the production in court of the sample of the precipitates produced from their mine. He also asserts that the examination by the jury of the Tobner precipitates was had at a time when the courtroom was poorly lighted. Both defendant and his counsel assert that it was impossible to have ascertained the various facts relied upon before or during the trial.

At the hearing of the motion Andrew Jurian was produced and permitted by the court to testify on behalf of the defendant to the same effect as if he had made an affidavit. His testimony, in brief, was to the effect that the sample of the precipitates produced by him was in the same condition as when taken by him some years previously, the apparent purpose of which was to show that no change had taken place in the precipitates during that time. No counter affidavits were produced by the prosecution, nor was any attempt made to counteract the showing thus made.

[3] Appellant contends that the court abused the wide discretion vested in it in the matter of passing upon motions for a new trial, when it granted the motion in the instant case; but in the light of the well-settled rules applicable to the consideration of the appeals from orders of trial courts granting or denying such motions we do not see how we can properly so hold. As was said in People v. Byrne, 160 Cal. 217, 225, 116 Pac. 521, 525:

"The claim of newly discovered evidence warranting a new trial is universally looked upon by the courts with distrust and disfavor."

There is much in the record of the present case bearing out the suggestion of the Attorney General that the theory upon which the defendant in the court below sought a new trial was but the putting forward of an afterthought and a subterfuge. But that was a question peculiarly addressed to the discretion of the trial court. People v. Sing Yow, 145 Cal. 1, 4, 78 Pac. 235. And it has been determined by that court, no doubt with a full realization of the responsibility involved, that the motion should be granted. Disassociated as we are from the atmosphere of the trial of this cause, and uninfluenced by those considerations, which the lower court, from his intimate knowledge of the situation presented to him by the motion for a new trial, no doubt gave to the matter, we would have little hesitancy in upholding the position of the appellant. But, as was said in People v. Canfield, 173 Cal. 309, 312, 159 Pac. 1046, 1048:

"We can hardly manufacture in fancy a hypothetical situation in which a reviewing court would be justified in questioning the discretion of a trial court who should grant a new trial in a case involving a criminal charge. * * * We must assume that the learned judge of the trial court acted with a full appreciation of his duties and obligations, * * * and that the conclusion which he reached was not governed by any idle nor any mere technical reasons."

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

BECK v. EDMISON et al. (Civ. 3354.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 14, 1920.)

1. Taxation ⊂=615—Statutory provisions to be strictly complied with to divest owner of property.

In order to divest an owner of his property by a sale thereof for taxes, the law requires a strict compliance with every statutory provision enacted for his benefit.

2. Taxation ⊂=656, 734(10) — Sale of land for taxes more than 30 days after first publication void, and gave purchaser no title.

A sale of land for taxes, made 33 days from the time of the first publication of the notice, was void, and purchaser acquired no title, under Pol. Code, § 3767, providing that day of sale must be not less than 21 nor more than 28 days from the time of the first publication of the notice.

3. Taxation ⊂=814(2)—Owner seeking affirmative relief as defendant in action by purchaser at tax sale to quiet title held not entitled to judgment without reimbursing plaintiff.

Where purchaser at void tax sale brought action against the owner to quiet title under Code Civ. Proc. § 738, and defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and alleged that the title was vested in defendant, and prayed for a decree, quieting the same, court erred in rendering judgment for defendant, quieting his title, without reimbursing plaintiff for amounts paid by him in redeeming the property from delinquent taxes under Pol. Code, § 3771, as a condition precedent to receiving his deed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by S. Beck against Fred E. Edmison and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John F. Poole and Hocker & Austin, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Overton, Lyman & Plumb and George W. Prince, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. By a complaint in the usual form in such actions, plaintiff sued to quiet title to certain lots of real estate. The answer denied the allegations of the complaint, and alleged that title was vested in defendants, who, as against plaintiff, prayed for a decree quieting the same. Judgment went for defendants as prayed for, from which plaintiff appeals.

Defendants, in whom title to the property was at the time vested, failed to pay the taxes thereon for the fiscal year of 1912, whereupon the property was sold to the state. Thereafter proceedings were had and taken, which, on the 8th day of July, 1918, resulted in a sale of the property made by the tax collector to plaintiff, who, upon redeeming the property from delinquent taxes accruing subsequent to the year 1912, as provided in section 3771, Political Code, received a deed to the same, executed by the tax collector. Plaintiff's title, therefore, is made to depend upon the validity of the proceedings under which the tax deed was executed.

Appellant urges two grounds upon which he bases his claim for a reversal of the judgment: First, that the court erred in holding the publication of the notice of sale to be insufficient; and, second, that in no event were defendants entitled to a decree quieting their title, except upon reimbursing plaintiff for tax levies made for the years subsequent to 1912, so paid by him, and the validity of which is not questioned.

[1, 2] As to the first point, it appears that, in accordance with the statute, the property was duly sold to the state in 1913 for delinquent taxes accruing thereon for the year 1912; that in the absence of any redemption of the property from said sale the county tax collector caused to be published in the Los Angeles Daily Journal, which was a newspaper published in the county wherein the land is situated, a notice of the fact that said property was delinquent in the payment of taxes for the years succeeding the sale thereof, and designated the property as having been sold to the state in 1913 for delinquent taxes of 1912, and that unless such taxes, together with costs and penalties, were paid, the property would be sold; all as provided in sections 3764 and 3765, Political Code. While this notice was, as required by section 3766, published for three successive weeks, to wit, on the 5th, 12th, and 19th days of June, 1918, it specified July 8, 1918, as the day on which the sale would be made. It thus appears that the notice fixed the day of sale 33 days from the date of the first publication of the notice, which was in direct violation of the provisions of section 3767, Political Code, which provides that the day of sale must be not less than 21 nor more than 28 days from the time of the first publication of the notice. In order to divest an owner of his property by a sale thereof for taxes the law requires a strict compliance with every statutory provision enacted for his benefit. The Legislature has seen fit to provide that such sales shall be made within a specified time after the first publication of the notice, and there can be no deviation from the rule which requires a strict compliance with such a provision. The rule is so well settled and of such universal application that it would seem an idle act to cite authorities in support thereof. However, see Los Angeles Olive Growers' Association v. Pozzi, 167 Cal. 454, 140 Pac. 581; Holland v. Hotchkiss, 162 Cal. 366, 123 Pac. 258, L. R. A. 1915C, 492; Bank of Lemoore v. Fulgham, 151 Cal. 234, 90 Pac. 936; Warden v. Broome, 9 Cal. App. 172, 98 Pac. 252. It follows that since the sale of the property was made more than 28 days from the time of the first publication of the notice, plaintiff by reason thereof acquired no title to the property, and that the deed so executed to him by the tax collector is void.

[3] As to the second point, it appears that at the time of the sale of the property there was due and unpaid to the state on account of taxes for the subsequent years, including penalties, interest, and costs, the sum of $104.14, which plaintiff, as a precedent condition of receiving the deed on account of his purchase, paid, thus, as provided in section 3771, Political Code, redeeming the property from taxes the validity of which is conceded. Notwithstanding such redemption of the property so made by plaintiff, the court, in response to defendants' prayer for affirmative relief based upon the allegations of their answer, rendered judgment, not only denying plaintiff's asserted title to the property, but declaring the same was vested in defendants, whose title as against plaintiff was quieted, all without requiring defendants, as a condition of granting the relief sought, to reimburse plaintiff for the money expended in redeeming the property from delinquent taxes. In so doing the court erred. As said in Moyer v. Wilson, 166 Cal. 261, 135 Pac. 1125:

"Where the purchaser under a sale which is not effective to pass title proceeds against the owner, the latter may stand upon his strict legal rights, and defend his title without tendering payment of any tax."

Defendants, however, did not restrict themselves merely to a defense of their title, but, as they were entitled to do, by answer asserted title in themselves, and prayed for affirmative relief, thus bringing themselves within the rule announced in Holland v. Hotchkiss, 162 Cal. 366, 123 Pac. 258, L. R. A. 1915C, 492, which is that—

"Where the owner comes into equity asking equitable relief to remove or cancel a tax deed or sale as a cloud upon his title, or to obtain a judgment which, in effect, will invalidate such sale or deed, the court should refuse any relief except upon the condition that he first repay to the tax purchaser, * * * the taxes, penalties, interest, and costs justly chargeable upon the land and which the purchaser has paid at the sale, or afterward upon the faith of it, with legal interest from the time of such payment, less rents received, if any, if the purchaser has been in possession."

This rule is applicable to actions instituted under section 738, Code of Civil Procedure (Holland v. Hotchkiss, supra), where each party may be an affirmative actor in his own right (Klumpke v. Henley, 24 Cal. App. 35, 140 Pac. 289, 313). While in the instant case defendants did not initiate the suit, but were haled into court by plaintiff in an action to quiet his asserted title, nevertheless defendants, by seeking affirmative relief instead of confining themselves merely to defensive matter, come within the rule thus laid down as fully as though they had in the first instance brought an action under the provisions of section 738 to have their title quieted and plaintiff enjoined from asserting any interest in the land.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that, while the sale made to plaintiff was void by reason of the irregularity in the publication of notice thereof, the defendants were not entitled to judgment quieting their title and enjoining plaintiff from asserting an interest in the land, save and except upon reimbursing plaintiff for the amounts paid by him in redeeming the property from delinquent taxes, as to the validity of which no attack is made.

The judgment is reversed.

RIEGEL v. WOLLENSHLAGER et ux. (Civ. 3220.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 16, 1920.)

1. Bills and notes ⟸92(4)—Inadequacy of consideration as defense to note.

$19,400 was sufficient consideration for a note for $20,000, in the absence of fraud, undue influence, or a definite promise to advance the full sum.

2. Contracts ⟸53—Inadequacy of consideration no defense.

Inadequacy of consideration is no defense to the enforcement of a contract voluntarily made.

3. Pleading ⟸8(4)—Allegation of failure of consideration a conclusion of law.

Mere statement in an action on a note that the consideration failed was a conclusion of law.

4. Bills and notes ⟸125—Note and mortgage providing for 7 per cent. interest bears interest from start.

A note and mortgage providing for interest at 7 per cent. bears interest from execution, although Civ. Code, § 1917, provides that, unless there is an express contract in writing fixing a "different rate," interest is payable on all moneys at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum "after they become due."

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Andrew Riegel against John Wollenshlager and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

William H. Fuller, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank L. Stobbs and Hyman Schwartz, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WELLER, J. The complaint seeks the foreclosure of a mortgage given to secure the payment of a note for the sum of $20,000, dated August 1, 1914, due in three years, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from date, payable quarterly, and, if not so paid, to be compounded.

The answer alleges that the only consideration received by defendants for the execution of the note was $19,400, and that the consideration for the note in any greater sum has wholly failed. As a further defense, defendants allege that under the provisions of section 1917 of the Civil Code plaintiff is not entitled to interest prior to the maturity of the note, and that there had been paid prior to the commencement of the suit the sum of $3,150, which should be credited on the $19,400, and judgment entered for the principal sum of $16,250, with interest from the date the note fell due by its terms. By way of counterclaim, defendants aver that they borrowed the sum of $19,400 and executed their note for $20,000; that they have paid $3,150, which should be offset against the $19,400 borrowed; and pray that $3,950 shall be deducted from the amount found due on the note. There is nothing to show how appellants arrive at the figure $3,950.

The court found that the note was executed for $20,000 and interest, as alleged, and secured by the mortgage set out in the complaint; that the sum of $3,198.96, and no more, had been paid; that the full amount of the principal, with interest as provided in the note, less the sum so credited, was due from the defendants; and ordered a decree accordingly.

Appellants specify three points upon which they rely: (1) That the court failed to find on material issues; (2) error in refusing to admit testimony regarding the amount of the consideration for the note; and (3) mistake in date from which interest should be computed.

[1-3] 1. It is contended that the court should have made specific findings upon the issues presented as to the alleged partial failure of consideration, and as to the payment of $3,150 on the principal of the note, as set forth in the so-called counterclaim. The allegation in the answer which forms the basis of this contention is both ambiguous and insufficient. It avers that the only consideration for the execution of the note was $19,400, which is $600 less than the principal sum mentioned, or, in other words, that there was no consideration to the extent of $600. In the same sentence it is alleged that the consideration failed to the extent of the same sum of $600. These averments are not sufficient to tender an issue. If plaintiff loaned defendants $19,400, it was a sufficient consideration for the note for $20,000, in the absence of fraud, undue influence, or a definite promise to advance the full sum, and there is no allegation of any of these elements. Inadequacy of consideration is no defense to the enforcement of a contract voluntarily made. The answer is also utterly lacking in the statement of any facts, occurring after the execution of the note, showing a failure of consideration; but the pleader contents himself with the mere statement that the consideration failed—a conclusion of law. Gushee v. Leavitt, 5 Cal. 160, 63 Am. Dec. 116.

2. Defendant John Wollenshlager testified that he had paid $3,198.96 as interest, but offered no proof of any other or further payment, or any showing in support of his counterclaim. The findings gave credit for the full amount he claimed to have paid. The rulings of which appellants complain relate to the admission of testimony regarding the amount received by defendants at the time of the execution of the note and mortgage. Apparently the purpose of this testimony was to prove that the plaintiff deducted the sum of $600 from the face of the note as a commission for making the loan, and thus attempt to show lack or failure of consideration. As we have shown, there was no sufficient issue tendered on this matter, and the questions were therefore immaterial.

[4] 3. Appellants cite section 1917 of the Civil Code as authority for their claim that interest can be allowed only from maturity, because the rate fixed by the note is 7 per cent. This is based upon the wording of the section, which provides that, unless there is an express contract in writing fixing a different rate, interest is payable on all moneys at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum after they become due. The argument is novel and startling. Counsel concedes that, if any other rate is fixed, the agreement controls; but, simply because the parties chose the legal rate, the lender must be denied interest on his money for three years, and the borrower enjoys its use without compensation. We do not so construe the language. The phrase "on moneys lent" is not modified by the preceding portion of the section referring to maturity, but is an independent clause, specifying the rate only in the absence of provision in the contract. Section 1914 of the Civil Code provides that a loan of money is presumed to be made on interest, and by section 1918 the parties can agree in writing for the payment of any rate, which shall be allowed according to the terms of the agreement.

There is no merit in any of the points raised by appellants.

Judgment affirmed.

LUCID v. CITIZENS' INV. CO. (Civ. 2161.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 13, 1920. Rehearing Denied Oct. 13, 1920.)

Landlord and tenant ⊜167(7)—Landlord not liable for injury to tenant's customer, falling through trapdoor left open by tenant.

A trapdoor in the floor of a leased store, not being so constructed that it was a nuisance in itself, but being such by the manner of its use by the tenant, being left open, the landlord is not liable for injury to a customer of the tenant, injured in falling through it when so left open.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by F. J. Lucid against the Citizens' Investment Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gordon A. Stewart, of Stockton, for appellant.

Nutter, Hancock & Rutherford, of Stockton, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries, and the appeal is by the plaintiff from the judgment of dismissal of the action entered after and upon the order sustaining the demurrer to the second amended complaint, the plaintiff having failed or refused further to amend, notwithstanding that he was by the court given leave to amend within 10 days from and after the making of the order sustaining the demurrer. The salient facts stated in the complaint may be given in a summary fashion as follows:

That the defendant, a corporation, was and had been for a long period of time the owner of a certain building in the city of Stockton, and that the ground floor of said building was subdivided into storerooms and the same rented to tenants engaged in various lines of business; that one of said storerooms was rented by the defendant for a period of 5 years, at a stated and stipulated rental, to H. L. Anthony and Frank Coster to conduct therein a retail liquor business; that prior to the time Anthony and Coster entered into the possession of said premises the defendant "carelessly and negligently cut a hole in the floor of said premises of the dimensions of about 7 feet in length and about 3 feet in width, and carelessly and negligently constructed a trap door of the dimensions of said hole, and so constructed it as to fit in said hole and to lie even with the floor when closed." This door, so the complaint proceeds, weighed about 40 pounds and was opened by lifting the same upon two hinges attached to one side of said door, and the latter could be opened from above by means of a handhold placed upon the opposite side of said door, "but in the ordinary and reasonable use of said door, the same could not be opened from above." The use to which said "hole" in the floor was to be and in fact is put is to enable the tenants of the storeroom to enter the basement thereof from the saloon to get merchandise stored in said basement, there being a stairway (also constructed by the defendant) leading from the trapdoor to the basement, "That the defendant carelessly and negligently, in the construction of said trapdoor, omitted and neglected to provide any guard about said trapdoor," and carelessly and negligently constructed said trapdoor in such a manner that in the operation thereof said trapdoor did not of itself and by the manner of its construction create in itself and by its use a guard or protection to a person in said premises from falling through said hole into said basement, "That in the ordinary and reasonable use of said door, its use left the hole unguarded and unprotected, and created thereby a dangerous nuisance, in that said use of said door invited hurt and injury to any one in or about said premises."

It is alleged that the defendant well knew, at the time it constructed said hole in the floor and said trapdoor, the purpose for which the said premises were to be used by the said tenants, and that the public would be permitted and privileged to enter into and upon said premises to trade and deal with said tenants, and that said tenants would be dependent upon such patronage to pay the defendant the rent provided for by the lease whereby said premises were demised to said tenants; that defendant knew, when it constructed said trapdoor, etc., that said tenants, in the course of their business, would be required to use said trapdoor and entrance into the basement of said premises, and that said door would be left open while in use, and that during the times of its use divers persons would be in and about said saloon. It is then alleged that on or about the 10th day of February, 1918, the plaintiff, with the consent and permission of said tenants, then in the said saloon and that portion of the said building where said trapdoor or hatchway existed and was maintained as above described, without any fault or carelessness on his part, he then being unaware of the existence of said trapdoor and hole, "and said trapdoor or hatchway being then and there open for the use and purpose for which said trapdoor was constructed by defendant, thereby exposing an open space in said floor, and the said opening being without any guard or railing about the same," fell through said opening, striking with great force and violence upon the stairway leading into the basement from said trapdoor, thereby sustaining "a comminuted fracture of the right tibia and fibula near the ankle, a transverse fracture of the right arm, near the shoulder, a cut upon his head, and bruises about his body," etc.

The established criterion by which it is to be determined whether the landlord or owner of demised premises is legally liable to a party injured on such premises through a nuisance existing thereon while they are in the exclusive occupancy and control of a tenant is, in general terms, stated in Kalis v. Shattuck, 69 Cal. 593, 597, 11 Pac. 346, 348 (58 Am. Rep. 568), quoting from Gandy v. Jubber, 5 Best & S. 73, 485, as follows:

"The nuisance must be one which is in its very essence and nature a nuisance at the time of the letting, and not something which is capable of being thereafter rendered a nuisance by the tenant. * * * The nuisance must be, if I may so term it, a normal one."

In other words, or in the language of other cases, the landlord is not liable for the consequences of an accident to a party sustained through a nuisance maintained on demised premises unless:

"(1) The nuisance occasioning the injury existed at the time the premises were demised; or (2) the structure was in such a condition that it would be likely to become a nuisance, in the ordinary and reasonable use of the same for the purpose for which it was constructed and let, and the landlord failed to repair it (Jessen v. Sweigert, 66 Cal. 182; Rector v. Buckhart, 3 Hill, 193; Mullen v. St. John, 57 N. Y. 567; Hussey v. Ryan, 11 Cent. Rep. 626; Wood on Nuisances, §§ 295, 676; Wood on Landlord and Tenant, 918); or (3) the landlord authorized or permitted the act which caused it to become a nuisance occasioning the injury." Kalis v. Shattuck, supra; Rider v. Clark, 132 Cal. 382, 387, 64 Pac. 564.

The rule is well stated in the footnotes in 92 Am. St. Rep. 524, as follows:

"It is not sufficient to render a lessor liable that the premises leased by him are capable of a use which will prove a nuisance to strangers. 'If a landlord demise premises which are not in themselves a nuisance, but may or may not become such, according to the manner in which they are used by the tenant, the landlord will not be liable for a nuisance created on the premises by the tenant. He is not responsible for enabling the tenant to commit a nuisance if the latter should think proper to do so [citing Owings v. Junes, 9 Md. 108; Rich v. Basterfield, 4 Com. B. 805, 56 Eng. Com. L. 782]. In such a case in may be said, in one sense, that the landlord permitted the tenant to create the nuisance, but not in such a sense as to render him liable.' Maenner v. Carroll, 46 Md. 193. The landlord will not be liable for the use of the premises in such a way as to do harm, merely because there was a manifest possibility of their being used in such a way." Clifford v. Atlantic Cotton Mills, 146 Mass. 47, 15 N. E. 84, 4 Am. St. Rep. 279.

See, also, Joyce v. Martin, 15 R. I. 558, 10 Atl. 620; Schroeck v. Reiss, 46 App. Div. 502, 61 N. Y. Supp. 1054; Opper v. Hellinger, 116 App. Div. 261, 101 N. Y. Supp. 616; Duffin v. Dawson, 211 Pa. 593, 61 Atl. 76; Frischberg v. Hurter, 173 Mass. 22, 52 N. E. 1086.

The case of Damrieyer et al. v. Vorhis, 63 Ind. App. 427, 113 N. E. 764, is very similar in its facts to the instant case. There the action was for damages for personal injuries received by the plaintiff by falling into a cellarway leading from the sidewalk to a basement of a building owned by the defendants (appellants) and under lease by one Stark. The charge in the complaint was that said owners "negligently failed to provide any guard or light around said opening, and that a guard could have been erected to protect pedestrians against injury when said cellar doors were open; that said Stark opened said doors on said night [the night on which the injuries complained of were sustained, as above stated] and negligently failed to provide any guard or danger signals, and while so open appellee fell into said opening and down said stairway" and received the injuries for which he sued. The defendants (owners of the building) demurred to the complaint for want of facts, but the demurrer was overruled, and a trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff as against the said defendants. The theory of the action against the owners of the premises was that they were negligent in failing to provide a guard or light around the opening or cellarway, when the doors were raised or open. The Appellate Court of Indiana reversed the case, holding that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained, but, it having been overruled, the trial court should have granted the defendants a new trial, and thereupon allowed the demurrer. Among other things, the court, in its opinion, said:

"Since it is not contended otherwise than that the cellarway and doors were properly constructed, were in good condition, and that the walk over the doors was safe when the doors were closed, during all the time appellants owned the building, it cannot be held that the premises constituted a nuisance per se, but became so by the act of the tenant in leaving the doors open. Under the facts alleged in the complaint, the question of duty to repair and negligence in failing to repair does not arise, but the only question is as to the duty to guard the opening when open. This duty, we must hold, devolved upon the tenant."

In Joyce v. Martin, supra, it is said:

"When property is demised, and at the time of the demise is not a nuisance, and becomes so only by the act of the tenant while in his possession, and injury happens during such possession, the owner is not liable."

See, also, Adams v. Fletcher, 17 R. I. 137, 20 Atl. 263, 33 Am. St. Rep. 859; Henson v. Beckwith, 20 R. I. 165, 37 Atl. 702, 38 L. R. A. 716, 78 Am. St. Rep. 847.

The present case must be decided according to the principles established by the above cases, and, so examining the averments of the complaint here, the conclusion seems irresistible that the plaintiff has wholly failed to state a cause of action for the relief demanded as against the lessor or owner of the premises in question. Nowhere is it alleged that the doors over the hatchway were not properly constructed, or were not in good condition, and therefore it is not made to appear that the hatchway was a nuisance per se. To the contrary, the complaint itself shows that the hatchway could become a nuisance, and hazardous to life and limb, only by the manner of its use. In other words, it is clear from the averments of the complaint that, in the ordinary and usual use to which it might be put for the purpose for which it was designed, the hatchway could become a nuisance and dangerous to customers of the tenants or other persons entering their establishment only by the negligent manner in which it might be used by the tenants. It follows that the owner of the premises owed no duty to the plaintiff with respect to the hatchway. If by its negligent use the plaintiff was injured, the tenants in possession of the property at the time the injuries were received were solely to blame and culpable, for, the hatchway in and of itself not being a nuisance, the duty was cast upon them to so use it as that no one invited by them to enter in and upon the premises to transact business with them was injured thereby.

Of course, as the cases above referred to plainly point out, if, at the time the lease was made and the tenants entered into the possession and occupancy of the premises, the hatchway was so defectively constructed that the reasonable, ordinary, and expected use thereof must result in a nuisance, the landlord is chargeable with the consequences of any accident to person or property occasioned thereby. But, as we have shown, the complaint makes out no such case. The conclusion thus arrived at is decisive of this appeal; hence it is not necessary to notice the point made by the respondent that the complaint disclosed on the part of the plaintiff contributory negligence, which proximately caused the injuries of which he complains.

The judgment is affirmed.

Proc. § 632, requiring findings to be filed within 30 days after a submission of the cause, is only directory, and where no detriment is shown by reason of a delay of more than 30 days, nor any abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court, judgment entered on the findings finally signed will not be reversed by reason of the delay.

Action by the Hutchinson Company against Charles S. Marshall. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Howard Harron, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action was commenced to foreclose a street assessment lien. Upon the trial of the cause on July 7, 1917, the plaintiff introduced evidence to sustain the material allegations of its complaint; the defendant introduced no evidence, and accordingly at the close of the trial the court announced that judgment would be given in the plaintiff's favor. Findings, not having been waived, were to be thereafter prepared and submitted to the court. Nothing further was done in the cause, so far as the record discloses, until December 6, 1918, when findings were presented to the trial judge, and were signed a few days later over the objection of the defendant, and, judgment having been entered thereon, defendant has appealed from the judgment.

The only error of law which the appellant urges upon this appeal is that the court erred in signing findings in the cause after the lapse of time between the trial and the date of their presentation; the appellant contending that the court had lost jurisdiction over the case. There is no merit in this contention. The provisions of section 632 of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring findings to be filed within 30 days after the submission of the cause, has been held to be directory. Eddy v. American Amusement Co., 21 Cal. App. 487, 132 Pac. 83; Kepfler v. Kepfler, 134 Cal. 205, 66 Pac. 208. This being so, and the appellant having failed to show any detriment by reason of the delay or any abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court, or any error committed by said court, either upon the trial of the cause of in making the findings therein, which it finally signed, we hold that this appeal is without merit, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MAZZURCO. (Cr. 905.)

1. Criminal law ⊂⊃742(1)—Credibility of prosecutrix for the jury.

In prosecution for rape, the degree of credibility to be given to the testimony of the prosecutrix and the weight to be accorded to such testimony was for the jury.

2. Criminal law ⊂⊃427(5)—Evidence held to prove conspiracy.

In prosecution for rape, evidence held to establish the existence of a conspiracy to force, entice, or seduce prosecutrix into a marriage with a coconspirator of defendant, of which the rape was a part.

3. Criminal law ⊂⊃423(1)—Evidence of statements and acts of all parties to conspiracy admissible against coconspirator.

Where the evidence is sufficient to prove a conspiracy, all statements, acts, and declarations made by any of the parties, pending the commission of the crime, and looking toward its consummation, is competent against each and every conspirator.

4. Criminal law ⊂⊃424(1)—Admissions of conspirators not admissible against coconspirator after termination of conspiracy.

Whenever the objective of a conspiracy is at the end, the conspiracy has terminated, and the crime has been committed, and the admissions of coconspirators are not admissible against others.

5. Criminal law ⊂⊃423(9), 736(1)—Conspirator's declaration held admissible; whether conspiracy had terminated following commission of offense held for jury.

In prosecution for rape, where there was evidence proving existence of conspiracy to force prosecutrix into marriage with defendant's coconspirator, of which the commission of such crime was a part, evidence as to statements of coconspirators to prosecutrix in defendant's absence after the commission of the crime, in which they urged her to marry such coconspirator, held admissible as against contention that conspiracy had terminated and the question of whether conspiracy had terminated or whether such statements were pursuant thereto was for the jury.

6. Witnesses ⊂⊃387—Refusal to permit cross-examination of prosecutrix as to whether she had given similar testimony on trial of coconspirator held error.

In prosecution for a crime, in which evidence established existence of conspiracy refusal to permit attorney for defendant, after quoting from her testimony on direct examination, to cross-examine prosecutrix as to whether she had similarly testified at the examination or trial of a coconspirator, on objection that there was no foundation laid for impeachment, held error, since such questions were not by way of impeachment, but were asked to test the credibility of the witness and her attitude and fairness toward defendant.

7. Criminal law ⊜1170½(5)—Curtailment of cross-examination held harmless.

In prosecution for crime, refusal to permit counsel for defendant to cross-examine prosecutrix as to whether she had given similar testimony on trial of a coconspirator held harmless, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, where the evidence was amply sufficient to establish defendant's guilt, and where there was no showing of prejudice.

8. Criminal law ⊜1163(1)—Error must be affirmatively shown to have been harmful.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, injury is not presumed from error, but must affirmatively appear after an examination of the entire case, including the evidence, or from the nature of the error itself.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Frank Mazzurco was convicted of rape, and from a judgment of conviction and from order denying motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Foley and C. D. Cavallero, both of San Jose, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WASTE, P. J. The appellant was charged with the crime of rape, in that he assisted and abetted one Salvador Ciulla, in the commission of an act of sexual intercourse, accomplished by said Ciulla, with force and violence upon Mary Schiro. He was convicted, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, and from the judgment of conviction and sentence, he appeals.

According to the testimony of the prosecutrix, a young Italian woman, early on the morning of April 7, 1919, while she was proceeding to her work in the city of San Jose, she was seized and forcibly placed in an automobile by three men, Salvador Ciulla, Sam Mazzurco, and one Carcuffa. She was conveyed to the ranch of appellant some six miles from the scene of the kidnapping. When she arrived at the house she was taken inside by the three men already named, assisted by Mona Mazzurco, Mrs. Frank Mazzurco, and the appellant. She was dragged by these people into a bedroom where she was left with Ciulla. Once or twice after that all the parties came into the bedroom, and the appellant, together with the others assisted in forcibly taking off her clothes. She was left with Ciulla, the door being closed and locked from the outside. Ciulla then forcibly committed the acts of sexual intercourse upon her.

[1] The appellant devotes a large portion of his argument to a discussion of the evidence of the complaining witness, which he claims was of a "very weak character." The question of what degree of credibility should be given to the statements of the prosecutrix, while on the stand, and the weight to be accorded to her testimony, was one addressed solely to the discretion, and consideration of the jurors. People v. Compton, 123 Cal. 403, 407, 56 Pac. 44; People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 200, 48 Pac. 75.

The defendant attempted to establish an alibi, as part of his defense. Three witnesses, one a neighboring landowner and the other two his employés, testified as to seeing the defendant at work in his orchard at various times during the morning upon which the alleged rape was perpetrated. Appellant argues from an analysis of their testimony that it was impossible for him to have been present in the house, and to have assisted in the commission of the acts testified to by the complaining witness. But the jurors may have disbelieved the testimony tending to prove an alibi, or, what is more probable, may have reached the conclusion that, either the witnesses for the defense may have been mistaken as to the hours during which they saw the defendant at work in the orchard, or that possibly he might have absented himself from his employment long enough to have taken part in carrying the girl into the house and in removing her clothes as she testified. People v. Sears, 119 Cal. 267, 270, 51 Pac. 325; People v. Shehadey, 12 Cal. App. 648, 657, 108 Pac. 146.

[2, 3] Over the objection of the defendant, the court admitted the testimony of the prosecutrix, and several other witnesses, as to what occurred when she was forcibly seized in San Jose, and carried in the automobile to the appellant's ranch. The defendant was not present and took no part in the actual kidnapping. He contends, therefore, that the evidence should not have been admitted. Ciulla was madly in love with the Schiro girl, and sought to marry her. She rejected his proposal. There is evidence tending to show that a conspiracy existed on the part of Ciulla, Ciulla's sister, Mrs. Frank Mazzurco, and her husband, Frank Mazzurco, this defendant and appellant, the latter's brother, Sam Mazzurco, his wife, Mrs. Sam Mazzurco, and one Carcuffa, to force, entice, or seduce the complaining witness, Mary Schiro, into a marriage with Ciulla. From all that transpired it appears that raping the girl, by Ciulla, was undoubtedly a part of this plan. It was in pursuance of this scheme that the girl was kidnapped, on her way to work, in the city of San Jose, by Ciulla, Sam Mazzurco, and Carcuffa, and carried in the automobile to the home of this appellant. There, as testified to by the prosecutrix, she was forced to undergo the indignities already described, the appellant taking part in the acts of the ill treatment to which she was subjected. The evidence as a whole if believed, was amply sufficient to establish such conspiracy. That being the fact, all statements, acts, and declarations made by any of the parties pending the commission of the crime, looking towards its consummation, were competent evidence against each and every conspirator. People v. Lovren, 119 Cal. 88, 91, 51 Pac. 22, 638; People v. Holmes, 118 Cal. 444, 456, 50 Pac. 675; People v. Ciulla, 187 Pac. 46.

[4, 5] The court admitted, over the objection of the defendant, testimony of the prosecutrix that after Ciulla had finished the acts of sexual intercourse with her, she was allowed by him to leave the bedroom, and go into the kitchen of the house. Several of the conspirators were there, and when she cried and asked for her parents she was told that she should now be ashamed to have them see her. Mrs. Mona Mazzurco then had a conversation with the girl, the purport of which was that as Ciulla had accomplished his purpose with her, she was disgraced, no other man would ever care for her, or want to marry her, and she should marry Ciulla. The defendant was not present during these conversations, and now contends that the admission of this evidence was error, as being hearsay, not connected with the defendant, and a narration of something that happened after the commission of the rape. Whenever the objective of a conspiracy, in which several persons participate, is at an end, the conspiracy terminated, and the crime has been committed, the admissions of coconspirators are not admissible against others (People v. Oldham, 111 Cal. 648, 653, 44 Pac. 312), but the facts and circumstances here raised a question for the jury to decide as to when the conspiracy, if any there was, terminated, and whether the raping of the prosecutrix by Ciulla was not merely a part of the design, and one advance in the attempt to force her to marry him. People v. Holmes, supra, 118 Cal. 459, 50 Pac. 675. There were apparently three well-defined steps in the method of procedure followed by the defendant and his associates. The first was kidnapping the girl. The second was putting her in Ciulla's embraces. The third, the attempted ingenious consummation of the plan, was to break down the girl's resistance, while she was virtually a prisoner in appellant's house, and laboring under the mental and physical distress caused by the treatment she had undergone, by representing to her that she was forever shamed and disgraced, in the sight of her parents, and the whole world, and could only save herself from her humiliation by marrying Ciulla.

The appellant united his own persuasive efforts with those of the other conspirators, after the rape, and following the conversation the girl had with Mona Mazzurco. In his talks with her, he tried to impress her with "the chances" she was throwing away if she rejected Ciulla. He also attempted to force the girl into writing untrue statements explaining her absence from work, to be delivered to her parents and sister. The further progress of the conspiracy was abruptly terminated by the timely arrival at appellant's ranch of the girl's brother, and a deputy sheriff, who rescued the prosecutrix from her pitiful predicament before any further indignities were suffered by her. The testimony as to the conversations immediately after the rape was therefore properly admitted.

[6] Appellant complains that the court placed an undue restriction upon his examination of the prosecutrix. It appears that the girl testified upon the preliminary examination and at the trial of Ciulla, who was convicted of two offenses, kidnapping and rape. People v. Ciulla, 187 Pac. 46, and 187 Pac. 49. It was the contention of the appellant that at the trial of this case, on direct examination, she gave testimany more explicitly connecting him with the affair, and testified to matters relating to him, not referred to by her in her testimony at the trial of Ciulla. On cross-examination, and for the purpose of getting before the jury the fact that the girl had not before made these statements, counsel for appellant started to read to her at some length her testimony given upon the Ciulla examination and trial. Upon being checked by the court, counsel then repeated to her various portions of the testimony given on her direct examination at the trial of appellant, and asked her if she so testified at the examination or trial of Ciulla. The court sustained the objection of the district attorney, upon the ground that the questions were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial in their nature, and that proper foundation had not been laid, to wit, the production and presentation to the witness of a transcript of her previous testimony, showing she had so testified. For the obvious reason that no such record existed, the appellant could not comply with the court's demand. There was no foundation for this objection and ruling. It was not contended that the witness had so testified. On the contrary, the cross-examination was to the point that she had not, and to elicit the reason why she had not, and an explanation of her present testimony. The questions were not by way of impeachment, but were more to test the credibility of the witness, and her attitude and fairness toward this defendant. Had the answers been allowed, the explanation of the witness might have been full, complete, and satisfactory. She might, for instance, have said that she was not interrogated, on the previous occasions, upon the subject at all.

At most the questions were but preliminary in their nature, and only as the witness answered, and depending upon the character of her answers, might questions by way of direct impeachment have followed. The rulings of the court constituted an unwarranted curtailment of legitimate cross-examination. People v. Jones, 160 Cal. 358, 365, 117 Pac. 176; People v. Hart, 153 Cal. 261, 266, 94 Pac. 1042.

[7, 8] Since the convictions in the two cases last cited were set aside, and the judgments reversed upon the ground of prejudicial error in unduly restricting cross-examination, section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution has been adopted. That section abrogates the old rule that prejudice is presumed from any error of law. People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 65, 130 Pac. 1042. It is no longer the case that injury is presumed from error; the injury must appear affirmatively to the mind of the court after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, or from the nature of the error itself. Vallejo, etc., R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 554, 147 Pac. 238. Unless from such examination it affirmatively appears that a substantial injury, as well as error, has resulted, the judgment must be sustained. People v. Merritt, 18 Cal. App. 58, 65, 122 Pac. 839, 844. Except in the instances we are now considering, no error incumbers the record in this cause. Except, also, in those particulars, the defendant was granted a very wide latitude in his cross-examination of the complaining witness. In view of the evidence, which we must take into consideration, and which we think was amply sufficient to clearly establish the guilt of the defendant to the satisfaction of the jury, and to warrant the conviction of the defendant, we are unable to perceive how appellant was prejudicially injured by the ruling of the court.

The judgment is affirmed.

SMART v. SOSEY, Constable of Pasadena Tp. (Civ. 3286.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 20, 1920.)

1. Execution ⟹141, 149—Levy held not kept good where goods not inventoried nor properly cared for.

There is a failure to keep good a levy on goods in a store, thus letting in a chattel mortgage, made and recorded after the levy, but before such failure, the articles not being inventoried and marked or removed, but remaining in the store; the owner retaining possession of the key, and the person placed in charge as keeper by the officer staying in another part of the city at night.

2. Chattel mortgages ⟹32 — Consideration for mortgage of seized property shown.

Finding in action by chattel mortgagee against an officer for taking the chattels on execution against the mortgagor without paying plaintiff the amount of the mortgage debt, as required by Civ. Code, § 2969, that the mortgage given to plaintiff, who was financing the execution debtor, was without consideration, held not sustained by the evidence.

3. Execution ⟹129—Payment required by officer of mortgage given between levies.

The lien of plaintiff's chattel mortgage having attached after the first levy on the chattels of an execution which was not kept good, but before the second levy, there attached the duty, under Civ. Code, § 2969, of the officer before taking mortgaged chattels under execution to pay to the mortgagee the amount of the mortgage debt.

4. Execution ⟹471—Debtor shown owner of seized property.

In view of contract of plaintiff to furnish the execution debtor finances for his soap business on the security of his cans, etc., held that a finding in action for damages, that plaintiff was not the owner of cans levied on by a third person, which were ordered by plaintiff, billed to him, and at his direction delivered at the place of business of such debtor, was sustained by the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by E. W. Smart against J. C. Sosey, Constable of Pasadena Township. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

M. B. Butler, of Pasadena, for appellant.

Wilton W. Webster, Leonard L. Riccardi, and Edward R. Milliken, all of Pasadena, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover damages for wrongful conversion of personal property. The first count of the complaint is based upon the alleged wrongful action of the defendant, as constable, in seizing and holding and selling under execution certain personal property which was subject to a chattel mortgage in favor of the plaintiff, without compliance with the provisions of section 2969 of the Civil Code, which is as follows:

"Before the property is so taken, the officer must pay or tender to the mortgagee the amount of the mortgage debt and interest, or must deposit the amount thereof with the county clerk or treasurer, payable to the order of the mortgagee."

The second cause of action is for the wrongful taking of certain other personal property under the same execution, said personal property being alleged to be the property of the plaintiff. Judgment in favor of the defendant, from which judgment the plaintiff appeals.

On the 20th day of January, 1919, Charles I. Hixson entered into a contract with the plaintiff relating to the manufacture and sale by Hixson of certain merchandise to be known as Hixson's Hansoap. It was provided that Smart "agrees to furnish the necessary finances to establish and carry on the manufacture of Hixson's Hansoap, upon security on the stock of manufactured goods, raw materials, cans, cases, fixtures and equipment, as may be necessary from time to time." On the 21st day of April, 1919, the sums of money advanced by the plaintiff to Hixson amounted to $500, all of which, on the 25th day of April, remained unpaid. At 9 o'clock a. m. of April 25, 1919, the defendant, as constable and acting under an execution issued upon a judgment rendered in an action wherein the State Bank of Pasadena, a corporation, was plaintiff and Hixson was defendant, levied upon all of the property described in the complaint. At 18 minutes after 1 o'clock on that day, the chattel mortgage which had been that day executed by Hixson in favor of the plaintiff upon the personal property described in the first cause of action stated in the complaint herein, was duly recorded. At the time of the execution and recording of this mortgage the plaintiff had received information from Hixson that the execution levy had been made. It thus appears that at the time of recording of the mortgage the execution was in existence as a lien on Hixson's said property prior in right to the plaintiff's mortgage. The court found that all of the property attached was and remained in the custody of the defendant under and by virtue of said writ of execution from the time when said levy was made, except that on the 28th day of April, 1919, the plaintiff and Hixson wrongfully and fraudulently seized and carried away a certain Ford automobile, which was part of the attached property, against the will of the defendant and without his knowledge or consent, and that the 3d day of May, 1919, the defendant found said automobile at the place to which it had been taken by the plaintiff, and took and retained possession thereof until the time when he made sale of the property seized by him under the execution.

[1] The evidence is not sufficient to sustain the finding last above mentioned. The facts as shown by the evidence are undisputed. On making the levy on April 25th the defendant placed in charge as keeper one William Perdue. This was on Friday, April 25, at 9 o'clock a. m. The property was left in the place of business of Hixson, and the key remained in Hixson's possession. No other lock or key was placed on the premises by the defendant. On Saturday night the keeper slept in a downtown hotel in the city of Los Angeles, and on Sunday night in another downtown hotel in that city, each hotel being located in a part of the city different from that of Hixson's premises. On Monday evening at 7 o'clock, neither the defendant nor the keeper being present on the premises, the plaintiff took the automobile away to another par of the city. On these facts we think it follows as a matter of law that the lien of the execution ceased to exist as against the plaintiff, or, at least, that it became subsequent and subject to the plaintiff's mortgage. On the 2d day of May the plaintiff served upon the defendant notice of his mortgage claim, and demanded that defendant pay the amount of the mortgage debt or release the property from execution. The nature of the possession and custody essential to the validity of an execution is indicated by the statement "that it shall be such a custody as to enable an officer to retain and assert his power and control over the property, and so that it cannot probably be withdrawn, or taken by another, without his knowing it." Freeman on Executions (3d Ed.) § 262. In the instant case, the absence of the keeper abandoned the property to the control of the debtor. The articles were not locked up, they were not inventoried or marked, or seasonably removed. Under these circumstances the levy could not have operated to defeat a subsequent execution. Dutertre v. Driard, 7 Cal. 549. The property could have been sold by Hixson to an innocent purchaser, and the title would have passed to the purchaser free from the lien of this execution. We see no reason why, under like conditions, an existing mortgage lien would not, by force of the abandonment of the execution, immediately acquire priority against it.

[2, 3] The court found that the mortgage was made without consideration, and with the sole intent and purpose on the part of both the mortgagor and mortgagee of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of Hixson, particularly the judgment creditor in whose favor said execution was issued. The evidence does not sustain this finding. We have mentioned the facts showing the actual existence of the indebtedness for which the mortgage was given. There is no evidence of insolvency of Hixson, nor of any fact which would interfere with his right to give or the right of plaintiff to receive the chattel mortgage which was executed to secure that indebtedness. The effect of the failure to keep good the levy of April 25th, followed by a new seizure of the property on April 29th and on May 3d, being times when the mortgage was an existing recorded lien, was such that it became the duty of the defendant to comply with the provisions of section 2969 of the Civil Code.

[4] Appellant further contends with respect to his second cause of action that the court's finding, to the effect that the plaintiff was not the owner of nor entitled to the possession of the soap cans described in the second count of the complaint, is not sustained by the evidence. The evidence shows that those cans were ordered by the plaintiff, billed to him, and by his direction delivered at Hixson's place of business. Taking these facts in connection with the existing contract between the plaintiff and Hixson, we think that there was evidence sufficient to sustain the court's finding as to this matter. The contract is fairly open to the construction that materials of that kind, when purchased and delivered at said place of business, were by the parties intended to be and thus became the property of Hixson.

The judgment is reversed.

1. Limitation of actions ⟸143(6)—Mortgage a contract which can be extended by acknowledgment of grantee of mortgagor.

Notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 2911, declaring a lien extinguished by lapse of time within which an action can be brought on the principal obligation, the mortgaged property having been conveyed by the mortgagor, the note and mortgage are to be considered as separate contracts, so that, though action on the note be barred, the grantee, having in writing, signed by him, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 360, acknowledged the existence of the mortgage, it is extended or continued for purpose of mere foreclosure action.

2. Limitation of actions ⟸146(3)—Grantee of mortgaged land held to have acknowledged contract, extending time for foreclosure.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by Harriet W. Cotcher against H. M. Barton. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. C. Haskell, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

C. E. Chapman and Halsey W. Allen, both of Redlands, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals.

It appears that on November 18, 1908, the Security Investment Company of Redlands made and delivered to plaintiff its promissory note in the sum of $10,000, payable three years after said date, and bearing interest at the rate specified therein, which interest by the terms of the note was payable quarterly. On the same date said Security Investment Company executed and delivered to plaintiff a mortgage on the real estate described therein to secure the payment of said note, which mortgage was, on the 19th day of November, 1908, duly recorded in the recorder's office of San Bernardino county, wherein the real estate described was situated. Thereafter, on September 27, 1911, said Security Investment Company executed and delivered a grant deed, wherein no reference to the mortgage was made, conveying all its title to the property in question to defendant, who from thence up to August 18, 1915, at regular quarterly intervals paid to plaintiff the interest as called for by the terms of the note. No payments on account of accrued interest, however, were made subsequent to said last-mentioned date, nor were any payments ever at any time made on account of the principal of the note. The original complaint to foreclose the mortgage was filed on December 26, 1918, some seven years after the maturity of the note, which according to its terms, became due and payable November 18, 1911. On January 27, 1919, an amended complaint was filed wherein, in addition to the usual allegations found in complaints for the foreclosure of such liens, and for the purpose of meeting the bar of the statute of limitations, which otherwise might be invoked by demurrer upon such ground, it was alleged that defendant, H. M. Barton, on February 18, 1915, "acknowledged to the plaintiff the existence of said mortgage, and agreed to pay the same; and likewise on, to wit, May 17, 1915, and again on, to wit, August 18, 1915, said defendant acknowledged to the plaintiff the existence of said mortgage and promised to pay the same. Said acknowledgments were contained in several writings signed by said defendant, H. M. Barton"—all of which allegations were denied by defendant in his answer, in addition to which, as a defense to the cause of action, he alleged that the cause of action set up in the amended complaint was barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 337, subdivision 4 of section 338, and by subdivision 1 of section 339, all of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court, upon the issue so joined by such allegations of the complaint and denial thereof, found:

"That on February 18, 1915, May 17, 1915, and August 18, 1915, the defendant, H. M. Barton, acknowledged to the plaintiff the existence of plaintiff's said mortgage, by writing letters on said dates, signed by defendant and addressed and mailed to plaintiff, Harriet W. Cotcher, and received by her, in each of which said letters defendant said that he inclosed check for $175 interest due on the mortgage on the Oxford Block, meaning the mortgage sued on in this action. That each of said letters contained a check for $175, signed by defendant, payable to plaintiff, and the same were received by plaintiff on or about said dates. That said letters and checks contained the only acknowledgment or promise to pay the note and mortgage sued on, made at any time by defendant."

Upon this probative finding and the evidence adduced in support thereof, the court, as an ultimate fact, found:

"That plaintiff's cause of action is not barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 337, or of subdivision 4 of section 338, or of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

The sole contention of appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to support this finding.

[1] The action is merely to foreclose the lien of the mortgage. No personal judgment is sought, either against the maker of the note or against defendant, and since, as to the maker of the note, in the absence of any facts pleaded tolling the statute, or acts on its part constituting an acknowledgment or promise continuing the contract, as provided in section 360, Code of Civil Procedure, an action to recover on the principal obligation evidenced by the note was concededly barred when the complaint was filed, appellant, invoking the provisions of section 2911, Civil Code, which provides that "a lien is extinguished by the lapse of time within which, under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, an action can be brought upon the principal obligation," strenuously insists that, even though defendant did in writing signed by him acknowledge the existence of the mortgage, as alleged, an action to foreclose the mortgage given to secure its payment was likewise barred. In other words, if the holder of a note secured by a mortgage given by a third party allows the statute to run against the note, then and in such case no acknowledgment or promise made by the mortgagor, as provided in said section 360, could be deemed evidence of a continuing contract as to the mortgage. We cannot agree with appellant's contention. While the mortgage may be said to be incidental to the note, it is a distinct and separate contract. Particularly is this true where, as here, the mortgaged property has been conveyed and is held by one other than the maker of the note and mortgage. The note is a contract to pay money. While the mortgage is a contract creating a lien upon the real estate described therein to secure performance of an act, no personal obligation to perform the same is implied thereby. Section 2890, Civ. Code. Facts may exist which toll the statute as to the note, as where the maker is out of the state, but do not apply to a mortgagor who remains in the state. Wood v. Goodfellow, 43 Cal. 185, is to the effect that where third persons have acquired interests in mortgaged property subsequent to the mortgage, they may invoke the aid of the statute of limitations as against a mortgagee, even though the mortgagor, as between himself and the mortgagee, may have waived its protection. Other cases illustrative of the principle are: Ward v. Waterman, 85 Cal. 488, 507, 24 Pac. 930; Watt v. Wright, 66 Cal. 202, 5 Pac. 91; George v. Butler, 26 Wash. 456, 67 Pac. 263, 57 L. R. A. 396, 90 Am. St. Rep. 756; Gruner v. Westin, 66 Tex. 217, 18 S. W. 512; Senniner v. Rowley, 138 Iowa, 617, 116 N. W. 695, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 223; Sparks v. Pico, 22 Fed. Cas. No. 13,211; Foster v. Bowles, 138 Cal. 347, 71 Pac. 494.

It follows, we think, that as subsequent grantee of the mortgagor defendant's relation to the mortgage was the same as though he in the first instance had executed the same on his own property, thereby creating a lien as security for the performance of the obligation of the Security Investment Company, maker of the note; that the promissory note evidencing the obligation to pay the money and the mortgage creating the lien must, under the circumstances, be deemed separate and distinct contracts, as to which the party to either contract, without affecting the right of the other to plead the statute, might continue or extend the contract to which he was a party by complying with the provisions of said section 360. While it has been frequently held, as provided in said section 2911, that the lien of a mortgage is extinguished when the principal obligation is barred, in none of them, so far as we are advised, was presented the question here involved, namely, the continuance or extension of the mortgage lien by written acknowledgment of its existence to a time beyond that when the principal obligation is barred. Hence we hold that such cases are not applicable to the facts here presented.

[2] Since we hold that, notwithstanding the note was barred, the mortgage was a contract which could be extended or continued, as provided in section 360, the next question is, Were the acts of defendant such as to justify the court in concluding that it was continued and the action thereon taken from the operation of the statute? The note was barred on November 18, 1915. It appears without contradiction that on the 18th days of February, May, and August, 1915, defendant transmitted to plaintiff his checks, drawn in her favor, for $175, stating in letters transmitting the same that they were in payment of the interest due on said dates upon the mortgage in question. The facts thus established are identical with those involved in Barron v. Kennedy, 17 Cal. 574, except in the latter case the action was against the mortgagor, there being no transfer of the property, and the payment of interest by checks was after the statute had fully run against the note and mortgage. In deciding this case, Chief Justice Field, speaking for the court, said:

"Part payment has always been held sufficient to take the debt, on which it is made, out of the statute. Unless accompanied at the time with qualifying declarations or acts on the part of the party making the payment, it is deemed an unequivocal admission of a subsisting contract or liability, from which a jury is justified and bound to infer a new promise. The authorities are uniform to this point. And it matters not whether the payment be either upon the principal or interest of the debt;" in support of which a number of cases are cited.

The language here used was quoted with approval in Concannon v. Smith, 134 Cal. 14, 66 Pac. 40, wherein it is further held that under section 360, supra, the "acknowledgment or promise" must be "contained in some writing signed by the party to be charged." It is not essential that the acknowledgment or promise should be formal, but it is sufficient if it shows the writer regards or treats the contract as subsisting, from which a promise may be implied. Manchester v. Braedner, 107 N. Y. 346, 14 N. E. 411, 1 Am. St. Rep. 829. If payments of interest so made after the statute has fully run are sufficient to renew the contract, in which case the action is upon the new promise (Rodgers v. Byers, 127 Cal. 528, 60 Pac. 42), it is equally true, we think, that where such payments are made prior to the running of the statute, they are likewise sufficient to constitute a waiver of the statute in so far as it has run, and to continue the contract within the statutory time from the date when such acknowledgment of the existence thereof was made (Dern v. Olsen, 18 Idaho, 358, 110 Pac. 164, L. R. A. 1915B, 1016, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1), in which case the action is upon the original contract. Southern Pacific Co. v. Prosser, 122 Cal. 413, 55 Pac. 145. In our opinion, the defendant's checks and letters written to the plaintiff, wherein he stated they were in payment of the accrued interest upon the mortgage, were sufficient, within the meaning of section 360, Code of Civil Procedure, to constitute an acknowledgment in writing of the existence of the contract creating a lien upon his property, and interrupt the running of the statute in bar of the action, thus extending the time for a period of four years from the date of such acknowledgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Consolidated action by George W. Simons and others against W. L. Porterfield, Margaret S. Porterfield, and another. From judgment rendered, the two first named defendants appeal. Judgment modified.

Allen & Allen and W. S. Allen, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Perrry F. Backus, of Los Angeles, for respondent Allen.

WELLER, J. This is a consolidated action involving the relative rights of mortgagee, beneficiary under a trust deed, and mechanic's lien claimants.

The facts necessary to an understanding of the controversy are set forth in the findings of the court. It appears that defendant W. L. Porterfield was, on October 14, 1915, the owner of certain real property in Long Beach, and on that day he and his wife executed a mortgage on the property in favor of Harry E. Martin for the sum of $27,000, which mortgage was recorded October 20, 1915, and, on October 25, 1915, assigned by Martin to John Watry, the latter paying Martin the full amount of the note secured by the mortgage. Concurrently with the execution of the note and mortgage, Porterfield and wife also executed their note for $10,500, and secured payment thereof by a trust deed on the property, and on April 25, 1916, signed another note for $1,000, secured by the same trust deed. On October 15, 1915, Porterfield entered into an agreement with Martin, by the terms of which the latter undertook to construct a building upon the premises covered by the mortgage and trust deed, and to clear the title of certain other liens then existing against the property. These agreements on the part of Martin constituted the only consideration for the execution of the notes secured by the mortgage and trust deed.

On April 25, 1916, Martin borrowed of John Watry the sum of $9,500, and from Amanda M. Allen the sum of $2,000, giving his notes for these amounts to the respective parties, and as security he pledged the two Porterfield trust deed notes. At the time of the loan of the $2,000 made by Amanda M. Allen, she did not know of the contract between Porterfield and Martin, or that the building was being constructed. Martin failed to complete his contract according to its terms, and as the result Porterfield became entitled to credits against him in excess of the amount of the trust deed notes.

In its conclusions of law the court adjudged the foreclosure of the $27,000 mortgage; that the assignment of the trust deed notes was subject to the equities in favor of Porterfield, so far as Watry was concerned, but not as against Amanda M. Allen; and ordered that the proceeds of the sale of the property be first applied to the satisfaction of the mortgage, and next to the payment to Amanda M. Allen of the amount found due on her $2,000 note. This appeal is from that portion of the decree adjudging the claim of Allen to be superior to the offset of Porterfield with relation to the trust deed notes.

The notice of appeal also states that it is taken from an order denying the motion of Porterfield to enter a different judgment on the findings; but we find nothing in the record filed here upon which we can act. Neither the notice of motion nor the order made appear in the transcript. However, this is not material, as the same result may be accomplished on the appeal from the judgment.

[1] Respondent's counsel devotes much of his brief to an argument against the consideration of the appeal, for the reason that it was taken too late. A motion to dismiss was made in the Supreme Court and denied; and we are bound by that action.

[2, 3] It is contended by appellants that the court erred in adjudging the lien of Amanda M. Allen on the trust deed notes to be superior to the offset of Porterfield as against Martin, the payee of the notes. We think this contention must be sustained. As will appear from the findings, the trust deed notes were executed in consideration of the agreement made by Martin at the time, a compliance with which on his part was prerequisite to his right to recover on the notes. Having failed to complete his contract, for which the notes were executed in payment, he would not be entitled to maintain an action against Porterfield on the notes. As the notes were found to be, and were, in fact, nonnegotiable, Allen took the assignment in pledge subject to all defenses existing in favor of the makers against the payee, her assignor. Section 368, Code Civ. Proc.; McKenney v. Ellsworth, 165 Cal. 326.[1] The fact that the pledgee had no knowledge of the existing equities of Porterfield makes no difference, as the rule of caveat emptor applies to the transfer of nonnegotiable instruments. National Hardware Co. v. Sherwood, 165 Cal. 1, 130 Pac. 881.

[4] Respondent argues that, because the evidence is not brought up, we cannot consider the proposition raised on this appeal. The record shows the facts as found by the court, and the conclusions drawn from the findings. The question for our determination is whether the conclusions of law are supported by the findings of fact. The transcript contains sufficient data for that purpose.

[5] The facts found by the court are not, and cannot be, challenged in this proceeding. It must be presumed that the evidence was sufficient to sustain each finding made, and that the issues were correctly decided. From the record it appears that the trust deed notes were nonnegotiable, that at the time of the pledge to Amanda M. Allen there were offsets existing in favor of Porterfield against Martin, the payee, and that Allen loaned $2,000 to Martin, taking the notes as security for the payment of her loan, without actual knowledge of the existence of the claims of Porterfield. This state of facts did not warrant the court in adjudging her lien to be paramount to the set-off which was awarded to Porterfield by the judgment.

The superior court is therefore directed to modify its judgment in accordance with the views herein expressed.

PEOPLE v. MAYEN. (Cr. 741.)

1. Criminal law ⇐1084—Defendant has right to stay pending application for certificate of probable cause.

Where the trial judge revoked a certificate of probable cause granted by him, the appellate court has no discretion, but must grant a stay of execution until defendant can exercise the right granted him by Pen. Code, § 1243, to apply to a justice of the appellate court for a certificate of probable cause, which can only be done after the record on appeal is transmitted to the appellate court.

2. Criminal law ⇐1073, 1084—Attempt to escape does not defeat defendant's right to stay of execution.

An unsuccessful attempt by one convicted of a felony to escape from the county jail does not deprive him of his right to a certificate of probable cause, if there was room for honest difference of opinion as to error in the record, nor of his right to a stay of execution until he can apply to a justice of the appellate court for such certificate.

Fred H. Mayen was convicted of a felony, and he applies for a stay of execution of sentence until he can apply to the appellate court for a certificate of probable cause after the record is transmitted to that court. Stay of execution ordered.

John S. Cooper, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

W. C. Doran, of Los Angeles, and W. J. Clark, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant in this case was convicted of a felony, and sentenced to the state's prison at San Quentin. Thereafter, defendant having taken an appeal to this court, the judge of the trial court issued a certificate of probable cause. Thereafter the judge of the court below revoked his certificate of probable cause. Defendant thereupon applied to this court for a stay of execution of the sentence until such time as he can lawfully apply to a justice of this court for a certificate of probable cause, that is, until the record on his appeal shall have been transmitted to this court.

[1] We are constrained to the view that, under the authority of People v. Lane, 96 Cal. 596, 31 Pac. 580, and People v. Gal-lanar, 144 Cal. 656, 79 Pac. 378, we have no discretion in the matter, but must grant the stay of execution until defendant can exercise the right granted him by section 1243 of the Penal Code, i. e., the right to apply to a justice of this court for a certificate of probable cause.

[2] It has been suggested by the district attorney that, subsequent to defendant's conviction and while he was confined in the county jail in the custody of the sheriff, he attempted to escape. In our opinion, if there be probable cause for the appeal, i. e., if there is room for an honest difference of opinion as to the existence of any prejudicial error in the proceedings leading to conviction, an unsuccessful attempt to escape does not, per se, deprive the defendant of his right to the certificate of probable cause; and, if an attempt to escape does not of itself deprive a defendant of the right to the certificate of probable cause, it does not deprive him of his right to stay of execution until such time as he may properly present to a justice of this court his application for the certificate. For these reasons we have ordered a stay of execution until the record on appeal shall have been transmitted to this court.

PEOPLE v. GAVIN. (Cr. 896.)

1. Criminal law ⇐1110(6)—Remedy for omission from reporter's transcript may be by suggestion in appellate court.

Remedy for omission of proceedings from reporter's transcript need not be by appeal from order denying motion to correct, but may be, under Pen. Code, § 1247c, by suggestion in the appellate court of necessity of further transcription; the omitted matter having been included in the original application to the trial court, under section 1247, for transcription.

2. Criminal law ⇐1104(3)—Entire record to be transcribed where appellant's application declares it necessary.

Under the provisions of Pen. Code, § 1247, where defendant, after taking appeal, in his application asks for transcription of all the notes of the proceedings on the trial as necessary to present the points relied on, and no order is made limiting the extent of transcription, the entire record should be transcribed.

3. Criminal law ⇐1110(3)—Reporter ordered to add omitted notes of testimony to transcript.

It appearing to the appellate court from uncontroverted affidavits for appellant that notes of proceedings necessary to fairly present points relied on were omitted from the reporter's transcript, which under Pen. Code, § 1247, should have been included, they will, under section 1247c, be ordered added thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

John Gavin was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Heard on motion for addition to transcript. Motion granted.

Mrs. E. C. Harrington, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. [1] A purported record on appeal having been filed in this court, consisting of typewritten clerk's transcript and typewritten reporter's transcript, on behalf of the defendant a motion was made for diminution of the record, which motion was supported by affidavits to the effect that the testimony of Allen G. Moran, a witness, was omitted from the record; that certain objections to adjournment on December 17, 1919, and December 18, 1919, on account of the absence of a witness for the prosecution, had been omitted; and that the proceedings, after the jurors had reported that they were unable to agree, by which they were coerced to agree to a verdict of guilty, were omitted from the record. There was no counter showing, other than the transcripts on file. On behalf of the state it was stated that a motion had been made in the trial court to correct the record, which motion had been denied, and it was contended that the only remedy of the appellant in such a case is by a direct appeal from the order denying the motion, as being a special order made after judgment.

Apart from any provisions of the law, it would seem unreasonable that one convicted of crime should be required to languish in jail during the period required for the determination of a collateral appeal, before he could present his appeal from the judgment upon a record such as is provided for in the Penal Code. It is provided in section 1247c of the Penal Code, that—

"Upon suggestion to the appellate court * * * that a further transcription of the proceedings is necessary, if in the opinion of the court it is necessary to have a further transcription of the proceedings in the trial court, it may order the same to be transcribed by the phonographic reporter within a time fixed in the order; provided that no further transcription shall be ordered upon the suggestion of the appellant unless the application therefor was included in the original application made to the trial court."

By section 1247 of the Penal Code it is provided that upon an appeal being taken—

"the defendant * * * must, within five days, file with the clerk and present an application to the trial court, stating in general terms the grounds of appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies, and designate what portions of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon."

It is further provided that the court shall, within two days after the filing of such application, make an order directing the phonographic reporter to transcribe such portion of his notes as in the opinion of the court may be necessary to fairly and fully present the points relied upon by the appellant. If the court fails to make the order within two days after the application is filed, the notes requested in the application shall be transcribed without such order.

[2] The record shows that within the time limited the appellant in writing requested the court to make an order as provided in section 1247, directing the phonographic reporter to transcribe all notes of the testimony of the proceedings on the trial of the defendant. No order appears to have been made by the court. The entire record, therefore, should have been transcribed.

[3] The reporter's transcript is required to have appended to it the affidavit of the reporter that it is correct. In the present case, the affidavit, omitting purely formal matters, is that—

"as such phonographic reporter, I took verbatim shorthand notes of all the testimony given and of all proceedings had, including all questions to the witnesses and the answers thereto, offers of exhibit evidence; all objections, and all motions of counsel in relation to said case, and the rulings of the court with relation thereto; the instructions requested by the defendant, and by the court refused or given or not given; all instructions and directions of the court given to the jury, including the instructions and directions to the jury after they had retired for verdict for one hour and a half and had reported to the court that they were hopelessly divided and could never agree; all proceedings upon the motion of defendant for a new trial and the proceedings upon the pronouncing of judgment. * * * That my shorthand notes so taken as aforesaid contain a full, true, and correct record in phonographic shorthand writing of all of said testimony and of all of said proceedings. That I have personally, pursuant to the order and direction of the judge of said court, based upon the defendant's statement of grounds of appeal, designating what portions of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon, transcribed from my shorthand writing into longhand writing all of the testimony given, and each and all of the said proceedings and instructions aforesaid upon said trial as above set out. That the foregoing 37 pages of said typewritten matter is a full, true, and correct transcription of my said shorthand writing as above said, directed by the judge of said court to be so transcribed in accordance with the statement of said defendant designating said portions requested to be transcribed by defendant on appeal, and that the same is a full, true, and correct and verbatim statement of all of said matters."

It does not appear from the record that the witness Allen G. Moran testified in the case, nor are the instructions and directions to the jury after they had retired and reported that they were hopelessly divided, mentioned in the reporter's affidavit, incorporated in the transcript. The transcript does not show any objection to the continuances mentioned in the uncontroverted affidavits filed on behalf of the appellant. In view of the foregoing facts it appears to the court that a further transcription of the proceedings in the trial court is necessary, and it is ordered that the phonographic reporter, within 20 days from the date hereof, transcribe and add to the phonographic report heretofore filed herein such portions of the phonographic report of proceedings taken at said trial as were omitted from the phonographic report filed herein, if any omissions there were, so that the phonographic report, as corrected, shall constitute a transcript of all the notes of the testimony and proceedings of the trial from the time the above-entitled case was called for trial to the termination thereof.

The clerk of this court is directed to certify two copies of this order and cause the same to be transmitted, one to the clerk of the superior court of the state of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and the other to the phonographic reporter who certified said transcript; and the clerk of this court is authorized hereby to permit the withdrawal from the files of this court of the phonographic report, as filed, by the phonographic reporter, for the purpose of completing, perfecting, and certifying the same.

1. Dismissal and nonsuit ⟸80—Dismissal is judgment supported by presumption.

Dismissal of an action is in the nature of a judgment against the plaintiff, to which the rule that every presumption is in favor of the validity of a judgment applies, so that notice of application for the order will be presumed, where the want of it does not affirmatively appear.

2. Judgment ⟸363—Statute for relief against mistake does not apply to mistake of court or adversary.

Code Civ. Proc. § 473, permitting applications by a party for relief against an order or judgment had through his inadvertence, surprise, or mistake, does not apply where the mistake was that of the court and of the opposite party.

3. Dismissal and nonsuit ⟸81(3)—Application to set aside dismissal must be made within 6 months.

An application to set aside an order dismissing an action must be made within a reasonable time, and by analogy to Code Civ. Proc. § 473, fixing 6 months as the time to apply for relief against the judgment entered by the applicant's mistake, an application for relief against a judgment entered by mistake of the court and opposite party must be made within 6 months after the dismissal became effective.

4. Dismissal and nonsuit ⟸81(2)—Dismissal not finally effective before entry on minutes.

An order dismissing an action for failure to issue summons under Code Civ. Proc. § 581a, which is supplementary to section 581, directing orders for dismissal to be entered in the minutes, does not become finally effective beyond the power of the court to vacate it until it is entered on the minutes, even if it then became effective without being entered in the judgment book, as required by other judgments by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 664, 668.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by the Consolidated Construction Company against the Pacific Electric Railway Company to foreclose a street assessment lien. From orders of the superior court granting the motion of Arthur T. Stewart to dismiss the action, and granting a motion to set aside an order vacating the dismissal of the action, plaintiff appeals. Order of dismissal affirmed, and order setting aside vacation of dismissal reversed.

C. F. Culver, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Stewart & Stewart, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from, first, an order dismissing the action; and, second, an order setting aside an order vacating the order of dismissal. The facts are:

The action is one to foreclose a street assessment lien on a certain lot in Los Angeles. The record owner of the lot was the Pacific Electric Railway Company, and it was made the sole defendant. The complaint was filed November 12, 1915, and summons was issued the following July, and served on the defendant the following August. The defendant, however, failed to appear, and the summons was not returned until November 12, 1918. Through some oversight, no notation of the issuance of the summons was made by the county clerk in the register of actions. The result of this oversight, coupled with the failure of the defendant to appear, and the failure of the plaintiff to have the summons returned, was that on January 28, 1918, so far the record showed, summons had not been issued, although the action had been pending for more than two years. On that day, one Stewart presented ex parte his affidavit to the court to the effect that he was interested in the lot involved, and that no summons had been issued in the action, although more than 2 years had elapsed. Section 581a of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, in case summons is not issued within a year after the commencement of an action, the action must be dismissed, either by the court upon its own motion or upon the motion of any interested party. The affidavit of Stewart and the record brought the case within the operation of the Code section, and the court without notice to the plaintiff made its order of dismissal upon that ground. This is one of the orders appealed from.

Some 10 months later, and on October 25, 1918, the attorney for the plaintiff, having discovered the dismissal, in his turn presented ex parte an affidavit to the court, setting up that summons had in fact been issued within a year of the commencement of the action, and asked that the order of dismissal be vacated. This application, likewise, the court granted without requiring notice to the adverse party, and made its order vacating the order of dismissal. This last order seems, however, to have been discovered almost immediately, for within a few days a motion was made on behalf of Stewart, this time on notice, to set aside the order of vacation on the ground that it was made without jurisdiction. This motion was granted, and the order granting it is the second one appealed from.

Before considering the merits of the appeals, we deem it worth saying that the case is a good illustration of the complications and difficulties, with their incidents of delay, expense, tribulation, and not infrequently injustice, which are fairly certain to ensue upon the courts tolerating the practice of obtaining ex parte orders in any but the plainest and most certain of cases. The propriety of the order of dismissal in this case depended upon the existence of a fact which the court had first to find, namely, the nonissuance of summons within a year after the commencement of the action. If the attorney for Stewart had felt it incumbent upon him to give notice of his application for a dismissal, or the court had refused to consider the application without such notice, it would have at once developed that the supposed fact did not exist, and the difficulties and complications which now present themselves would have been avoided.

Passing to the merits, it is, of course, evident that the plaintiff is entitled to relief in some manner. What happened was that, without any opportunity to the plaintiff to be heard, its action was dismissed because of a pure error of fact on the part of the court, in which the plaintiff did not participate. The only question in the case is: Can it secure relief on either of these appeals?

[1] It is certain that relief cannot be had by the appeal from the order of dismissal. So far as the proceedings up to the time of making that order go, nothing appears to make the order either invalid or erroneous, and it is only such proceedings that can be considered. The order, when entered, was in the nature of a judgment against the plaintiff. If notice of the application for the order was necessary, as a jurisdictional prerequisite, the want of it does not affirmatively appear, and notice will be presumed. The rule is:

> "Every presumption is in favor of the validity of the judgment, and any condition of facts consistent with the validity of the judgment will be presumed to have existed, rather than one which will defeat the judgment." Canadian, etc., Co. v. Clarita, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 672, 674, 74 Pac. 301, 302.

As to the appeal from the order setting aside the order vacating the dismissal, the order so appealed from is of course erroneous, if the order which set it aside was valid and should not have been set aside. As to the propriety of the order set aside, the order vacating the order of dismissal, there can be no question, provided the court had the power to make it. It was a plain case for relief against a mistake. The questions on this appeal, therefore, resolve themselves into questions as to the power of the court to make the order vacating the dismissal.

[2] It is contended that the court did not have power to make the order ex parte. To support this contention reliance is placed upon section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides in effect that applications by a party for relief against an order or judgment had through his inadvertence, surprise, mistake, or excusable neglect must be made upon notice. But the mistake in this case was not that of the plaintiff, but of the court or of the court and the opposite party, and to such a case section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure has no application. Norton v. Atchison, etc., Co., 97 Cal. 388, 390, 30 Pac. 585, 32 Pac. 452, 33 Am. St. Rep. 198; Hunter v. Bryant, 98 Cal. 247, 33 Pac. 51; Crescent Canal Co. v. Montgomery, 124 Cal. 134, 143, 56 Pac. 797; Robson v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 588, 154 Pac. 8. This, however, is not a complete answer to the objection that the order vacating the dismissal was made without authority. A dismissal, when fully perfected, is a judgment. It might perhaps be questioned if a judgment concluding the action, as distinguished from a mere order made in the course of the proceedings, and not determining the final result of the action, comes within section 937 of the Code of Civil Procedure, even though made without notice, and can be set aside without a hearing upon notice to all affected. See, however, Wiggin v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 398, 9 Pac. 646; In re Sullenberger, 72 Cal. 549, 14 Pac. 513.

[3] However this may be, there would seem to be no doubt that the application to set it aside must, at least ordinarily, be made within 6 months. While such an application does not come within section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the rule is well settled in this state that the application must be made within a reasonable time, and that by analogy to the requirements of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 6 months will be taken as the limit of what may be a reasonable time. See, inter alia, Moore v. Superior Court, 86 Cal. 495, 25 Pac. 22; Norton v. Atchison, etc., Co., 97 Cal. 388, 30 Pac. 585, 32 Pac. 452, 33 Am. St. Rep. 198; Brackett v. Banegas, 99 Cal. 623, 34 Pac. 344; People v. Temple, 103 Cal. 447, 37 Pac. 414; Canadian, etc., Co. v. Clarita, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 672, 74 Pac. 301. The application here was not made within 6 months after the making of the order of dismissal.

The rule prescribing an absolute limit of 6 months for such relief—a rule made by judicial decision, and not by statute—seems very harsh in a case where the existence of the order or judgment is not discovered by the party against whom it was given in time for him to make his application within the necessary 6 months, and it may be that it is subject to the qualification that discovery be made within time for the injured party to apply within the 6 months or he have a reasonable time after discovery to act. So far as we are aware this particular point has not been decided in this state, unless possibly Smith v. Jones, 174 Cal. 513, 163 Pac. 890, be such a decision. But, even if the rule be subject to this qualification, the plaintiff's application here was not in time. In order to extend the period beyond 6 months from the finally effective date of the order, it was certainly necessary that the plaintiff show affirmatively that it had through no fault of its own failed to discover the order in time for it to act within that period. There was no showing whatever of this sort. So far as appears, the plaintiff may have discovered the order of dismissal the day it was made. If, then, the order of dismissal was finally effective the day it was made, the authority of the court to set it aside on motion 10 months later was gone.

[4] The question in the case, therefore, reduces itself to one as to the finally effective date of the order of dismissal. The facts in this connection are that, while the order was signed by the judge and filed January 26, 1918, it was not entered until December 31st of that year. In other words, it had not been entered at the time when the court made its order at the instance of the plaintiff vacating it. The question, therefore, is: Was such entry necessary in order to make the order finally effective, in order that there be a judgment, as distinguished from a mere order upon which a judgment could be had? If the order of dismissal was still of the latter character only, it was something over which the court still retained control, and which it could revoke, either on the motion of a party or on its own motion, if it found it had been made inadvertently and unjustly. Robson v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 588, 154 Pac. 8. It has even been held that after rendition of a judgment, by the filing of findings of fact and conclusions of law, with a direction for the entry of a certain judgment thereon, the court has still the power, up to the time of the entry of the judgment, to change the conclusions of law and the judgment to be entered. See Brownell v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 703, 708, 109 Pac. 91, and cases there cited. After entry of judgment, however, such power is gone. First National Bank v. Dusy, 110 Cal. 69, 42 Pac. 476.

The order of dismissal was made, as we have said, under section 581a of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section and section 581b both require the dismissal of an action in certain cases of delay in the prosecution of the action. Neither section, however, provides just how the dismissal is to be made, other than that it is to be made by the court. Both sections, however, are really supplements to section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and were added to the Code by subsequent amendments. In fact, the provision of section 581a that an action must be dismissed if summons is not issued within a year was originally part of section 581. Section 581, like the two supplementary sections, provides for a dismissal by the court in certain cases; but it also provides how the dismissal is to be made. It reads that such dismissal "must be made by orders of the court entered upon the minutes thereof and are effective for all purposes when so entered." The implication is plain that the dismissal is not finally effective until the order is entered. This construction is also in accord with the view taken by this court of another very similar provision formerly found in section 581. The section provides, not only for dismissals by the court, but also for dismissals by the plaintiff. As to dismissals of the latter sort, the section before its amendment in 1897 (see Hopkins v. Superior Court, 136 Cal. 552, 69 Pac. 299) provided that upon the written request or consent of the plaintiff, the dismissal should "be made by entry in the clerk's register. Judgment may thereupon be entered accordingly." Under this language a number of cases arose involving the question as to the effect of a dismissal requested and entered in the clerk's register, but upon which judgment had not yet been entered. Thus in Page v. Superior Court, 76 Cal. 372, 18 Pac. 385, the lower court made certain orders in an action after a request for a dismissal by the plaintiff had been filed and entered in the register, but judgment had not been entered upon it. The plaintiff applied to the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari to annul the orders so made, on the ground that the court was without authority to make them, since the action was no longer pending when they were made. It was held that the dismissal was not effective until judgment was entered, and the writ asked for was denied. See, also, Page v. Page, 77 Cal. 84, 19 Pac. 183; Acock v. Halsey, 90 Cal. 215, 219, 27 Pac. 193; Rochat v. Gee, 91 Cal. 355, 27 Pac. 670; Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171, 30 Pac. 298, 16 L. R. A. 660; Brady v. Times-Mirror Co., 106 Cal. 56, 39 Pac. 309; Evans v. Johnson, 115 Cal. 180, 46 Pac. 906; Wolters v. Rossi, 126 Cal. 644, 59 Pac. 143. In the last-mentioned case, quoting from Page v. Page, supra, it is said:

"The dismissal is not complete, in the sense that the control of the court over the cause is terminated, until the judgment is entered."

By every analogy to the rule of these authorities, it should now be held that the language of section 581 in regard to dismissals by the court, directing that they be made by orders entered in the minutes and be effective when so entered, requires that they be so entered, in order that they be effective. By very analogy, also, it should be the rule that orders of dismissal under sections 581a and 581b should, like similar orders under section 581, be at least entered in the minutes, in order that they be finally effective and constitute judgments. In fact, strong reasons may be urged why the effective character which an order of dismissal under section 581 assumes, upon its mere entry in the minutes, is an exception to the general rule that judgments must be entered in the judgment book before they become effective as judgments (sections 664 and 668, Code Civ. Proc.), and that the exception should not be extended beyond the particular case provided for by the statute. If this be the true rule, then judgment must be entered in the judgment book, in order that an order of dismissal under sections 581a or 581b be finally effective. But whether the true rule be this, or be that prescribed by section 581, the order in the present case was not finally effective as a judgment when the order vacating it was made, since it had not been entered in the minutes, nor had judgment upon it been entered in the judgment book. It follows that it was still within the control of the court, which could vacate it, if made inadvertently or through mistake. In the present case the court was plainly called on to vacate it, if it had authority to do so. Its action in making the order of vacation was therefore proper, and its subsequent action in setting aside that order was erroneous.

Before concluding, we should, perhaps, say that when we have been speaking of an order of dismissal, or an order for judgment, as not effective until entered, we have been speaking of it only as effective as a final termination of the action, discharging the parties, so to speak, from before the court, and ending the general authority of the court over the action. In many other ways an order of dismissal or an order for judgment is effective before entered, or before judgment is entered upon it. See, for example, Fresno Estate Co. v. Fiske, 172 Cal. 583, 599, 157 Pac. 1127, and cases there cited.

Order of dismissal affirmed, and order setting aside the order vacating the order of dismissal reversed.

Mortgages ⊂=497(2)—Foreclosure judgment against real party in interest binding against trustee.

Judgment of foreclosure against the real party in interest is binding on one who holds merely the naked title as trustee for such real party in interest, and who had no beneficial interest in the property, and who was not made a party to the foreclosure proceeding.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Clara M. Anderson against N. P. Alexander, James Shultz, and Juliana J. Alexander and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the two last-named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Donald Barker and J. M. O'Brien, both of Los Angeles, Wm. H. Neblett, of Los Angeles, of counsel, for appellants.

John B. Nichols, of Santa Ann. and George L. Sanders, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. The facts in this matter are that the owner of certain property gave a mortgage upon it to the plaintiff and respondent. Subsequent to the execution of the mortgage and subject to it, the owner of the property executed three trust deeds to a person other than the plaintiff, securing certain notes. Subsequent to the execution of the trust deeds certain mechanics' liens were imposed upon the property, one or more of which were owned by a corporation known as the James Shultz Lumber Company. The James Shultz Lumber Company thereafter purchased the notes secured by the trust deeds, and proceeded to have the property sold under the power of sale contained in the deeds, and at the sale purchased the property, but took title in the name of N. P. Alexander, the appealing defendant in the present action. Thereafter the James Shultz Lumber Company brought suit to foreclose the mechanics' liens, and made the plaintiff in this action a party defendant, whereupon the plaintiff filed a cross-complaint, seeking to foreclose her mortgage. She failed, however, to make Alexander a cross-defendant. Judgment was rendered upon the plaintiff's cross-complaint, foreclosing her mortgage and directing a sale of the property as against the defendant James Shultz Lumber Company, and the property was sold and purchased by the plaintiff for the amount of her mortgage. After the time for redemption had expired without redemption, the plaintiff brought the present action, seeking to quiet her title against Alexander. He asserts an interest on the ground that the title which he acquired by the sale under the trust deeds was not foreclosed by the sale under the foreclosure judgment against the Shultz Company. Judgment went for the plaintiff in the trial court.

The finding of the trial court is express to the point that Alexander had no beneficial interest whatever in the property, but was acting throughout simply for the James Shultz Lumber Company. Under these circumstances it is well settled that the judgment of foreclosure against the James Shultz Lumber Company, the real party in interest, is binding upon Alexander, who held merely the naked title as trustee for it. The real party in interest was before the court. The finding mentioned is not attacked, and it is the crux of the present action and is decisive.

Judgment affirmed.

DANIELSON v. CITY OF BAKERSFIELD et al. (L. A. 6367.)

Master and servant ⊂=13—City fireman not "laborer," "workman," or "mechanic," within eight-hour day law.

A member of a paid fire department maintained by a municipal corporation is not a "laborer," "workman," or "mechanic," within the meaning of Const. art. 20, § 17, providing that time of service of such persons is eight hours, and neither does Pol. Code, § 3245, Pen. Code, § 653c, nor Bakersfield City Charter, § 142, relating to eight-hour days, apply to a fireman.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Laborer; Mechanic; Workman.]

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; T. N. Harvey, Judge.

Action by C. B. Danielson against the City of Bakersfield and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. G. Graham, of Fresno, for appellant.

Wesley P. Grijalva, City Atty., of Bakersfield, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The only question in this case is whether or not a member of a paid fire department, maintained by a municipal corporation in this state, comes within the provisions of several laws establishing an eight-hour day. The Constitution (article 20, § 17) provides that the time of service of all "laborers, workmen, or mechanics" employed upon any public works by the state, a county, or a municipality is eight hours only. We think it is perfectly obvious that a fireman is not either a laborer, workman, or mechanic, as referred to in that section. Section 3245 of the Political Code contains the provision that eight hours constitutes a legal day's work in all cases where the same is performed under the authority of the state, or of any city or county within the state, and that a stipulation to that effect must be made a part of all contracts to which the state, county, or city is a party. Section 653c of the Penal Code provides that the time of service of any laborer, workman, or mechanic employed upon any public works, or upon any work for the state, shall be limited to eight hours a day, and imposes a penalty upon any one violating this provision. Section 142 of the Bakersfield charter provides that the time of service of any laborer, workman, or mechanic employed upon any public works or upon work done for the city, shall be limited and restricted to eight hours a day. All of these provisions have substantially the same meaning.

It is the opinion of the court that they do not refer to or include firemen in a paid fire department of a city, but, on the contrary, refer to persons engaged as workmen of some kind upon public work, or employed by some city or other public authority, and actually engaged in labor. The court below correctly held that they do not apply to firemen of the city of Bakersfield.

The judgment is affirmed.

PLAX v. PLAX. (L. A. 6392.)

Judgment ⊂=143(16)—Court abused discretion in refusing to set aside default.

Where it appeared that defendant was an ignorant man, that he did not read the summons nor understand its purpose or effect, and that within a few days after the service thereof, and that before the time to answer had expired, he and plaintiff met and agreed upon a settlement, the court abused its discretion in refusing to set aside a default, where application was made within 20 days after it was entered.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Max Plax against Ben Plax. From an order refusing to set aside default and interlocutory judgment, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

A. Guard Hill, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harry Lyons, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The court is satisfied that the court below abused its discretion in refusing to set aside the default entered against the defendant. It appeared that the defendant was an ignorant man, unable to understand the English language well, that he did not read the summons nor understand its purpose or effect, and that within a few days after the service thereof and before the time to answer had expired, he and his brother met and agreed upon a settlement of the matters set forth in the complaint. Naturally, that would lead the defendant to suppose that it was not necessary for him to appear or defend the action, and it furnished a reasonable excuse for his failure to appear or answer the complaint. The application to set aside the default was made within less than 20 days after the default was entered. This was not an unreasonable time. Under the circumstances of the case the default should have been set aside, and the defendant given a reasonable time to answer and proceed to the trial of the case on the merits.

The order refusing to vacate the default and the interlocutory judgment are reversed, and the case remanded to the court below, with directions to allow defendant to file his answer and proceed to a trial on the merits.

VICTOR OIL CO. v. DRUM et al. (L. A. 5155.)

1. Corporations ⟸30(3) — Partnership ⟸93—Owners may sell property at a profit to partnership or association they help organize.

Owners of property either real or personal may form a partnership or association with others and sell the property to the association at any price that may be agreed on between them, no matter what it may have originally cost, provided there is no fraudulent misrepresentation to associates, and are not bound to disclose the profit which they make by the transaction.

2. Corporations ⟸30(3)—Entitled to secret profits realized by promoters.

Where holder of option on land sold land to a corporation which he helped to promote, and divided the profits with certain of the other promoters without such promotors disclosing to their associates in such corporation the fact that they profited by the transaction, the corporation was entitled to recover from the promoters the secret profits made by selling land to the corporation at a price in excess of that for which they had options to purchase it.

3. Corporations ⟸30(3)—Promoter profiting by transaction with corporation has burden of showing he made full disclosure.

In corporation's action against promoter to recover secret profits realized on sale to corporation, the promoter, occupying a fiduciary relation toward the corporation and his associates therein, has the burden of showing that he made full disclosure of the fact that he was profiting by the transaction.

4. Corporations ⟸30(3)—Nonconcealment of nature of transaction of promoters with corporation not a disclosure to corporation controlled by promoters.

In corporation's action against promoters to recover secret profits realized by promoters on sale to corporation, that nature of transaction was not concealed from directors was no defense, where the defendant promoters controlled and directed the corporation.

5. Corporations ⟸30(3)—Failure to directly allege that others were induced to subscribe to corporation's stock held not fatal in action against promoters for profits.

In corporation's action against promoters for secret profits realized on sale to corporation, failure to directly allege that others were induced to become subscribers to the stock held not fatal to corporation, where such fact was indirectly alleged, was not in dispute, and affirmatively appeared from the answers of the promoters.

6. Corporations ⟸30(3)—Value of land sold to corporation by promoters immaterial in corporation's action for secret profits.

In corporation's action against promoters for secret profits made on sale of land to corporation, it was immaterial whether the property purchased was or was not worth what the corporation had paid for it, the wrong being in the profit that was wrongfully made, and the corporation's relief being the recovery of such profits.

7. Corporations ⟸30(3)—Joint and several judgment for full amount of secret profits against each promoter held proper.

Where promoter with options to purchase land sold land to corporation at a profit and paid for land out of proceeds of sale to corporation, and thereafter shared profits with certain of the other promoters pursuant to a fraudulent scheme to profit by organization of the corporation and the sale to it of land in excess of real price, judgment for full amount of secret profits jointly and severally against each of the promoters held proper.

8. Corporations ⟸30(3) — Corporation had right either to reclaim shares issued to promoter pursuant to fraudulent scheme or to recover their value.

Where promoter fraudulently sold land to corporation at a profit and received as proceeds of sale in addition to a cash consideration a certain number of shares at the rate of specified price per share, the corporation, in action for the secret profits, had the right either to reclaim the shares themselves or to recover their value as of the time of the wrong.

9. Corporations ⟸30(3)—Evidence as to the price of stock to subscribers justifies finding that such was the value of the stock.

In corporation's action to recover secret profits made by promoters on sale of land at excessive price to corporation, evidence that the stock of the corporation was being subscribed and paid for at a specified rate per share held to justify finding that such amount was the value of the stock.

10. Judgment ⟸704 — Against codefendants not conclusive in subsequent action in which they are adverse parties.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1910, judgment against codefendants did not operate as an estoppel in an action in which they were adverse parties.

11. Limitation of actions ⟸100(12)—Statute of limitations for fraud runs from time when aggrieved party is put on inquiry.

Where party who has been defrauded has received information of facts which should put him upon inquiry, and the inquiry, if made, would disclose the fraud, he will be charged with a discovery as of the time the inquiry would have given him knowledge, putting the statute of limitations for fraud under Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4, in running as of such time.

⟸For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

12. Corporations ⟸30(3)—Transfer of stock from one promoter to others not constructive notice of fraudulent scheme.

Where promoter made secret profits in sale of land to corporation, and thereafter divided profits with certain other promoters, knowledge of the fact that certain shares issued to the promoter for such land had been transferred to such other promoters held not to put the corporation on inquiry as to whether such shares had been divided with other promoters pursuant to a scheme to defraud corporation so as to bar action for fraud commenced more than three years thereafter under Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4, in absence of information which carried a direct implication or suggestion of possible fraud.

13. Limitation of actions ⟸100(11) — Only inexcusably inattentive party charged with discovery of fraud before actual knowledge.

The courts will not lightly seize on some small circumstance to deny relief to a party plainly shown to have been actually defrauded against those who defrauded him on the ground that he did not discover the fact that he had been cheated as soon as he might have done, and it is only where the party defrauded should plainly have discovered the fraud except for his own inexcusable inattention that he will be charged with a discovery in advance of actual knowledge.

14. Limitation of actions ⟸179(2) — Complaint held to sufficiently allege why fraud was not sooner discovered.

In action for fraud brought after the expiration of the statutory period of three years, complaint alleging the fact, which constituted the fraud and which showed the fraud to be a concealed one, and that the defendants concealed the facts from the plaintiff, held to sufficiently allege why there was no discovery of the fraud sooner.

15. Appeal and error ⟸1039(13)—Failure of plaintiff to plead circumstances under which fraud was discovered held harmless.

In action for fraud, where the evidence makes it plain that the circumstances under which the fraud was discovered did not involve a knowledge of facts upon which the plaintiff could be charged with a discovery prior to the three-year statutory period under Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4, plaintiff's failure to plead the circumstances under which the fraud was discovered held harmless, since defendants were not misled thereby.

16. Equity ⟸87(2)—Failure to bring fraud action within period of limitations from perpetration of fraud on discovery within such period held not laches.

Where fraud was discovered within the period of limitations, failure to bring action within such a period where action was brought within the required three years from date of discovery did not constitute laches in absence of a showing of prejudice to adverse party.

17. Equity ⟸88—Laches must be affirmatively pleaded and proven by defendants unless it appears on face of complaint.

Laches is a defense, and not a condition of relief, and, if it does not appear on the face of the complaint, must be affirmatively pleaded and proven by the defendants.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by the Victor Oil Company against C. P. Drum, P. S. Rishel, George Holman Coffin, Jr., and George H. Coffin. Judgment for plaintiff, and the two last named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Edwin A. Meserve and Jefferson P. Chandler, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Bradner W. Lee and Bordwell & Mathews, all of Los Angeles (Bradner W. Lee, Jr., Kenyon F. Lee, and C. E. Spencer, all of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an action by a corporation against four men who are alleged to have been its promoters, for the recovery of secret profits made by them on the sale of certain properties to the corporation. A joint and several judgment for $32,500 was rendered against the defendants, from which two of them appeal. The facts, as disclosed either by the defendants' answer, evidence that is undisputed, or the findings of the trial court, are these:

In the early part of 1910 there was considerable excitement in the oil business in this state, and the defendants C. P. Drum and George H. Coffin formed a plan to find some oil properties and organize a corporation to take them over. They found two properties, one belonging to the Hamilton Oil & Gas Company, and the other to the California Petroleum Lands Company. On March 23, 1910, Coffin secured a written memorandum from the president and chief stockholder of the Hamilton Company which gave Drum an option to purchase that company's land. Later there was substituted for this option a formal contract of purchase and sale, with the Hamilton Company as vendor and Drum as vendee. This contract is dated March 23, 1910, the date of the option, but it certainly followed the giving of the option. Whether it followed on the same day or not does not positively appear, but there are circumstances which make it very probable that it was not executed until after the organization of the plaintiff some days later, and was then antedated to make it correspond to the date of the option. At any rate, the parties by their pleadings and counsel in their briefs all assume the fact to be that prior to the organization of the plaintiff all that Drum had in respect to the Hamilton lands was an option, and that he was not then the equitable owner of the property as vendee under a firm contract of purchase and sale.

There seems to have been only a verbal understanding at any time in regard to the purchase of the California Petroleum lands.

Immediately upon the acquisition of the Hamilton option, Coffin and Drum, with the defendants Rishel and Coffin, Jr., a son of the other Coffin, began the organization of the plaintiff, and perfected it within a few days; the articles of incorporation being acknowledged on March 26, 1910, and filed with the county clerk two days later. Neither Coffin, Sr., nor Drum appear in the articles of incorporation as organizers of the company, but that they, with their codefendants, were the actual moving and controlling parties admits of no question. Those who appear as organizers were the defendants Rishel and Coffin, Jr., and three others. The organization meeting of the corporation was held on April 7, 1910, and the five appearing as organizers were elected directors, Rishel being made president, and Coffin, Jr., secretary and treasurer. At the same meeting an offer in writing by Drum was submitted and accepted whereby Drum proposed to sell to the company the Hamilton lands for $52,500 and the California Petroleum lands for $31,000. Of the purchase price of the Hamilton lands $40,000 was to be paid in money and $12,500 in shares of the company at 25 cents a share, or 50,000 shares in all. Of the purchase price of the California Petroleum lands $16,000 was to be paid in money and $15,000 in shares at 25 cents a share, or 60,000 shares in all.

The option and contract which Drum had for the Hamilton lands fixed the price of the lands at $35,000, so that by his sale to the company he would make a profit of $5,000 in money and $12,500 in stock of the company at 25 cents a share. By the understanding which he had for the purchase of the California Petroleum lands the price of the lands was $16,000, so that on turning over these lands to the company he would make a profit of $15,000 in stock of the company at 25 cents a share. It is these profits aggregating $32,500 which are sought to be recovered by the plaintiff in this action.

There is no evidence that the fact that Drum was making a profit on his sales to the company was disclosed to the directors of the company other than the defendants Rishel and Coffin, Jr. On the other hand, it was not represented to the directors that he was not doing so, and, of course, the transaction on its face, being a direct sale by Drum to the company for a certain price not fixed, so far as appeared, by reference to what the properties had cost him, involved directly the possibility that he might be selling for a price greater than the cost to him.

Along with the organization of the company, steps were taken to secure subscriptions to its stock. A subscription paper was circulated stating that a corporation was being formed to take over the two properties, describing them, at the figures contained in the offer of sale by Drum. The identity of the seller is not disclosed by the subscription paper, nor is there any intimation that he is one of the organizers of the company and will make a personal profit on the purchase which the company was being formed to make. It appears, in fact, that this profit was not disclosed until several years later.

When sufficient funds had been raised by the plaintiff company, the purchases by Drum from the Hamilton and California Petroleum Companies and the sales by him to the plaintiff were consummated, practically simultaneously, Drum paying for the properties out of the purchase money which he received for them. The profit which he made in money he divided equally with the other three defendants. The stock which he received he also divided with them, though apparently not equally. The division of the stock was concealed, at first by not having the stock transferred, and later by having it transferred into the names of others than the real owners. The division of the profits is denied by the defendants, but that the stock was actually divided is admitted, as is also the fact that Drum paid to or for the benefit of each of the other defendants an amount in money equal to what would have been his share on a division of the profits. The claim is that the stock and money were given for services in the way of securing subscriptions and for other considerations. The finding of the trial court is, however, that the profits were divided as we have stated, and the evidence and the circumstances are ample to sustain that conclusion, and it must be accepted as the fact.

It is also found by the court that neither the subscribers for stock of the plaintiff, other than the defendants, nor the plaintiff itself learned of the secret profits made by Drum and divided between the defendants prior to December 13, 1913, and that the action for their recovery which was commenced November 30, 1914, was brought within a reasonable time after such information was had. As we have said, judgment was given against the defendants jointly and severally for the full amount of the secret profit made by them. From the judgment the two Coffins alone appeal.

[1] The primary question upon the foregoing facts is: Is there any cause of action against the defendants because of them? It is to be noted in this connection that, as stated in Densmore Oil Co. v. Densmore, 64 Pa. 43:

"Any man or number of men, who are the owners of any kind of property, real or personal, may form a partnership or association with others, and sell that property to the association at any price which may be agreed upon between them, no matter what it may have originally cost, provided there is no fraudulent misrepresentation made by the vendors to their associates. They are not bound to disclose the profit which they made by the transaction."

It is also to be noted that the present transaction appeared on its face to be a sale by Drum, so that the directors of the plaintiff who accepted the proposition of Drum must have understood that it was at least possible, if not probable, that he would make a profit.

It is also to be noted that, if it were legitimate for Drum to make a profit on the sale, the fact that he afterwards divided his profit with the other defendants is wholly immaterial. If the profit were legitimately his, he had a right to do with it as he pleased.

Upon these facts the defendants seek to have applied to the present case the principle just quoted from Densmore Oil Co. v. Densmore, whose soundness cannot well be controverted, claiming that by it Drum had a right to sell to the company, and the latter was not concerned with whether he made a profit or not.

[2] The answer to this contention is that the case is not one of a sale by the owner of property to an association organized to purchase it, in which the understanding and basis upon which the association is formed and the purchase consummated is that one of the associates is selling property to the association. In such a case the fact is manifest that the vendor has a personal interest in the sale adverse to the association, and any one going into the enterprise would or should realize that the vendor, even though one of the association, is selling for his own advantage. But in the present case the essence of the business was that the defendants, through the medium of a corporation, induced a number of persons to associate with them for the purchase of certain properties for prices greater than the properties could be obtained for, and without any disclosure either of that fact or of the fact that the defendants expected to harvest the difference in price, and had an interest in having the purchase made distinct from their interest in the association and adverse to the association; that, in brief, they would directly profit by the purchase, not as members of the association, but out of the moneys which their associates would contribute. The moral guilt in such a business, with its concealment of its real nature by those promoting the enterprise from those whom they are seeking to have join with them in it, is apparent.

That the law also will recognize the guilt and give relief because of it is well established. The defendants were promoters of the plaintiff corporation beyond question. The plaintiff was projected and organized by them, and they for some time after its organization managed and controlled it. The part they played was that of projecting and organizing a corporation to purchase certain properties, and inducing others to join with them in the enterprise. This is the essence of promotion. Ehrich on Promoters, §§ 3, 4, and 5; Ex-Mission L. & W. Co. v. Flash, 97 Cal. 610, 626, 32 Pac. 600; Burbank v. Dennis, 101 Cal. 90, 97, 35 Pac. 444.

The defendants being promoters, in the language of Lomita L. & W. Co. v. Robinson, 154 Cal. 36, 45, 97 Pac. 10, 13 (18 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1106), they—

"occupied a fiduciary relation to their cosubscribers, and were bound to truthfully declare to their associates any personal interest that they had in the matter of the purchase. Without such disclosure they could not legally profit at the expense of their associates. If they were guilty of any misrepresentation of facts or suppression of truth in relation to their personal interest in the proposed purchase, the corporation is entitled to set aside the transaction, or recover compensation for any loss which it has suffered."

See, also, California, etc., Co. v. Walls, 170 Cal. 285, 293, 149 Pac. 595, and authorities there cited.

The application of the general principle so stated to just such facts as those of the present case is found in Densmore Oil Co. v. Densmore, supra. There, after the statement we have already quoted that a vendor may, without disclosure of his profit, sell property which he owns to an association formed to purchase it and of which he is a member, the court goes on to say:

"The second principle is that, where persons form such an association, or begin or start the project of one, from that time, they do stand in a confidential relation to each other, and to all others who may subsequently become members or subscribers, and it is not competent for any of them to purchase property for the purposes of such a company and then sell it at an advance without a full disclosure of the facts."

This statement was quoted with approval by this court in Burbank v. Dennis, supra, and the italics are those found in it as so quoted. It covers literally and exactly the present case. Drum and Coffin projected and had in mind the formation of a corporation in which others would be associated with them at the time they first hit upon the lands which were subsequently sold the plaintiff. They in fact were at the time looking for lands for the purpose of such a corporation. They therefore from the beginning "stood in a confidential relation to all others who might become members or subscribers" to the corporation. Standing in this relation, "it was not competent for them to purchase property for the purpose of such a company and then sell it at an advance without a full disclosure of the facts," and yet they did so purchase and sell property without any disclosure whatever to those whom they induced to associate with them.

In Burbank v. Dennis, supra, two men, Dennis and Sanborn, associated themselves on April 20th in a project to acquire certain lands and sell them to a corporation which they would organize and induce others to become shareholders in. They did organize such a corporation and sold to it a number of tracts, and, among others, one known as the Titus tract. With regard to its purchase, the court said (101 Cal. 98, 35 Pac. 447):

"As to the Titus tract, Sanborn was in no sense the owner of it. He had not paid a dollar towards its purchase, and had no word of writing to indicate any interest therein. It was bought with the corporation's money, and all transactions pertaining to the sale of it occurred subsequent to the said 20th day of April. The profit of $25,000, charged to the corporation upon this tract, is not justified in the law, and the corporation has been injured to that extent."

We can see no possible distinction between the facts so presented and those of the one at bar. Another decision, and a very eminent one, whose facts are closely parallel is that of In re Olympia, decided by the English Court of Appeal in 2 L. R. (1898) 153, and under the name of Gluckstein v. Barnes by the House of Lords in L. R. Appeal Cases (1900) 240. For other decisions of our own involving and applying the general principle, see Ex Mission L. & W. Co. v. Flash, 97 Cal. 610, 32 Pac. 600; Lomita L. & W. Co. v. Robinson, 154 Cal. 36, 97 Pac. 10, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1106; California-Calaveras M. Co. v. Walls, 170 Cal. 285, 149 Pac. 595.

[3, 4] So far we have been discussing the general question of the defendants' liability upon the facts shown. From the conclusion that they are liable we see no escape. But there are a number of particular contentions made on behalf of the defendants which should be considered. It is claimed, for example, that the profit made by Drum was a legitimate one, since the fact that Drum was selling to the corporation was not concealed from the directors, three of whom were not parties to the scheme to make a profit, and to whom the possibility, if not the probability, that Drum was making a profit must have been evident, and there was no representation that he was not making a profit. It is also claimed that there is no evidence that the fact that Drum was to make a profit was not disclosed. The answer to the latter proposition is, of course, that when once it is apparent that Drum occupied a fiduciary relation toward the corporation and his associates in it, the burden rested on him to show the full disclosure, without which the transaction was an improper one. As to the first proposition, the answer is, first, that there is no disclosure shown of the fact that Drum was not the owner of the properties, but had merely arranged to purchase them for the purpose of turning them over to the company, and, next, that until some time after the purchase from Drum was consummated the defendants controlled and directed the corporation, so that the knowledge of the directors would have been but the knowledge of defendants, and a disclosure to the directors but a disclosure to defendants. The duty of disclosure which they owed was, as stated in the quotation we have made from Lomita L. & W. Co. v. Robinson, one to those whom they were seeking to induce to join them in the enterprise. The language of the Lord Chancellor in Gluckstein v. Barnes, supra, regarding a similar contention is not amiss here. He said (page 247):

"My Lords, I decline to discuss the question of disclosure to the company. It is too absurd to suggest that a disclosure to the parties to this transaction is a disclosure to the company of which these directors were the proper guardians and trustees. They were there by the terms of the agreement to do the work of the syndicate, that is to say, to cheat the shareholders; and this, forsooth, is to be treated as a disclosure to the company, when they were really there to hoodwink the shareholders, and, so far from protecting them, were to obtain from them the money, the produce of their nefarious plans."

Now, we do not mean to infer that the three directors other than Rishel and Coffin, Jr., were there, consciously to themselves, to cheat the shareholders. But they were there for that purpose so far as the defendants were concerned, and the latter were the directing and controlling power. Any disclosure to the directors would have been futile under the circumstances, and any disclosure which, under the circumstances, would meet the requirements of the law had to be a disclosure, not to the directors, but to those who were asked to subscribe. The subscription agreement did not make such disclosure, and it is a fair inference that it was not made in any other manner. In any case, the burden of showing such disclosure rested on the defendants, and it was not shown.

[5] Another contention made on behalf of the defendants is that the complaint fails to state a cause of action. What has already been said is a sufficient answer to this, except in one particular. The complaint does not allege directly that others were induced to become subscribers to the stock of the plaintiff. This, of course, was one of the essential elements of the fraud, and should have been directly alleged. It is alleged, however, indirectly, and this is sufficient to sustain the judgment, particularly in view of the circumstance that the fact is not in dispute and affirmatively appears from the answers of the defendants themselves.

[6] It is also claimed that the defendants are not liable because there is neither allegation nor proof that the lands purchased were not equal in value to what the company paid for them, and that therefore it does not appear that the plaintiff was injured by the defendants' fraud. Along the same line, it is contended that a recovery from the defendants of the secret profit made was not proper in any case; that the remedies of the plaintiff consisted in either rescinding the purchase, something that is now impossible, or in obtaining damages. The answer to both contentions is the same. It is that the wrong which the defendants committed consisted in their making a profit at the expense of their associates when they had no right to make it. It is wholly immaterial whether the property purchased was or was not worth what the association paid for it. The wrong lies, not there, but in the profit that was wrongfully made. The proper relief in such a case is to compel the return to the association of the profit so made out of it. Putting it in another way, the defendants were under the duty, if they sold to the plaintiff, of making the sale without profit, unless they disclosed that they would receive a profit. They made the sale, but they did not make the disclosure. In this situation they cannot retain the profit. It is as if made for the corporation, and must be accounted for to it. It has been repeatedly so held, and a recovery of the profit permitted, in practically every case of this character which we have previously cited. In addition to them we might also cite Western States, etc., Co. v. Lockwood, 166 Cal. 185, 135 Pac. 496.

[7] It is also claimed that a joint and several judgment against the defendants for the full amount of the profits was not proper; that, as against the defendants other than Drum at least, the judgment should have been only for the share of the profit which each received. It is sufficient to say that the finding of the court, amply sustained by the evidence, is that all four defendants were participants in the fraudulent scheme to make a profit out of the organization of the plaintiff, and the sale to it of lands in excess of their real price. Being participants in the scheme, they are each and all responsible for the full amount of the injury their scheme worked upon the plaintiff. Lomita L. & W. Co. v. Robinson, supra. We have said that the finding that all four defendants participated in the scheme to make a profit out of the plaintiff is amply sustained by the evidence. It is quite strenuously contended to the contrary on behalf of young Coffin in particular. There is no direct evidence that he actually was aware of the scheme and he testifies to the contrary. It also appears that he was ill from before the time of the first official meeting of the organizers of the plaintiff until after the purchases from Drum were completed. But the circumstances of his close association with the other parties, his becoming an organizer, director, and secretary and treasurer of the company, and above all the payment to or for him of his share of the profit and his acceptance of it, are sufficient to sustain the finding that he was a party to the scheme. If any injustice is done him in this respect, the responsibility for it, so far as it rests on others than himself, rests on those who made this young man a sharer with them in their unlawful gains and gave him in other ways as well the appearance of a participant in the scheme in which those gains were had.

[8, 9] It is claimed by the defendants that the amount of the judgment is not correct, since to the extent of $27,500 it represents, not money which the defendants received as profits, but the 110,000 shares of the plaintiff which they so received and which the court for the purposes of the judgment transmuted into money at the rate of 25 cents a share without any evidence, according to the claim of defendants, that they were in fact of that value. The original issue of the shares was a wrong upon the plaintiff by the defendants. The plaintiff therefore had the right either to reclaim the shares themselves or to recover their value as of the time of the wrong. Hayward v. Leeson, 176 Mass. 323, 57 N. E. 656, 49 L. R. A. 725. At that time the evidence shows that the stock of the company was being subscribed and paid for at the rate of 25 cents a share. It also appears that the proposal of Drum which was accepted by the company and under which the shares were issued specifies that they are to be taken in payment of the purchase price which Drum is to receive, at the rate of 25 cents a share. This was sufficient evidence to justify the finding of the court that such was the value. Lehman v. Schmidt, 87 Cal. 15, 22, 25 Pac. 169.

[10] The defendants also contend that the court erred in refusing them leave to file a supplemental answer pleading a judgment against the plaintiff and Drum in an action by the Hamilton Company, wherein a number of the questions of fact involved here were, according to defendants' contention, determined adversely to the plaintiff. The only object of the supplemental answer was to set up the judgment by way of estoppel. The refusal of the court to permit this was correct, since the judgment would not have so operated. It would not so operate because it was not between the parties to this litigation. It is true that both Drum and the plaintiff were parties defendant in the action in which the judgment was rendered, but the judgment was not between them, but between them on the one side and the plaintiff in that action on the other. A judgment may operate as an estoppel between parties to it only when they are adverse parties, so that the judgment is a determination of issues between them. Section 1910, Code Civ. Proc.; 23 Cyc. 1237.

The final contentions of the defendants which require consideration are that the action was barred by the statute of limitations and by laches. The fraud by the defendants was consummated by May, 1910, and the action was not brought until November, 1914. The statute of limitations which applies is subdivision 4 of section 338, Code of Civil Procedure. It provides that an action for relief on the ground of fraud must be brought within three years of the accrual of the cause of action, but that "the cause of action in such a case is not deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party, of the facts constituting the fraud." The question therefore is: Was the fraud discovered by the plaintiff less than three years before the action was commenced? In this connection two somewhat different points are made by the defendants. The first is that the evidence shows that the fraud was in fact discovered, in the legal sense, prior to that time, and, second, that the complaint is defective in the averments necessary to make a sufficient showing that the fraud was not so discovered.

[11] Taking up the first point, the evidence amply sustains the finding that the plaintiff did not have actual knowledge of the fraud until December, 1913. The defendants claim, however, that it should have had such knowledge prior to that time and more than three years prior to the commencement of the action, and rely upon the well-established rule laid down in Lady Washington, etc., Co. v. Wood, 113 Cal. 482, 45 Pac. 809, that discovery is different from knowledge, that where a party defrauded has received information of facts which should put him upon inquiry, and the inquiry, if made, would disclose the fraud, he will be charged with a discovery as of the time the inquiry would have given him knowledge. See, also, Bancroft v. Woodward, 190 Pac. 445.

[12, 13] The circumstances which the defendants rely upon as placing the plaintiff under the duty of inquiry prior to the three-year period are that at a stockholders' meeting in April, 1911, the defendants appeared as representing by proxy the ostensible shareholders into whose names the shares received by Drum had been transferred upon their division, and that, according to the evidence for the defendants, it was stated to one or more of the directors other than the defendants that the latter were the real owners of these shares. The mere appearance of the defendants as proxies for the ostensible shareholders would, of course, mean but little. As to the information that the defendants were the real owners of the shares, it is doubtful if the plaintiff would be charged with having such information, even if it were disclosed to the then directors. The defendants were still, if not in complete control of the corporation, at least the most important factors in it, and were its managing officers. There was as yet no really free and independent board of directors. But, however this may be, information that the defendants other than Drum were then the owners of portions of the stock which Drum had originally received as a part of the purchase price of the properties sold the company certainly did not carry an implication that Drum had not improbably bought the properties for the company and then resold them to it at an advance price, and can hardly be said to carry even the implication that the other defendants had probably acquired the shares through a division by Drum. The most natural inference would be that they had purchased the shares from those whose proxies they held, but the actual transfer of the shares on the books of the company had not yet been made. Without some information which carried a direct implication or suggestion of possible fraud, the plaintiff could not be put upon inquiry. The courts will not lightly seize upon some small circumstance to deny relief to a party plainly shown to have been actually defrauded against those who defrauded him on the ground, forsooth, that he did not discover the fact that he had been cheated as soon as he might have done. It is only where the party defrauded should plainly have discovered the fraud except for his own inexcusable inattention that he will be charged with a discovery in advance of actual knowledge on his part. The present case is not of that character.

[14, 15] As to the point of pleading, the rule laid down in Lady Washington, etc., Co. v. Wood is that, where an action for relief on the ground of fraud is brought after the expiration of the statutory period of three years, the complaint must show: (1) When the fraud was discovered, which, of course, must be within the three-year period; (2) why it was not discovered sooner; and (3) the circumstances under which it was discovered, so that the court may determine whether or not it was in truth discovered only within the three-year period. The complaint in the present case did allege the date of discovery, and such date was within the three-year period. As to the reason why a discovery was not sooner had, the complaint alleged the facts which constituted the fraud and which showed the fraud to be a concealed one, and also that the defendants concealed the facts from the plaintiff. This was sufficient showing as to why there was no discovery sooner. It in fact comes within the exact language of the Lady Washington Case, which is that—

"He [the pleader] must show that the acts of fraud were committed under such circumstances that he would not be presumed to have any knowledge of them—as that they were done in secret or were kept concealed."

As to the third requirement, that the circumstances of the discovery be shown, the complaint contains nothing, and it may well be that it was defective in this respect. But the evidence makes it plain that the circumstances under which it was discovered, a revelation of the facts by Drum after an investigation had been set on foot by the then officers of the plaintiff, did not involve a knowledge of facts upon which the plaintiff could be charged with a discovery prior to the three-year statutory period. The defendants were not misled by the defect of the complaint, and the situation is therefore one where the pleading perhaps is technically lacking, but where there is no lack in the evidence and the opposite party was not misled. In such a situation the error, if there was one, was not prejudicial and is not ground for a reversal.

[16, 17] As to the defense of laches, the complaint, as we have stated, was not filed until nearly a year after the date at which it alleges a discovery was had. The defendants furthermore contend that as early as 1912 an investigation was started resulting in a report in April, 1913, disclosing facts sufficient to charge the plaintiff with a discovery as of that time. It is not necessary to consider the accuracy of this contention. If it be true, the discovery was still within the period of limitation. Mere delay in bringing an action for a time less than the period of limitation does not amount to laches. There must be also present the element that the delay has been to the prejudice of the opposite party. Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 42, 46, 78 Pac. 467; Cohen v. Cohen, 150 Cal. 99, 105, 88 Pac. 267, 11 Ann. Cas. 520. Nothing of this sort of any substance appears in the present case, bearing in mind that we are speaking only of the delay in bringing the action after the discovery of the fraud. Furthermore, it is exceedingly doubtful if under our statute, which provides that the cause of action does not accrue until discovery of the fraud, the plaintiff has not the unqualified right to bring the action at any time within three years thereafter. It was held in Estudillo v. Security Loan Co., 149 Cal. 556, 565, 87 Pac. 19, that the plaintiff had such right for the statutory period after the commission of the fraud, and that the doctrine of laches had no application. If his cause of action does not accrue until discovery, it is not easy to see why he should not likewise have the full period of the statute after discovery. The distinction must be borne in mind between laches in bringing the action within the statutory period after discovery and the laches which will prevent a tolling of the statute for failure to make a discovery, when such failure is due to the laches of the plaintiff. The distinction must also be borne in mind between such a case as the present and one where relief against fraud is sought by way of rescission. There the party defrauded, as a condition of his right to rescind, must act promptly upon discovering the facts which give him the right. The present action is not one for rescission. Rather it is closely, if not completely, analogous to an action for an accounting or to recover money or property had and received by the defendants for the benefit of the plaintiff, wherein certainly no delay after the accrual of the cause of action for less than the period of limitation would bar the right to relief.

We might also add that laches is a defense, and not a condition of relief, and, if it does not appear on the face of the complaint, must be affirmatively pleaded and proven by the defendants. 16 Cyc. 176. In the present case there was neither pleading nor corresponding proof of any prejudice suffered by the defendants through the delay of the plaintiff in not commencing its action sooner after the discovery of the fraud.

There are no other points which justify discussion.

ADKINS v. BRETT. (L. A. 5044.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 26, 1920.)

1. Evidence ⊜222(2)—Statements of defendant as to enticement of plaintiff's wife held admissible.

In action for alienation of wife's affections, evidence as to statements by defendant as to his enticement of the wife held admissible against him.

2. Husband and wife ⊜333(9)—Evidence held to prove enticement of wife.

In action for alienation of wife's affections, evidence held to prove that defendant lured and enticed wife from husband.

3. Appeal and error ⊜1002—Credibility of conflicting evidence for jury.

Where the evidence was conflicting, the question of where the truth lay was for the jury, and not the appellate court.

4. Evidence ⊜220(1)—Competency of declarations by person other than party not affected by party's presence or absence.

The competency of evidence of declarations or statements by a person other than the party to the action against whom they are introduced is not affected merely by the latter's presence or absence.

5. Evidence ⊜220(1)—When statements of others in presence of party calling for denial are admissible.

When party to litigation was present at the time that a person not a party thereto made declarations or statements, and the conduct of such party in response to the declarations or statements, or his replies to them, are of such character as to amount to admissions by him, his conduct, including his silence or want of action, where an inference can fairly be drawn from them, or his replies, can be shown against him and as a part of such conduct or replies the conduct or declarations of others to which they are a response.

6. Notice ⊜14—Statement to party admissible to charge him with notice of fact stated.

Evidence of statement made to a party notifying or informing him of certain fact is admissible to charge him with knowledge or notice of such fact.

7. Evidence ⊜317(3)—Statements by wife as to her relations with defendant, sued for alienation of affections, admissible though hearsay.

In action for alienation of wife's affections, testimony as to statements by wife as to her relations with defendant, though made in absence of defendant, held admissible for purpose of proving wife's feelings, though hearsay.

8. Evidence ⊜317(3, 15)—Hearsay evidence admissible to prove intention, feelings, or mental or physical state of person making statements.

When the intention, feelings, or other mental state of a certain person at a particular time, including his bodily feelings, is material to the issues under trial, evidence of such person's declarations at the time, indicative of his then mental state, even though hearsay, is competent as within an exception to the hearsay rule.

9. Trial ⊜48—Admissibility of evidence competent for one purpose not affected by incompetency for other purpose.

In husband's action for alienation by defendant of wife's affections, the admissibility of testimony as to statements made by wife regarding her relations with defendant, competent for purpose of showing wife's feelings, was not affected by fact that such evidence was not competent to prove the facts stated.

10. Trial ⊜207—Refusal of requested instruction limiting testimony error.

In husband's action for alienation by defendant of wife's affections, where there was evidence of statements by wife as to her relations with defendant, refusal of instruction precluding jury from considering such testimony on issue as to facts stated held error; defendant being entitled to an instruction limiting consideration of such testimony to its use to show feelings of wife.

11. Appeal and error ⊜1067—Refusal of requested instructions limiting evidence held reversible error.

In husband's action for alienation by defendant of wife's affections, where there was evidence as to statements by wife concerning her relations with defendant, court's refusal to give requested instruction limiting the consideration of such testimony to its use in showing wife's feelings and prohibiting jury from considering testimony on issue as to facts stated by wife held reversible error in view of conflicting testimony.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Charles H. Adkins against Albert H. Brett. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

I. Henry Harris and Charles A. Bank, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, and H. E. Wassell, of Corsicana, Tex. (Charles A. Bank, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

OLNEY, J. The action involved in the present appeal is one for damages for the alienation by the defendant of the plaintiff's wife. The cause was tried before a jury, a verdict was returned for the plaintiff, and from the judgment entered upon the verdict the defendant appeals.

[1-3] The first point made on behalf of the defendant is that the verdict is not supported by the evidence. No question is made but that the evidence supports the conclusion that the husband had lost the affection of his wife, as a result of which she insisted upon a separation, or, if the testimony on behalf of the plaintiff be believed, as it must be taken it was by the jury, that acts of criminal conversation had taken place between the plaintiff's wife and the defendant. The particular in which it is claimed the evidence is insufficient is that, according to counsel's contention, it does not show that the defendant lured and enticed the plaintiff's wife from her husband, was her seducer, so to speak. Passing by the question as to whether or not evidence of adultery by a wife not shown to have theretofore lost her affection for her husband is not sufficient of itself to justify an inference of active seduction on the part of the man involved, it is sufficient for the purposes of this case to say that there was evidence of statements by the defendant to a male companion by the name of Tucker made the day after a call by the two upon the wife as to what had taken place the night before, which, if true, justified the conclusion that the defendant was the active aggressor against the wife's resistance on the occasion when first they had criminal intercourse. It is only fair to say that the making of the statements was denied by the defendant, as was any guilty relation whatever on his part with the wife, and that the witness Tucker appears in anything but a creditable light. But evidence of the statements by the defendant was competent against him as admissions by him, and we cannot say that the jury was not justified in believing the evidence. It should also be said that there was considerable corroboration. The case is not one of a want of evidence in any particular, but of a flat conflict of evidence in nearly every particular, with gross perjury on one side or the other. Where the truth lay it was for the jury to determine.

The serious questions in the case arise in connection with the admission of evidence of conversations between the plaintiff and his wife, wherein the latter admitted or stated that she had gone automobile riding with the defendant, had dined with him, had received flowers from him, that he was able to give her a good time, and the plaintiff was not, that she intended to continue to accept the defendant's attentions and the plaintiff could do what he pleased about it, and that he was distasteful to her.

[4-6] One objection to the evidence of these conversations, which may as well be disposed of at the outset as involving the most elementary principles of evidence, is that they were had without the presence of the defendant. The answer to this objection is that it is wholly immaterial whether the defendant was present or not. The competency of evidence of declarations or statements by a person other than the party to the action against whom they are introduced is not affected merely by the latter's presence or absence. If the evidence be not competent if the party against whom it is sought to introduce it was not present when the statements or declarations were made, no more is it competent if he were present. There are apparent exceptions to this, but they are only apparent, and not real, exceptions. One instance is that, when the party to the litigation was present and his conduct in response to the declarations or statements of others or his replies to them are of such character as to amount to admissions by him, his conduct, including his silence or want of action where an inference can fairly be drawn from them, or his replies, may be shown in evidence against him, and as a part of such conduct or replies the statements or declarations of others to which they are a response. But the primary thing which is admitted in evidence in such a case is the party's own conduct or statements, and, unless these are of such a character as to be relevant evidence against him, the declarations or statements of others are not admissible simply because made in his presence. Another instance is where it is sought to charge a party with notice or knowledge, and for that purpose evidence is introduced of a statement made to him notifying or informing him.

[7, 8] The real objection to such evidence as that under consideration is that it is hearsay. The evidence was plainly relevant; that is, it tended to prove matters in issue, and was therefore admissible unless there is some rule of exclusion applicable to it. The only rule of exclusion to which it can be subject is the rule against hearsay. The evidence was, in fact, hearsay, both as to the past matters stated in the conversations and as to the wife's statements of her then feelings toward the plaintiff and the defendant. But the rule is thoroughly well settled that, when the intention, feelings, or other mental state of a certain person at a particular time, including his bodily feelings, is material to the issues under trial, evidence of such person's declarations at the time indicative of his then mental state, even though hearsay, is competent as within an exception to the hearsay rule. In the present case the state of the wife's feelings at the time of these conversations, both toward her husband and toward the defendant, was material, and the conversations were indicative of her feelings, and, this being so, evidence of them was admissible to show her then state of feelings. This much can hardly be questioned, in view of the settled character of the general rule just stated, its plain applicability to just such cases as the present, and the fact that it has very generally been so applied. See Cripe v. Cripe, 170 Cal. 91, 148 Pac. 520, and authorities there cited; 13 R. C. L. 1477; 21 Cyc. 1624.

The difficulty in regard to such declarations as those involved here lies in the fact that, while they may be competent upon the point of the wife's feelings, they go very much further. They contain statements as to matters, such as automobile rides, dinners, flowers, and attentions generally by the defendant to the wife, as proof of which the statements are not within any exception to the hearsay rule and are wholly incompetent. The situation is intensified by the fact that those matters are themselves material to the issues, and, if true, very detrimental to the defendant, so that the admission of the evidence involves the placing before the jury of evidence tending to prove matters in issue, for proving which such evidence is not competent, and the proof of which is very prejudicial to the party against whom it is introduced.

[9] Nevertheless it is clear enough that the evidence, competent for the purpose of showing the state of the wife's feelings, is not rendered incompetent by the fact that it also tends to prove other material matters, to prove which it is not competent. The rule upon this point, which is one of well-nigh everyday application in actual trial, is thus stated by Wigmore (volume 1, p. 42):

"In other words, when an evidentiary fact is offered for one purpose, and becomes admissible by satisfying all the rules applicable to it in that capacity, it is not inadmissible because it does not satisfy the rules applicable to it in some other capacity, and because the jury might improperly consider it in the latter capacity. This doctrine, although involving certain risks, is indispensable as a practical rule."

Cripe v. Cripe, supra, is an illustration of this. A father was sued by the wife of his son for the alienation from her of the son, and at the trial the following question was asked of the father as a witness:

"After the marriage of your son and daughter, and before Dolly [the son's wife] left the ranch at Huasua in August, 1911, did your son ever tell you that Dolly drank to such an extent that he could not control her, or did he ever tell you during that time that she abused him so bad that he could not live with her?"

It is plain that as to the facts that the wife drank to excess and abused her husband, so that he could not live with her, the evidence was hearsay, was not within any exception to the hearsay rule, and was wholly incompetent, and at the same time those facts were material to the case, and, if true, very detrimental to the cause of the wife, so that the introduction of the evidence would be very prejudicial to her as to facts which the evidence was wholly incompetent to prove. Nevertheless the question was held to be proper, and the refusal of the trial court to permit it to be answered reversible error, on the ground that the testimony which it called for was competent to show the state of the son's feelings.

In holding that such evidence is admissible, we are not unaware of the fact that there are decisions to the contrary, and in particular that, so far as the testimony actually excluded by them is concerned. Humphrey v. Pope, 1 Cal. App. 374, 82 Pac. 223, and Barlow v. Barnes, 172 Cal. 98, 155 Pac. 457, are of this character. But in neither of these cases is the point discussed that declarations of the alienated spouse are admissible as competent evidence of his or her feelings at the time, and, if they are to be taken as holding that such evidence is not competent for that purpose, they are directly contrary to Cripe v. Cripe, where the point was considered and decided. If Cripe v. Cripe is not to be taken as having fixed the law of this state upon the point, from which Humphrey v. Pope, and Barlow v. Barnes inadvertently depart, the situation is at least one of conflicting decisions, where we are now at liberty to determine which is correct and should be followed. In this situation there is little question but that Cripe v. Cripe should be followed. It is in accord with the great weight of authority and is but the application in this particular class of cases of a general rule of evidence, thoroughly well settled and applied in every kind of case, civil and criminal. One of the most frequent applications of it in civil cases is the admission of declarations by a testator when his mental capacity or his feelings are material. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 594, 82 Pac. 252. A notable instance of its application in a criminal case is Commonwealth v. Trefethen, 157 Mass. 180, 31 N. E. 961, 24 L. R. A. 235, where upon a trial for murder a statement of the decedent, a young unmarried woman, made shortly before her death, that she was five months pregnant, was held admissible for the purpose of showing that she believed this to be her condition, and therefore had a motive for committing suicide. Upon the point that such evidence, admissible to prove one fact, is not rendered inadmissible because tending to prove some other fact, to prove which it is not competent, the court said (page 187 of 157 Mass., page 964 of 31 N. E.):

"The most obvious distinction between speech and conduct is that speech is often not only an indication of the existing state of mind of the speaker, but a statement of a fact external to the mind, and as evidence of that it is clearly hearsay. There is, of course, danger that a jury may not always observe this distinction, but that has not availed to exclude testimony which is admissible for one purpose, and not admissible for another to which there is danger the jury may apply it."

The rule, then, is that the admissibility of such evidence as that under discussion, admissible because competent as to one point, is not destroyed by its incompetency as to other points which it yet logically tends to prove. The danger, however, of the jury misusing such evidence and giving it weight in determining the points as to which it is incompetent is manifest. In such a situation, as Prof. Wigmore puts it immediately following the quotation already made, "the only question can be what the proper means are for avoiding the risk of misusing the evidence." Answering this question, Prof. Wigmore says:

"It is uniformly conceded that the instruction [to the jury] of the court [that the evidence is competent only as proof of one point and must not be considered as proof of others] suffices for that purpose; and the better opinion is that the opponent of the evidence must ask for that instruction; otherwise he may be supposed to have waived it as unnecessary for his protection."

The general correctness of this statement cannot be doubted. But we doubt if the learned author intended to say more than that the opponent of such evidence is always entitled to such an instruction for his protection, if he asks for it, and that generally it will suffice. But it is not difficult to imagine cases where it would not suffice, and the opponent could justly ask for more. The matter is largely one of discretion on the part of the trial judge. If the point to prove which the evidence is competent can just as well be proven by other evidence, or if it is of but slight weight or importance upon that point, the trial judge might well be justified in excluding it entirely, because of its prejudicial and dangerous character as to other points. A number of the authorities cited by defendant's counsel are distinguishable from the present case upon this ground. This would emphatically be true where there is good reason for believing that the real object for which the evidence is offered is not to prove the point for which it is ostensibly offered and is competent, but is to get before the jury declarations as to other points, to prove which the evidence is incompetent. The same thing would be true as to the introduction of repeated declarations, when once the point for which they are competent has been amply shown. It may also be that the portions of the declaration which there is danger may be misused by the jury are not so interwoven with the balance of the declaration but that they can be disassociated from it without impairing the meaning or effect of the declaration for the purpose for which it is admissible. In such a case evidence of such portions of the declaration may be excluded on proper objection, when offered, if there is opportunity for such objection, or, if there is not, may be stricken out on motion subsequently. The point of the matter is that the opponent of such evidence, so likely to be misused against him, is entitled to such protection against its misuse as can reasonably be given him without impairing the ability of the other party to prove his case, or depriving him of the use of competent evidence reasonably necessary for that purpose.

[10] The question, then, in the present case in connection with the evidence of declarations of the wife reduces itself to a question as to whether the defendant was properly protected from the danger of this evidence being misused by the jury, and considered by them as proof of matters other than that for proving which it was admitted. We think that there can be no doubt but that the defendant was not properly protected in this respect.

When the first evidence of a conversation between the plaintiff and his wife of the character of that stated was put in, defendant's counsel requested an instruction to the jury in effect that the evidence was received only for the purpose of showing the relations between husband and wife, and should not be considered by the jury as proof of the facts narrated by the wife. In response to this request, the judge charged the jury as follows:

"Gentlemen, the court does not at this time or at any time instruct you as to what has been proven or as to what has not been proven. You are the sole judges of the value and effect of the evidence. It is well, however, to bear in mind the fact that this evidence is being admitted and is being received by the court for the purpose of throwing light and elucidating the issue as to the relations existing between the plaintiff and his wife."

When evidence of similar conversations was subsequently introduced, a similar request was made and a similar instruction given. It is apparent at once that the instruction was not responsive to the request of defendant's counsel, and did not meet the situation. The defendant was entitled to a direct, positive, and unqualified instruction that the jury must not consider the evidence as proof of the matters narrated, to prove which the evidence was wholly incompetent. Instead of this the jury was instructed that the court would not instruct them as to what had been proven or not proven, and that they were the sole judges of the value and effect of the evidence, but it was well for them to bear in mind that this evidence was admitted for the purpose of showing the relations between the plaintiff and his wife. There was but one inference which the jury could draw from this, and that was that they were at liberty to consider the evidence as proof of the matters narrated by the wife, if they so pleased, although they should bear in mind that it was not admitted for that purpose. The effect of this instruction was heightened by an instruction given upon the introduction on behalf of the defendant of evidence of other declarations by the wife. After instructing the jury substantially as in the case of similar evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, the court concluded thus:

"In other words, that the declaration of a person, of themselves, or of itself, if it be a declaration, does not necessarily establish the truth of those matters which are alleged to have been stated by the declarant. There must be other proof submitted before you would be justified in assuming it."

It is true that this instruction was given in connection with evidence on behalf of the defendant, so that in this instance the failure properly to limit the effect which the jury could rightly give to the evidence was prejudicial to the respondent, and not to the appellant. But the instruction was in line with the instructions which had previously been given in connection with evidence for the plaintiff, and could not but confirm in the minds of the jury the idea that they had the right to consider such evidence of declarations, whether for the plaintiff or for the defendant, as proof to some extent of matters narrated by the declarations, at least if there was corroborating proof.

The effect of these instructions was not removed by anything occurring subsequently. Nothing whatever is said upon the point in the final charge to the jury. The court did at a later time in the trial instruct the jury with regard to certain evidence introduced on behalf of the defendant that—"It is to be considered by you only in the light of the instruction which I have heretofore given you, as throwing light upon the question of her [the wife's] feeling, emotion, sentiments, affection toward her husband, and not for any other purpose."

The evidence to which this charge related was not evidence of declarations by the wife, but of conduct by her with other men subsequent to her alleged intimacy with the defendant, and this difference would tend to prevent the jury from appreciating the fact that it was inconsistent with the instructions previously given. But, more than this, it is plain that, under the circumstances of this case at least, the only charge at all adequate to remove the effect of the previous erroneous instructions would have been one expressly pointed at them, stating that they were incorrect and should not be followed, and laying down the correct rule in sharp distinction from them. No such instruction was given.

[11] Nor was the error in the respect under discussion a trivial one. The danger of the misuse by the jury of this evidence was great, so great that even the most positive instruction upon the point could hardly remove entirely the effect of the evidence from the mind of the jury. The defendant was entitled to protection against this danger, so far as it could reasonably be given. A positive instruction would at least have minimized its effect. Instead of such an instruction, one was given which practically authorized the use, or rather the misuse, by the jury of the evidence as proof of matters exceedingly detrimental to the defendant and as proof of which it was wholly incompetent. The conflict in the evidence was so sharp and the evidence which the jury was authorized to use wrongly was so prejudicial to the defendant that it may well have had a determining influence with the jury. This being the situation, a new trial should be had.

There are other points made on behalf of the defendant, but they are not of such a character that anything would be gained by their discussion. It is sufficient to say for the purposes of a new trial that we have looked into them and find nothing in them.

SPENCE et al. v. FISHER. (L. A. 5582.)

Master and servant ⊂=301(1)—Adult child's negligent driving of family automobile not imputable to father.

A father who is not guilty of personal negligence is not liable for damages sustained by third party by reason of negligent driving of an automobile by an adult member of his family using the same for his own purposes, the automobile being owned and maintained by the father for the general convenience, use, and the pleasure of his family, and the particular member of the family operating the same having permission to use it for his or her pleasure, notwithstanding Motor Vehicle Act 1919, § 24, relating to liability of parents where licenses are granted minors.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Actions by Emma Jones Spence and Philip T. Spence, respectively, against Henry Fisher. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Duke Stone and Barnhill & Pratt, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Allison & Dickson, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in two actions which, by stipulation of the parties, were treated and tried as one action in the superior court. The plaintiffs are husband and wife, and the actions were for the recovery of damages for personal injuries occasioned by a collision between a horse-drawn vehicle in which the plaintiffs were proceeding along a public street in the city of Redlands, and an automobile owned by defendant, which was being driven along said street by one Natalia Fisher, an adult daughter of defendant.

It was alleged and found that the collision and consequent injuries were due to the negligence of Miss Fisher in the operation of the automobile. Assuming the finding in this regard to be sufficiently supported by evidence, the remaining question is as to the liability of defendant for the result of his daughter's negligence.

On this branch of the case there is no dispute as to the material facts. Defendant was the owner of the automobile and kept and maintained the same for "the use, convenience, and pleasure of his family." His daughter, then 19 years of age, resided at the family home in Redlands with her father and mother. She was accustomed to drive the car, and had defendant's permission to use the same whenever she saw fit to do so. At the time of the accident she was driving the automobile on her way to a concert for her own pleasure, which she was attending without direction or suggestion from her father or mother, having as her guest in the car the governess of defendant's younger daughter, who was a member of defendant's household, but not a member of his family. In this respect the finding of the trial court is that the automobile was being operated by Miss Fisher, accompanied by Miss Peisch, the governess, "for the convenience, use, and pleasure of the said Natalia Fisher and the said Mae Peisch." No other member of the family was in the car. Defendant was absent from Redlands that day, and knew nothing of this particular use of the car until after the accident.

Upon these facts the question is presented as to the liability of a father who is not guilty of personal negligence in the matter for damages sustained by third parties by reason of the negligent driving of an automobile by an adult member of his family, when such member of the family is using the same for his or her own purposes, the automobile being owned and maintained by the father for the general convenience, use, and pleasure of his family, and the particular member of the family operating the same having his permission to use the same at his or her pleasure.

This question has never been decided by this court. The father was held liable under such circumstances by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District in Crittenden v. Murphy et al., 36 Cal. App. 803, 173 Pac. 595. No petition for a hearing of that case was presented to this court, and the decision became final without any consideration of the matter by us. In the earlier case of McWhirter v. Fuller, 35 Cal. App. 288, 170 Pac. 417, the same doctrine was enunciated by the same court, but there it was manifestly dictum, and in denying a petition for a nearing in this court we withheld approval of that portion of the opinion. (35 Cal. App. 292, 170 Pac. 419.)

The question is one in regard to which there is an irreconcilable conflict in the decisions of the courts of last resort of the various states in which it has been presented for consideration. It may safely be said, however, that it is now generally conceded that, in the absence of statutory provision for such a liability, the liability of the father must be based upon the conclusion that the negligence of the driver is imputed to him on the theory that such driver was acting as the agent or servant of the father in driving the car. No authority sustaining the doctrine of liability under such circumstances that we have seen puts the decision on any other ground, even when the driver was a minor child, in the absence of a statute creating it; it being recognized that there is nothing in the nature of the automobile itself or in the relationship of parent and child, aside from the fact that the latter is a member of the family of the parent, to create such a liability. Of course, all the courts recognize the general rule that the parent is not liable for the torts of his child.

As we said in Bryant v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 737, 164 Pac. 385:

> "In order that the negligence of one person may be properly imputed to another, they must stand in such relation of privity that the maxim, 'Qui facit per alium facit per se,' directly applies."

On principle it seems difficult to conceive of any such relationship under the circumstances we have stated. It is true that the law of agency is not confined to business transactions, and we can readily conceive of the automobile so provided and maintained being used at a particular time by a member of the family under such circumstances as to make such member of the family the agent or servant of the father in such use. A plain case of such a use would appear in the event that the member of the family was using the machine on some special mission of the father, doing something that he had been directed by the father to do for him. The negligence of the driver would then be imputed to the father, not because the former was a member of the family, but because he was the agent or servant of the father, engaged in the father's business, precisely as if he were the hired chauffeur of the father. And we can conceive of many situations with relation to the use by a member of the family of a machine so kept and maintained as to which it might fairly be held that the driver was engaged at the particular time on the business of the father, and acting within the scope of his employment as agent or servant of the father. As was said by the Court of Appeals of New York in Van Blaricom v. Dodgson, 220 N. Y. 111, 115 N. E. 443, L. R. A. 1917F, 363: "The question whether one person is the agent of another in respect of some transaction is to be determined by the fact that he represents and is acting for him," and wherever the situation is such that the driver may fairly be said to be acting for the father in his use of the automobile, the doctrine of imputed negligence may be held applicable. But it seems to us that it cannot reasonably be held that a member of the family using a car so provided, kept and maintained by the father for the pleasure and convenience of his family, solely on his own mission for his own personal pleasure or convenience, is acting for his father or is engaged on the father's business, notwithstanding that such use was one of the purposes for which the car was provided and maintained. In such a situation we would have simply a permissive use of the father's car by another, solely on that other's business, practically the same use of the owner's automobile that is had by one not a member of his family to whom he loans it for such third party's own use or enjoyment, the only difference being that in the latter case the car is not provided, kept, and maintained by the owner for the purpose of allowing others to use it. It seems to us that this is an immaterial factor. For the purposes of argument we may conceive of some kind-hearted individual who keeps a car for the avowed purpose of not only using it himself, but also of allowing his less opulent friend and neighbor to use it whenever he desires to do so. Certainly in such a case no one would claim that when the neighbor is using it solely on his own mission he was acting as the agent of the owner.

Some of the courts appear to hold that, where a car is so provided and maintained by a father for the use of the members of his family for their pleasure and convenience, he makes that pleasure and convenience his own "business," and that any member of the family using the car exclusively for his or her own purposes is doing so in carrying on the business of the father as the father's agent. As the New York Court of Appeals said in Van Blaricom v. Dodgson, supra, this is certainly "an advanced proposition in the law of principal and agent," presenting "a case of such theoretical and attenuated agency, if any, as would be beyond the recognition of sound principles of law as they are ordinarily applied to that relationship." The idea that a capable child in using for his own pleasure some article that a kind father has provided for the enjoyment of the members of his family is carrying on, as his father's agent, his father's business, in thus entertaining himself, is somewhat unique. As one of the courts in criticism of this view suggested, it would have to be held thereunder that an adult son, a member of his father's family, using a car so provided and maintained for the use of any member of the family, for the sole purpose of taking his own "best girl" riding, would in so doing be carrying on his father's business, acting as his father's agent. Walkins v. Clark, 103 Kan. 629, 631, 176 Pac. 131. Such a case would be no different, in so far as the principles applicable to the relations of principal and agent or that of master and servant are concerned, from any case of the permissive use of the car by a member of the family solely for his own pleasure or convenience. Of course, it is true that every good father makes it his "business," in a certain sense of that word, to furnish so far as he can, for use by the members of his family, all those things that will contribute to their convenience and pleasure. But to our minds his doing this cannot, by any sound reasoning, warrant a conclusion that, in the subsequent use of the thing by a member of the family solely for his own convenience or pleasure, while engaged exclusively on a mission of his own, such member of the family is engaged on the father's business or in any way acting as his agent or servant.

We conclude that upon the facts stated at the outset there is no liability on the part of the father for the negligence of his daughter. Our conclusion finds ample support in what appears to us to be the weight of authority. See Doran v. Thomsen, 76 N. J. Law, 754, 71 Atl. 296, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 335, 131 Am. St. Rep. 677; Parker v. Wilson, 179 Ala. 361, 60 South. 150, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 87; Van Blaricom v. Dodgson, 220 N. Y. 111, 115 N. E. 443, L. R. A. 1915F, 363; Loehr v. Abell, 174 Mich. 590, 140 N. W. 926; Bolman v. Bullene (Supreme Court of Missouri) 200 S. W. 1068; Hays v. Hogan, 273 Mo. 1, 200 S. W. 286, L. R. A. 1918C, 715, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 1127; Blair v. Broadwater, 121 Va. 301, 93 S. E. 632, L. R. A. 1918A, 1011; Zeeb v. Bahnmaier, 103 Kan. 599, 176 Pac. 326, 2 A. L. R. 883; Watkins v. Clark, 103 Kan. 629, 176 Pac. 131; Elms v. Flick (Ohio) 126 N. E. 66; Arkin v. Page, 287 Ill. 420, 123 N. E. 30, 5 A. L. R. 216.

Many of the cases cited by learned counsel for respondent fail to sustain any claim of liability on the part of the father in such a case as the one before us. In McNeal v. McKain, 33 Okl. 449, 126 Pac. 742, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 775, a minor son was operating a car, so kept, in which at the time were his sister and a guest of the family, who were being carried for their pleasure. The court took occasion to say that the father would not be liable if the son were driving on his own business exclusively. The Missouri cases cited, Daily v. Maxwell, 152 Mo. App. 415, 133 S. W. 351, and Hays v. Hogan, 180 Mo. App. 237, 165 S. W. 1125, both from inferior courts, were overruled by later Supreme Court decisions. In Smith v. Jordan, 211 Mass. 269, 97 N. E. 761, the father was held liable, but the decision was based upon the fact that the minor son was driving his mother, in accord with general instructions expressly or impliedly given by the father, and the court took occasion to say that, if the son had been operating the car in the performance of some independent design of his own, there would have been no liability on the part of the father. In Lemke v. Ady (Iowa) 159 N. W. 1011, the minor child was driving his mother and two visiting guests, and it was said that to sustain a claim of liability on the part of the father it must appear that the minor was engaged in some act for the benefit of the father or some member of the family. In Stowe v. Morris, 147 Ky. 386, 144 S. W. 52, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 224, the minor son was driving his sister and her friends. In Farnham v. Clifford, 116 Me. 299, 101 Atl. 468, the question is not decided, the court putting stress on an admission of liability on the part of the defendant as making the evidence sufficient to support the verdict. Hiroux v. Baum, 137 Wis. 197, 118 N. W. 533, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 332, is not in point. The father had purchased the car and arranged to have his son learn to drive it for the further use of the car, and the son was driving it under the instructor's guidance at the time of the accident. This was held sufficient to support the conclusion that he was then engaged in his father's business. The contention of respondent is, however, upheld by the opinions in Kayser v. Van Nest, 125 Minn. 277, 146 N. W. 1091, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 970; Uphoff v. McCormick, 139 Minn. 392, 166 N. W. 788; Birch v. Abercrombie, 74 Wash. 486, 133 Pac. 1020, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 59; Hutchins v. Haffner, 63 Colo. 365, 167 Pac. 966, L. R. A. 1918A, 1008; Griffin v. Russell, 144 Ga. 275, 87 S. E. 10, L. R. A. 1916F, 216, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 994; Lewis v. Steele, 52 Mont. 300, 157 Pac. 575; Boes v. Howell, 24 N. Mex. 142, 173 Pac. 966, L. R. A. 1918F, 288; Davis v. Littlefield, 97 S. Car. 171, 81 S. E. 487; King v. Smythe, 104 Tenn. 217, 204 S. As we have said, there is a hopeless conflict in the decisions, but we are of the opinion that the weight of authority is in accord with our conclusion. The only statutory enactment in any way touching such a matter that we have thus far is the provision of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1919 (St. 1919, p. 191), which requires the parents of a minor child to join in the minor's application for a license to operate a car, and provides that any negligence of such minor in operating the car shall be imputed to the persons signing such application. McKEEVER v. LOCKE-PADDON CO.

Trial ⟸387(1), 388(2)—After trial to jury in advisory capacity under stipulation, court must make written decision, findings, and conclusions.

Where the parties stipulated that the jury should sit in an advisory capacity, and might return a general verdict, which the court should accept as the basis of its judgment, the verdict of the jury was still advisory only, so that it was error for the court to render judgment thereon without a written decision, findings of fact, and conclusions of law, as required by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 632, 633.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Frank M. McKeever against the Locke-Paddon Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

J. L. Smith, of San Francisco, for appellant.
Reisner & Honey, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KINSELL, Judge pro tem. Action was brought for damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff in connection with a real estate trade through fraudulent representations of the defendant.

The case was tried before a jury upon the express stipulation of counsel that the jury sit in an advisory capacity, and that the issues to be determined need not be specialized, but that the form of the verdict might be general; that the court should accept such verdict, in the event that it had substantial support, as the basis of the court's judgment. The verdict was for the plaintiff, and judgment was entered on the verdict.

Defendant appeals, and specifies a number of alleged errors, among which is the specification that, notwithstanding the fact that the jury acted solely in an advisory capacity, the trial judge failed to file any written decision, findings of fact, conclusions of law, or order adopting the verdict of the jury, as required by the code. If this point be well taken, all other matters in the voluminous record become immaterial.

It would seem that the appellant's contention is correct. The calling of the jury in an advisory capacity made it a trial by the court, and necessitated a written decision by the court (Code Civ. Proc. § 632), as well as findings of fact and conclusions of law (Code Civ. Proc. § 633; Vallejo, etc., R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 147 Pac. 238; Holland v. Kelly, 177 Cal. 43, 169 Pac. 1000).

The case of Johnson v. Mina Rica, etc., Co., 128 Cal. 521, 61 Pac. 76; cited by respondent, is not in point, since in that case it was stipulated "that the jury should try the 'legal issues' tendered by the answer, and that these issues should be determined by a general verdict 'in favor of the plaintiff or in favor of the defendant.'" The stipulation in this case was not to the effect that the jury in giving a general verdict should try or determine the cause. On the contrary, the stipulation expressly provided that the jury should sit in an advisory capacity, and that its verdict might be the basis of the court's judgment. The mere fact that it was agreed that the verdict might be in "general form" does not, as respondent contends, bring this case within the rule of the Johnson Case so as to obviate the necessity of findings.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded to the trial court, with directions to give its decision in writing as provided in section 633, Code of Civil Procedure, and enter judgment accordingly.

COFFMAN v. SINGH. (Civ. 2196.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 20, 1920.)

1. Negligence ⟸117 — Answer held not to plead contributory negligence.

An answer, alleging that the accident and its consequences were due wholly and entirely to the negligence of the plaintiff, and that defendant was not negligent, held not to plead contributory negligence, because such allegations were provable under the specific denials of the answer.

2. Negligence ⟸117 — Plea of contributory negligence held insufficient.

A plea, alleging that plaintiff was injured by his own negligence, and not by any negligence of the defendant, is not a sufficient plea of contributory negligence, since contributory negligence presupposes the negligence of the defendant, which such a plea denies.

3. Appeal and error ⟸197(2)—Failure to plead issue tried in lower court cannot be urged on appeal.

Where an issue not made by the pleadings is without objection made by the evidence, the cause being tried in the court below by both parties on the theory that such issue is properly in the case, an objection for the first time on appeal that no such issue was made by the pleadings will not be of any avail to the objecting party.

4. Negligence ⟸122(1) — Burden of proving contributory negligence is on defendant.

Contributory negligence is a special defense, the support of which by a preponderance of the evidence always rests upon the defendant or the party setting it up, while under the general issue or the mere specific denials of the averments of the complaint all the defendant is required to do is to overcome the effect of the evidence introduced in support of the complaint.

5. Highways ⟸184(3) — Contributory negligence of truck driver, standing near truck in road, held for jury.

In action for injuries to a truck driver, struck by defendant's automobile while standing in road near truck, which he had stopped for purpose of adjusting carbureter, question of contributory negligence held for jury.

6. Highways ⟸183—Automobile driver held contributorily negligent in passing standing truck on narrow road.

Driver of automobile truck on road, which was so narrow that there was scarcely room for two cars to pass each other, and who passed truck standing in the road at the rate of 15 miles an hour without giving the truck driver, who stood near the truck, warning of his approach, and without stopping to consider how he could pass the truck without endangering the life of the truck driver, held contributorily negligent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by J. M. Coffman against Booja Singh. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Brown & Albery, of Colusa, for appellant.
Charles B. Harris and Ralph H. Lewis, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action for personal injuries. The plaintiff was given a verdict, and from the judgment thereupon entered the defendant appeals.

The point for which a reversal of the judgment is demanded is that the proximate cause of the accident by which the plaintiff received the injuries of which he complains was his contributory negligence. In this connection, we may with propriety consider the respondent's contention that the defendant's answer does not set up contributory negligence as a defense to the action, and that the question of the plaintiff's contributory negligence is raised for the first time on this appeal. In reply to the contention, the defendant insists that the answer does sufficiently plead contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and that, in any event, the case having been without objection tried upon the theory that such defense was pleaded and relied upon by the defendant, the respondent will not now for the first time be permitted to urge the objection that the defense of contributory negligence was not properly or at all set up in the answer.

[1, 2] We think the position of the plaintiff upon the proposition is sound. The "further and separate defense" set up in the answer does no more than to charge that the accident and its consequences were due wholly and entirely to the negligence of the plaintiff, it being therein further alleged that the defendant, at the time the collision occurred, was driving his machine in a careful and prudent manner, and that the injuries to plaintiff were not caused by any negligence on his part in the operation of his machine. These allegations could have been proved under the specific denials of the answer, and it is therefore clear that they do not involve or set up the plea of contributory negligence. "A plea alleging that plaintiff was injured by his own negligence, or by his own negligence and not by any negligence of defendant, is not a sufficient plea of contributory negligence. Indeed, it is not a plea of contributory negligence at all, for the law, where contributory negligence exists, presupposes the negligence of defendant, and a plea of this nature denies it." 29 Cyc. and footnote cases; Ramp v. S. R. Co., 133 Mo. App. 700, 114 S. W. 59, 61. But, it seems, the case was tried below upon the hypothesis that the defense of contributory negligence was sufficiently set up by the defendant, or at least an issue in the case. Indeed, the plaintiff himself at the trial appeared to have taken that view of the defendant's pleading, for the court read to the jury, at his request, the following instruction:

"In this case, the defendant has set up the defense of contributory negligence. You are instructed that the burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant, and that he must show by a preponderance of evidence that the plaintiff failed to use such care as a person of common prudence usually exercises under like circumstances."

[3-5] Moreover, evidence was received without objection upon the theory that the element of contributory negligence was in the case. It is well settled that, where an issue, not made by the pleadings, is, without objection, made by the evidence, the cause being tried in the court below by both parties upon the theory that such issue is properly in the case, an objection for the first time on appeal that no such issue was made by the pleadings will not be of any avail to the objecting party. This rule is elementary in California, for which reason cases need not be cited in confirmation of its restatement herein. But the proposition is of little, if any, consequence now, in view of the verdict arrived at and the conclusion we have reached upon the question whether it is supported by the evidence. The defendant was permitted to introduce evidence in support of all of the allegations of his answer, and if he did so upon the theory that he had pleaded contributory negligence, the result merely was that thus he not only conceded his own negligence, but took upon himself a greater burden than his answer required of him, since contributory negligence is a special defense, the support of which by a preponderance of the evidence always rests upon the defendant or the party setting it up, while under the general issue or the mere specific denials of the averments of the complaint all that the defendant is required to do is to overcome the effect of the evidence introduced in support of the complaint, so that the preponderance of the evidence will not be on the side of plaintiff. At all events, the important question presented here is whether there is disclosed by the record sufficient evidential support to the verdict, and the judgment, and upon this proposition we have reached the conclusion, after a careful review thereof, that the evidence is such as that the question whether it afforded justification for the result arrived at below was one for the sole determination of the jury; or, stating the proposition in a different form, we find the evidence as it is presented to us to be such as to preclude this court from holding, as a matter of law, that the verdict does not derive sufficient support therefrom.

The accident resulting in the injuries to plaintiff occurred between the hours of 12 and 1 o'clock p. m., on the 21st day of November, 1918, on a road running between the city of Colusa and the town of Maxwell, in Colusa county, at a point on said road about nine miles from the first-named place. The defendant was at the time of the accident returning to his farm from Colusa, where he had gone to employ an engineer to run a tractor engine. He secured the services of a man by the name of E. W. Clement, who was an automobile driver of considerable experience, and who was operating the machine when the accident happened. A Hindoo by the name of Khan was sitting in the front seat by the side of Clement, and the defendant in the back seat. The plaintiff was driving a motortruck, and was going west, or in the same direction in which the defendant was traveling. The plaintiff, previously to the appearance of the defendant's machine at the point where the accident occurred, had stopped his truck to adjust the carbureter, which had on the way been giving him trouble. At the place where the plaintiff stopped to adjust his carbureter, the road was graded above the surface of the ground from 2 to 4 feet. In the construction of this grade, a pit was left on each side of the road, the same being filled with water. The road was considerably cut up, and thus put in bad condition by the use thereon of heavy trucks with which rice had been hauled from place to place. The north half of the road at the point where the plaintiff stopped his truck was wet and soft, and so seriously cut up that it was regarded as unsafe for a vehicle of any kind, particularly an automobile or a heavy truck, to pass over it. That portion of the road south of the center thereof was in fairly good condition, and it was in that portion of the highway that the plaintiff stopped his truck for the purpose above explained. To adjust his carbureter, the plaintiff removed the portion of the hood on the left-hand side of the engine of the truck, which, as seen, was on the south side of the road, pointing west. The hood of the truck is made up of three pieces, a top piece and one on each of the sides. Plaintiff had placed the piece of the hood which he had removed from the truck on the ground south of the truck and between the truck and the pit on the south side of the road. While the plaintiff was engaged in working on his carbureter, the defendant approached in his automobile, accompanied by the two men above named, traveling towards the west. They kept the machine in which they were riding in the good portion of the road down to the time they approached the spot where the plaintiff was working on his truck, and as they came near the truck they drove to the left-hand, or south, side thereof; that being, as seen, the only good or safe place in the road where they could pass the truck. In thus passing the truck, the defendant's machine struck the plaintiff's right leg, breaking it in such manner as to have seriously and permanently crippled him.

The plaintiff, who was at the time of the accident accompanied by a young man named Tennant, testified that he stopped his truck on the south side of the road, because he could not have pulled over to the north side without getting "stuck," that portion of the road being wet and soft and the soil there of the adobe quality; that the south side had straw on it; and that there was more room on that side for him to work in on his carbureter than there was on the north side.

"Naturally," he continued, "I went down there (south side), as my trouble was on the south side of the car—the carbureter on the left side of the car—and that left me on the south side to work. * * * I was working on the car, and I saw a machine right in behind the truck, and I reached over to pick up the hood to get it out of the way, and I was hit by the machine. * * * The hood was right by the side of me—a little behind me. * * * When I first noticed the machine coming it was 4 or 6 feet in behind the truck. * * * It did just miss the hind end (of the truck) about 6 inches, I guess, and the front end, why I suppose about 2 feet, something like that. * * * I did not hear any warning given. * * * There was none given."

On cross-examination, the plaintiff stated that at the time the machine reached him his body was "right up against the truck," and that he was facing north when he was working on the carbureter. Young Tennant, he said, had just left the seat of the truck, and was standing near the seat when the defendant's machine approached near the truck. Tennant, on seeing the approaching machine, jumped up on the running board of the truck at about the same instant of time that the plaintiff reached for the hood, and this act of Tennant was done as the defendant's machine "just started to come around the hind end of the truck." Further cross-examination of plaintiff:

"Q. How long was the truck? A. Oh, about 20 feet, the whole thing. Q. So that he was something like 20 feet away when you first saw— A. (Int.) Oh, about 24 or 26 feet. That is hardly exactly. Q. Just making an estimate, you are giving an estimate, are you? A. Yes, sir. Q. And what did you first do when you saw the car coming? A. Reached down to get this tin hood, and I got it out of the way and straightened up. Q. You straightened up, and then what happened? A. I was hit. * * * Q. And at the time that this, or that you were hit, which way were you facing? A. Well, I got straightened up—I was practically facing the east, the northeast, or something like that, right at the time of the accident."

E. W. Clement, who was driving the machine of the defendant when the accident occurred, testified that the latter had requested him to operate the automobile, and he thereupon took the place of the driver and started out on the Maxwell road; that, as he approached the place in the road where the plaintiff's truck was standing, he diminished the speed of his machine to 12 miles per hour; that he observed back of the truck "some grass and boards along there where some one had been stuck there, and I gave the machine a little gas so as not to get stuck"; that as he hit and passed the plaintiff he was going at the rate of 15 miles an hour. Clement said that there was on the defendant's machine an electric horn, and in one instance in his examination he stated that he gave no signal warning of his approach as he neared the truck, and in another instance declared that he did not remember whether he did or not.

Ernest Tennant, the young man mentioned above as having been with the plaintiff at the time of the mishap, testified that he was on the ground standing close to the truck, and on the south side thereof when he first observed the defendant's machine, then about 10 or 12 feet from the truck, turning to pass on the side he was standing on; that the defendant's car was then traveling at about the rate of 10 or 12 miles an hour; that, upon seeing said car, he jumped on the running board of the truck; that defendant's car would have struck him had he not jumped on the running board of the truck, as said car was only 2 feet from the truck's running board when it passed the truck. He saw the plaintiff struck and knocked to the ground by defendant's car. The witness said he did not know, but merely thought that the plaintiff stepped away from the truck into the road to pick up the tin hood.

The above statement of the testimony presented by the plaintiff is sufficient to confirm our previous declaration that the case as made by the evidence, was one entirely for decision by the jury, or, in other words, that the evidence is of such a character as to forbid the conclusion, as a matter of law, that the verdict is without enough evidential backing to support it.

In their brief counsel for the defendant claim that the evidence without conflict shows that, even if the defendant was negligent in the manner in which his car passed the truck, the plaintiff, having, so it is asserted, stepped out into the road in front of the car, was thereby himself guilty of negligence without the existence or commission of which the accident and consequent injuries to him would and could not have occurred. But it is only necessary to read the testimony of plaintiff to convince the candid mind that counsel are mistaken in their hypothesis. The plaintiff, as will be noted, plainly testified that he merely stooped down and picked up the hood without moving from his position near the truck—so near that his body was against the truck—and that he had picked up the hood, and himself had straightened up before the defendant's car struck him. There is nothing in that statement or testimony which is inherently wanting in verity, and the jury had the right to believe it to be a correct account of how the accident happened. Indeed, the plaintiff's testimony would seem to be borne out by the obvious proposition that if he had stepped out into the road and in front of the defendant's car, and was in that position when it passed the truck, he would have been struck in other parts of his body, and in all probability have sustained fatal injuries.

[6] That the driver of the defendant's car was very careless in the act of passing the truck seems to be quite manifest. There was, even under ordinary or normal conditions according to the evidence hardly enough room for two cars to pass each other at the point on the road where the accident happened, and, with the plaintiff standing on the ground near his truck on the side thereof on which the defendant's car passed it, it should have occurred to the driver of the defendant's car that the utmost care should be exercised in the attempt to pass the truck. But the driver of said car, in passing the truck, as stated, did not appear to exercise the care which the situation would seem to have suggested to a reasonably prudent person, having regard for the rights and the protection of others, for, in the place of stopping as he approached the truck at the rate of 12 miles an hour, and considering how he could pass the truck without endangering the limbs or perhaps the life of plaintiff, he failed to give the usual warning of his approach as he neared the truck, and gave his car more gas as he neared the hind end of the truck, and thus speeded it up to a rate of 15 miles an hour as he passed the plaintiff. This is, at any rate, what the jury could well and justly have concluded from the evidence, as undoubtedly it did so conclude.

But we may go further and declare that, under the circumstances of this case, the jury would have found support for finding that, if they had been required to find that the plaintiff was in the act of picking up the hood when he was struck, having for that purpose stepped away from his position at or near the truck upon observing the near and sudden and unheralded approach of the defendant's car, he was not legally culpable under the doctrine laid down in Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, section 89, and approved and applied in such cases as Schneider v. Market St. Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 482, 490, 66 Pac. 734, and Stapp v. Madera Canal & Irr. Co., 34 Cal. App. 41, 51, 52, 166 Pac. 823, 827, as follows:

"In cases where a party is suddenly put in a position of peril by the negligent act of another, without sufficient time to consider all the circumstances, he is excusable for omitting some precautions, or making an unwise choice, under this disturbing influence, although if his mind had been clear, he ought to have done otherwise. This is especially true if the peril is caused by the defendant's fault."

We are, however, firmly of the opinion that the jury could justly have found, as we may assume that they did find, that the accident occurred as the plaintiff described it, hence further consideration of the rule last referred to may be waived.

It may be added that the amount awarded the plaintiff as damages does not appear to be out of proportion to the injuries and the damage sustained by him. Several different bones in his right leg were severely fractured, and the physicians testified, as above suggested, that he would suffer permanent handicap by reason thereof.

The judgment is affirmed.

THROOP v. WESTERN INDEMNITY CO.
(Civ. 3338.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 20, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 18, 1920.)

1. Insurance ⊂=455 — Finding insured was killed by negligence of beneficiary shows accidental death.

In an action on an accident insurance policy, a finding that death did not result solely from accidental means must yield to the specific probative finding that it resulted from discharge of gun in hands of beneficiary, because of the gross negligence of beneficiary, which establishes that killing was not intentional, and was therefore accidental, within the policy.

2. Insurance ⊂=455—Involuntary manslaughter of insured by beneficiary does not bar recovery.

Even though death of insured was caused by gross negligence of beneficiary, so that latter was guilty of felony of involuntary manslaughter, under Pen. Code, § 192, that fact does not defeat recovery by beneficiary on accident insurance policy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by Charles B. Throop against the Western Indemnity Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Swanwick & Donnelly and J. W. Swanwick, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On the 17th day of August, 1916, the defendant executed and delivered to Hilda E. Throop two policies of insurance against loss resulting from bodily injuries to her, effected directly and independently of all other causes through accidental means (suicide or any attempt thereat, whether sane or insane, not covered); the beneficiary of said policies in the event of death thereunder being the plaintiff, Charles B. Throop. This action is brought upon those policies to recover the compensation therein named on account of the death of Hilda E. Throop on the 13th day of September, 1916, occurring by reason of bodily injuries sustained in a manner within the terms of said policies. Upon issues properly framed the court found:

That "on September 13, 1916, said Hilda E. Throop was killed in the county of Riverside, state of California, by means of the discharge of a loaded shotgun in the hands of the plaintiff, and actually discharged by the plaintiff herein, but that said Hilda E. Throop did not thereby sustain bodily injuries, or bodily injury, which were effected directly and independently, or directly or independently of all other causes, through accidental means; that the discharge of said gun as aforesaid was occasioned by the gross negligence of said plaintiff, and because and by reason of the fact that said plaintiff failed to use and did not use due or ordinary or any care or caution in handling the same; that said Hilda E. Throop died on the same day, to wit, September 13, 1916; and that her said bodily injuries, or injury, were not caused by suicide or any attempt thereat on her part."

Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom.

Appellant contends that the judgment should be reversed: (1) Because the findings show that the death was caused by accidental means; (2) because the findings are inconsistent and conflicting. The other points relied upon for reversal relate to alleged insufficiency of the evidence, and need not be considered on this appeal, if either of the foregoing stated contentions of appellant is sustained.

[1] The finding that the said Hilda E. Throop "did not thereby sustain bodily injuries, or bodily injury, which were effected directly and independently, or directly or independently of all other causes, through accidental means," considered separately and apart from the remainder of the finding, is sufficient to support the judgment. The real question presented is whether or not the finding as last above quoted is necessarily inconsistent with the probative fact thereinafter stated. That the two propositions cannot both be true is to our minds very clear. The fact found, that the discharge of the gun was occasioned by the gross negligence of the plaintiff, and because and by reason of the fact that the plaintiff failed to use and did not use due or ordinary or any care or caution in handling the same, excludes the possibility of any intentional discharge of the gun, and compels the conclusion that the injuries were effected solely by accidental means. "If the probative facts found were such as to necessarily overcome the finding of the ultimate fact, the latter could not prevail." Estate of Hill, 167 Cal. 59, at page 63, 138 Pac. 690, at page 692.

[2] To meet the contingency that the court might decide as above indicated, respondent contends that under the finding hereinabove quoted the plaintiff was guilty of involuntary manslaughter, in that the discharge of the gun by the plaintiff, even if the same was a lawful act, was the commission of an act which might produce death, "in an unlawful manner, or without due caution and circumspection" (Penal Code, § 192); that this conduct of the plaintiff was subject to punishment by imprisonment in the state prison and constituted a felony; and that a party cannot in any case recover insurance money payable on the death of a party whose life he has feloniously taken. In support of the claim that, under these circumstances, the plaintiff will not be permitted to recover, we are referred to Drown v. New Amsterdam Casualty Co., 175 Cal. 21, 165 Pac. 5, and N. Y. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 6 Sup. Ct. 877, 29 L. Ed. 997. The decision in the Drown Case is not directly in point. The court was considering the sufficiency of the complaint, and held that under the allegations thereof there was no foundation in the complaint for the argument that Amelia C. Drown was guilty of the murder or of the unlawful killing of Archer Cullen Drown.

"There are no allegations in the complaint to the effect that the killing of Archer Cullen Drown was done with that malice, either express or implied, which is necessary to make the act a murder. In order to constitute voluntary manslaughter there must be an intent to kill, though it is not that deliberate and malicious intent which is an essential element in the crime of murder. People v. Freel, 48 Cal. 436, 437. There is no allegation that the killing, though without malice, was done upon the sudden quarrel or heat of passion, which is necessary to reduce an unlawful and intentional killing to manslaughter. It is not averred, either directly or indirectly, that the killing was done in the commission of an unlawful act, or in the commission of a lawful act in an unlawful manner, or without due caution or circumspection. There is, therefore, no basis for the claim that the complaint shows an involuntary manslaughter. It is not alleged that it was unlawful or that it was intentional."

From the language quoted an inference is attempted to be drawn that the court was of the opinion that a recovery could not be had by or for the benefit of Amelia C. Drown, or by an assignee of her claim, if the killing was the result of her unintentional act amounting to involuntary manslaughter. Our reading of the opinion fails to convince us that the court intended to so decide. In the case of Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York v. Armstrong the court was dealing with evidence of facts tending to show an intentional murder of the assured by one beneficially interested in the policy, and the language of the court must be considered in the light of the case thus presented.

The rule which, in our opinion, should prevail in this case, is clearly stated in Schreiner v. High Court of Illinois Catholic Order of Foresters, 35 Ill. App. 576, and was there stated as follows:

"No homicide which is the result of carelessness, or which is not an intentional killing, should bar plaintiff's rights to the money on her certificate. A contract of insurance, or a certificate like the one in suit, impliedly assumes the risk of all carelessness by every person, whether a possible beneficiary under the contract or not, from which the death of the insured may result, unless such acts of carelessness are especially excepted; therefore a death which is unintentional, though caused by some neglect or unlawful act of the beneficiary, is within the contract, and ought not to defeat the policy. But it would be unjust and unreasonable to hold that the intentional taking of the life of insured, by the person who is to receive the insurance on the death, is a risk assumed and insured against by the company or the society which issues the policy or certificate."

Being of the opinion that the judgment herein is based upon a finding which is inconsistent and conflicting on the principal issue upon which the rights of the parties herein are dependent, we conclude that the judgment is not supported by the findings.

For that reason the judgment is reversed.

1. Pleading ⊜8(3)—Complaint held to state cause of action under Redlight Abatement Act without specifically describing acts.

In a proceeding under the Redlight Abatement Act to abate a nuisance, a general allegation that lewdness, prostitution, and assignation were habitually carried on and practiced on the premises or in the building complained of is sufficient, without stating a specific description of the acts constituting lewdness, prostitution, or assignation, without even alleging that the acts complained of consisted of acts which the statute was designed to suppress.

2. Nuisance ⊜84—"Lewdness," "prostitution," and "assignation," used in complaint under Redlight Abatement Act not ambiguous.

The words "lewdness," "prostitution," and "assignation," when used in a complaint under the Redlight Abatement Act, are not ambiguous, but bear a well-understood meaning, and mean precisely what those terms were intended to signify when they were inserted in the statute, viz. illicit sexual acts or conduct amounting to or involving lewdness; and the word "lewdness" has but on meaning in whatsoever connection it may be used, and is more comprehensive than either the word "prostitution" or the word "assignation," and may or may not consist of acts of prostitution and assignation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Lewdness; Second Series, Prostitution.]

3. Nuisance ⊜84—Violation of Redlight Abatement Act proved.

In a proceeding under the Redlight Abatement Act, a finding that the premises complained of were used for the purpose of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution held sustained by the evidence.

4. Nuisance ⊂=84 — Violation of Redlight Abatement Act provable by circumstantial evidence.

A case, founded upon the Redlight Abatement Act, may, like any other case or any other ultimate fact, be established by circumstantial, as well as by direct, evidence.

5. Nuisance ⊂=79 — Violation of Redlight Abatement Act may consist of acts of lewdness.

A nuisance upon which the Redlight Abatement Act places its ban may consist alone of acts of lewdness.

6. Evidence ⊂=317(2) — Nuisance ⊂=84 — Statements of inmate competent to prove violation of Redlight Abatement Act.

Statements made by the "landlady" to a detective offered in a proceeding under the Redlight Abatement Act to abate a nuisance are competent, and not objectionable as hearsay.

7. Appeal and error ⊂=994(1)—Rule as to effect of testimony of interested persons not applicable on appeal.

If to be accepted at all, the rule that the testimony of detectives and police officers or persons having a personal interest in the outcome of the issue before the court must be viewed with caution, and that a judgment should not be predicated alone on a testimony of such witnesses, has no application to reviewing courts.

8. Witnesses ⊂=80 — Parties and interested persons competent.

Under the old common law, a party to an action, or any party directly interested in the event of the trial, was not competent to testify in his own behalf, but such is not now the rule.

9. Evidence ⊂=588—Testimony of police officers and detectives to be measured as testimony of other witnesses.

The testimony of detectives and police officers must be considered, and its evidentiary value measured by the jury or trier of facts by the same common tests that constitute the established and accepted criterion by which the evidentiary value of the testimony of all other witnesses is determined.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Chas. O. Busick, Judge.

Proceeding under the Redlight Abatement Act by the People of the State of California, on the relation of Hugh B. Bradford, District Attorney of Sacramento County, against Vincent Lambert Arcega. From a judgment abating the nuisance, the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 193 Pac. 268.

Wm. A. Gett, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Hugh B. Bradford, of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. The action is prosecuted under what is known as the "Redlight Abatement Act" (St. 1913, p. 20). The complaint alleges that the premises and building known as "No. 222 L Street," in the city of Sacramento, and described as the "east one-half of lot No. 3, in the block or square bounded by and between L and M and Second and Third streets of said city of Sacramento," were, and for some time prior to the 3d day of January, 1918, "and ever since that date, and now are, used for the purposes of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution, and upon said premises acts of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution were held and did occur, and said premises were and now are a nuisance under the laws of the state of California." It is further alleged that the appellant, Arcega, is the owner of said property and premises, and that the respondents, George W. Locke & Son, a corporation, and certain fictitiously named parties, "have and claim some interest in and lien upon said real property, and that the respondents, George W. Locke & Son, Jane Coe, and Susan Hoe et al. (fictitiously designated), are the owners of the furniture, fixtures, musical instruments, and other movable property situated in said building, as the relator is informed and believes, and so alleges." The prayer is for a decree perpetually enjoining said alleged nuisance, for the removal from said premises of the furniture, fixtures, etc., and the sale thereof in the manner provided by the Abatement Act and the closing of the premises and the building and the interdiction of their use for any purpose for the period of one year. The findings were in accordance with the averments of the complaint, and the decree follows the prayer of the complaint. The appeal is by Arcega from the judgment.

[1] The court below overruled a demurrer interposed by the appellant to the complaint and denied a motion, likewise interposed to strike out certain specified portions of that pleading. Both the demurrer and said motion raised the question whether the complaint stated a cause of action under the terms of the Abatement Act against the respondents in the court below. The specific point thus made is that the mere statement in the complaint that the premises in question were and had been used for the purposes of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution involves a legal conclusion, and that it is therefore deficient in the setting forth of a cause of action for the relief demanded, the position of the appellant being that, to state a case under the Abatement Act, the complaint must contain a specific description of the acts constituting all or any one of the alleged general acts of lewdness and prostitution and assignation. This precise point has been repeatedly decided adversely to the position taken by the appellant. See People v. Laine, 182 Pac. 986; House v. Meyer, 100 Cal. 592, 35 Pac. 308; Talbot v. Ginocchio, 18 Cal. App. 391, 123 Pac. 223; Ellis v. Central Traction Co., 37 Cal. App. 390, 395, 174 Pac. 407; Doolittle v. McConnell, 178 Cal. 697, 705, 174 Pac. 305.

In the Laine Case, which was an action under the Abatement Act, we expressly held that a general allegation that lewdness, prostitution, and assignation were habitually carried on and practiced on the premises or in the building complained of was sufficient. And it may here be added that the present case is no different, so far as the complaint is concerned, from the following cases arising under the Abatement Act: People v. Barbiere, 33 Cal. App. 770, 166 Pac. 812; People v. Dillman, 37 Cal. App. 415, 174 Pac. 951; In re Selowsky, 38 Cal. App. 569, 177 Pac. 301; Chown v. Alexandre, 35 Cal. App. 194, 169 Pac. 454.

In House v. Meyer, supra, an action for damages resulting from the alleged negligence of the defendant, the complaint charged the negligence in general language, and the complaint on appeal was that a general allegation of negligence was insufficient to state such a cause of action. The court held that such an allegation was all that was required to state a cause of action for the recovery of damages for injury produced by the defendant, and, quoting Bliss on Code Pleading, § 211, said: "The negligence is the ultimate fact to be pleaded, and is not a legal conclusion."

So, in the present case, the ultimate fact alleged is that the premises involved herein were, at the times mentioned in the complaint, used for the purposes either of lewdness or prostitution or assignation, or for all those purposes.

[2] The argument that the words "lewdness," "prostitution" and "assignation" may be used in different connections or in different senses, according to the connection in which they are employed, and are therefore ambiguous and indefinite as to their meaning or signification when used in a complaint prepared under the Abatement Act, without specifically showing or alleging that they consisted of acts which the statute was designed to suppress, is substantially answered by what is above said, to which, however, may be added the suggestion that, as used in the Abatement Act, those terms bear a well-defined and well-understood meaning, and that a complaint charging in the general language of the act the nuisance at the suppression of which said act is directly aimed must of necessity be considered and construed, and may readily be understood to mean precisely what those terms were obviously intended to signify when they were inserted in the statute, viz. illicit sexual acts or conduct amounting to or involving lewdness. The latter word, it may be further added, has but one meaning in whatsoever connection it may be used, and it is more comprehensive than either the word "prostitution" or the word "assignation," and may or may not include acts of prostitution and assignation.

[3] The next point urged for a reversal is that the findings are not supported by the evidence. An examination of the evidence has readily convinced us that the point is not well taken. A brief reference to the testimony will confirm this conclusion.

It appears from the evidence that a party (a female) employed as a detective by the State Law Enforcement League, early in the evening of January 3, 1918, called at the house complained of here and asked to see the "landlady." The witness was shown to the room of the "landlady," the latter then lying on a bed with a man having no clothing but his undergarments upon him, and the woman being clothed only with a kimono, which was "pulled up to her knees." The man was of large frame, and appeared to the witness to be either a Greek or an Italian. The witness then proceeded:

"The landlady asked me what my name was and who sent me. I told her my name was Maud Morris, and that a lady had sent me over from 216½ L street. I asked her if I could get work there. She said no, at the present time she didn't need a girl, but she would take my name and address and would let me know. I said: 'You think you will have an opening very soon?' 'Well,' she said, 'I don't know.' The man on the bed said: 'Put that girl to work to-morrow.' So she said—the landlady said—'One of my girls will be sick to-morrow, and she will be off for a few days, so you can come to work at 1 o'clock.' I asked her if the girls lived at this place and she said yes, they did, and for me to bring my things. She asked me where I lived, and I told her, Hotel Trow. I asked her what price house it was. She said, '$1.50.' I asked her out of that what did I have to give to the landlady, and she said 50 cents each per act of prostitution. I asked her how much the girls got for a man staying all night. She says, 'Ten dollars, or all you can get,' or, 'as much as you can get. Give me two dollars out of every ten—or,' she said, 'I get two dollars out of every ten.' I told her I would be back at 1 o'clock the next day. As I was going out I saw another girl in the hall, rouged and powdered up. Q. How many girls did you see in the place? A. Three girls, not including the landlady. Q. Three girls and the landlady? A. Yes."

The witness further testified that the female who responded to the door alarm and admitted her (witness) into the house was heavily "rouged and powdered," and at the time wore a kimono or loose wrapper.

A police officer, connected as such with the police department of the city of Sacramento for many years, testified that the general reputation of the house in question was, at the time of the filing of the complaint, and had been for many years prior thereto, that it was a place where sexual prostitution was habitually carried on.

[4, 5] That the above testimony abundantly supports the findings there can be no manner of doubt. It is true that it is in its nature circumstantial, but the circumstances thus adduced before the trial court, it must be admitted, are of singular potency in probative force as in proof that the nuisance as charged in the complaint existed and was maintained in the building as described in the complaint. Of course, it will not be denied that a case founded upon the Abatement Act may, like any other case or any other ultimate fact, be established by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence. Even if prostitution or assignation was not thus sufficiently shown to have been practiced in the place, it is clear that lewdness was so shown, and obviously the nuisance upon which the statute places its ban may consist alone of acts of lewdness.

[6] It is lastly contended that the testimony of the statements made by the "landlady" of the house to the female detective was hearsay, and therefore incompetent. The contention is meritless. In proving the nuisance denounced by the Abatement Act it is proper to show the acts, conduct, and words or language of the inmates of the place or building against which, as being conducted as such a nuisance, the action is instituted. As has often been declared in the cases, a building may become a nuisance under the act in question by being used for the purpose either of lewdness or of assignation or of prostitution, or by being used for the purposes of all those general acts. The testimony of the female detective as to the conversations of the "landlady" and the manner in which she and other female inmates of the house were attired not only strongly tended to show that prostitution was habitually practiced therein, but quite clearly established the fact that acts or conduct amounting to lewdness within the purview of the statute were indulged in in said place.

[7-9] The rule cited by counsel and as declared by some of the cases and text-writers, to the effect that the testimony of detectives and police officers or persons having a personal interest in the outcome of the issue before the court must be viewed with caution, and that a judgment should not be predicated alone on the testimony of such witnesses, has no application to reviewing courts, if, indeed, the rule is to be accepted under any circumstances under our present system of trials. Under the old common law, a party to an action or any party directly interested in the event of the trial, was not competent to testify in the action in his own behalf. Such is not the rule under our system, however. The rules of evidence in this state are to be found in our Code of Civil Procedure, and while they are based generally on the common-law rules, they, save perhaps in a very few instances, measure and limit the power of our courts upon the question of the admissibility or nonadmissibility and of the weight of testimony. We can conceive of no theory or sound reason upon which it may be declared as an abstract proposition that the testimony of a detective or a police officer or a person directly interested in the outcome of a trial of an action in the courts should be given less weight than that which may be given to the testimony of any other witness. There is, in other words, no reason why the weight of the testimony of such witnesses or the question of their credibility should be prejudged by the trial court, or the jury told by the trial court that their testimony should be viewed with caution or considered in a light different from that in which the testimony of any other witness must be considered; and there is nowhere in our Codes any such rule laid down. The testimony of such witnesses must therefore be considered and its evidentiary value measured by the jury or other trier of facts by the same common tests as constitute the established and accepted criterion by which the evidentiary value of the testimony of all other witnesses is, and, indeed, can only be, determined. At all events, as before declared, the rule sought to be invoked by counsel, if at all sound as a rule to be put in actual practice, has application solely to the trial of cases at nisi prius, and not to the review of cases on appeal.

Counsel, however, strangely suggest the novel and rather remarkable proposition that the testimony of police officers and detectives should be regarded as analogous to the testimony of accomplices in criminal cases. The proposition is obviously absurd. There is no analogy between the two classes of witnesses referred to. The rule as to accomplices in crime is founded upon a rational theory, and is a wise and just rule, the theory being that where an accomplice testifies against one with whom he was jointly engaged in the commission of a public crime the temptation to commit perjury may be great, since there is always hope in the breast of the accomplice so testifying, even though not justified by any express promise by the representatives of the people that he will be rewarded for his testimony by leniency in the matter of punishment in a degree commensurate with the strength or value of his testimony in favor of the people and against his companion in the crime charged, and thus he may be led to bear false witness against his confederate in crime. As above declared in a different form of language, this case does not present an instance to which the rule as to the testimony of accomplices in crime applies.

No legal or other reason has been shown for a disturbance of the judgment appealed from, and it is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. BRADFORD, Dist. Atty., v. ARCEGA. (Civ. 1988.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐907(3)—Nuisance ⇐77—Proceeding under Redlight Abatement Act, civil action, and all presumptions are indulged in support of judgment.

A proceeding to abate a nuisance under the Redlight Abatement Act is a civil case, and, in considering an appeal on the judgment roll alone, all presumptions and intendments will be indulged in support of the judgment; and it will be presumed that the evidence supported the findings, and injury is no longer presumed from error, but must be affirmatively made to appear, under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

2. Nuisance ⇐84—Finding sufficient for judgment under Redlight Abatement Act.

In a proceeding under the Redlight Abatement Act, a finding or conclusion that the building complained of "was and now is a nuisance under the laws of the state," immediately following and connected with a direct finding of illegal use down to a specified date, prior to the filing of the complaint, is a finding of an ultimate fact, and defendant cannot say that court failed to find that the alleged nuisance existed at the time of the commencement of the action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. O. Busick, Judge.

Proceeding under the Redlight Abatement Act by the People of the State of California, on the relation of Hugh B. Bradford, District Attorney of Sacramento County, against Vincent Lambert Arcega. From a judgment abating the nuisance, the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 193 Pac. 264.

Wm. A. Gett, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Hugh B. Bradford, of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. The appeal is from the judgment on the judgment roll alone. The object of the action is to abate a nuisance alleged to have existed and been maintained in and on certain premises described as the west one-half of the east one-half of lot No. 3, in the block, between Second and Third and L and M streets, in the city of Sacramento, "and particularly the building known as No. 220 L street."

The complaint alleges that the appellant, Arcega, was at all the times referred to in the complaint, and is, the owner of said premises and building; that certain fictitiously named females have and claim some interest in and upon said real property, and are the owners of the furniture, fixtures, musical instruments, and other movable property situated in said building, "as relator is informed, believes, and alleges"; that "on or for some time prior to the 13th day of September, 1917, and ever since that date, said premises were and now are used for the purposes of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution, and upon said premises acts of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution were held and did occur, and said premises were and now are a nuisance under the laws of the state of California."

The relief asked for is that the alleged nuisance be perpetually enjoined, that the furniture, etc., be removed from said premises and building and be sold as provided by law, and that the premises and building be closed against their use for any purpose for a period of one year.

The court, among other things, found:

"That on and for some time prior to the 13th day of September, 1917, the building and property herein described was, during all of said time, used for the purposes of lewdness, assignation and prostitution, and the said building was and now is a nuisance under the laws of the state of California."

It will readily be observed that the action is founded on the "Redlight Abatement" Act (St. 1913, p. 20).

There are two points advanced by the appellant for a reversal, viz.: (1) That the complaint does not state a cause of action under the abatement act, and is ambiguous and uncertain in certain specified particulars; (2) that the court failed to find upon the question whether the alleged nuisance existed at the time of the commencement of the action, and that such failure renders the decree abortive.

1. As to the proposition first above stated, the appellant makes the identical points which are made against the complaint in action No. 2148, 193 Pac. 264, wherein we this day filed an opinion holding that the assault upon that pleading possessed no legal force. The complaint in the present action being, mutatis mutandis, precisely the same as the complaint in said action No. 2148, it is only necessary to refer to the opinion in the latter case as a justification for the conclusion that the complaint herein assailed is not obnoxious to the objections raised against it by the appellant's demurrer thereto and his motion to strike out certain of the allegations thereof.

2. The contention of the appellant with regard to the second point is that, while the court directly finds that the building complained of herein was, on and for some time prior to the 13th day of September, 1917, "used for the purposes of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution," there is no finding that the same was used for like purposes down to the time of the filing of the complaint, which was September 28, 1917, since, so the contention proceeds, the language immediately following that finding, to wit, "and the said building was and now is a nuisance under the laws of the state of California," is the only reference in the findings to the fact, if it was a fact, of the continuance of the nuisance to the time of the filing of the complaint, and involves a conclusion of law, and not a finding of fact. In support of that contention, appellant cites a number of cases, among which is the recent case of People v. Goddard, 191 Pac. 1012. In that case, the complaint in which was filed on the 28th day of September, 1917, the trial court, after finding that on and prior to the 13th day of September, 1917, the buiding there complained of was used for the purposes of prostitution, lewdness, and assignation, and that "the said upper story of said building was and now is a nuisance under the laws of the state of California," further found that, before the filing of the complaint in said action the owner of the building caused the female inmates thereof to be evicted therefrom, and closed said building to said females, and that "at the time of the filing of said complaint there was no tenant or other person whatever occupying said premises," but also found that "the removal of the tenant from said premises was not made in good faith by said respondent for the purpose of abating said nuisance." We reversed the judgment upon the ground that it was not supported by the findings, holding also that there was no evidence to support the finding that the removal of the female inmates of the building by the owner, as found by the court, was not made in good faith or for the purpose of abating the nuisance. We further held that, if the finding that "the building was and now is a nuisance under the laws of the state of California" was to be treated and accepted as a finding of fact, said finding was in irreconcilable conflict with the finding that the female inmates of the building had been by the owner thereof, prior to the filing of the complaint in the action, removed therefrom, and that no persons whatsoever were then occupying the building. Among other things, we said in the opinion in that case:

"It is very clear that the finding that 'the said upper story of said building was and now is a nuisance under the laws of the state of California,' taken alone or by itself, is a conclusion of law, and does not involve a finding of fact; but, if it were deemed necessary to concede that, in the connection in which it is employed, it might justly be held to constitute a finding of an ultimate fact, it is nevertheless plainly manifest that it is wholly inconsistent with finding No. 5"

—which found that the women had been removed from the building. Thus far there is nothing in the opinion in the Goddard Case from which it is to be inferred that it is therein held, or that there was any intention of holding, that the finding referred to, although, taken by itself, a conclusion of law, may not be used in such a connection as that it may properly be treated and considered as a finding of an ultimate fact. But, further on in the opinion, we also declared:

"But we are still of the opinion that the alleged finding that the building 'now is a nuisance' is a conclusion of law, notwithstanding the connection in which it is used."

It is this language of the opinion upon which counsel for the appellant lay special emphasis as supporting their position that such a finding or conclusion can under no circumstances be treated as a finding of fact. But it will be noted, on a careful reading of that language of the opinion, that we do not thereby say that such a conclusion may not, under some conceivable conditions, be considered as a finding of an ultimate fact. We were merely pointing out that the purported finding that the building "'is now a nuisance," etc., added nothing to and was in no manner aided by the initial portion of the finding of which it was a part to the effect that—

"On, and for a long time prior to the 13th day of September, 1917, the upper story of said building was used for the purposes of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution," etc.

Moreover, we showed in the opinion that there was no evidence in the record showing, or tending to show, that the nuisance denounced by the Abatement Act existed after the 13th day of September, 1917, other than any inference that might reasonably be afforded by the evidence that such a nuisance had been therein maintained prior and down to that date.

In the present case, the complaint alleges, as we have above shown, that the building in question was, "on or some time prior to the 13th day of September, 1917, and ever since that date, said premises were and now are used," etc.

[1, 2] This is a civil case, and the rule as to this case is therefore the same as that which applies to other civil actions, namely, that, in considering an appeal on the judgment roll alone, all presumptions and intendments will be indulged in support of the judgment; that the evidence supported the findings; that injury is no longer presumed from error, but must be affirmatively made to appear. Myers v. Canepa, 37 Cal. App. 556, 174 Pac. 903, 906; Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Bennett, 177 Cal. 560, 171 Pac. 304; section 4½, art. 6, Const. In support of the judgment, it must be presumed, therefore, that there was evidence showing that the nuisance complained of remained unabated down to and at the time of the filing of the complaint. In other words, we must view the record upon this appeal as though it contained such evidence, and view and construe the findings in the light of that evidence; and, thus viewing the record, it is clear that the conclusion we are considering and the decree were justified by the evidence, and therefore the finding or conclusion that the building complained of "was and now is a nuisance under the laws of the state of California" may properly and should be considered as involving a finding of an ultimate fact. We should have so held in the Goddard Case had the evidence disclosed, as presumptively it does in this case, that the nuisance was maintained and existed down to the filing of the complaint, particularly in view of the fact that the finding or conclusion referred to in the Goddard Case, as it does in the present case, immediately followed and was connected with a direct finding that the building was used for the immoral purposes, prohibited by the Abatement Act down to a certain specified date prior to the filing of the complaint. Such a holding in that case, though, would not have affected the result arrived at therein, since such a finding, as we pointed out in the opinion, would have been inconsistent with the finding that the nuisance had been abated by the owner prior to the filing of the complaint. As to the present case, we may add that, since we must presume that the evidence was amply sufficient to support the conclusion in question and to warrant the decree, no injury could or can result to the appellant from the ultimate conclusion arrived at in the court below as crystallized in the decree.

It is not to be understood that we approve the form of the finding under consideration. As in all other civil cases, there should be a direct finding upon every fact vital to the judgment, and legal conclusions in the findings, where direct findings can be made, should be avoided, although it is often true that certain findings essential to the support of a judgment may, in a sense, involve conclusions of law. This is frequently justifiably the case in pleadings. Ellis v. Central Cal. Traction Co., 37 Cal. App. 390, 395, 174 Pac. 407; People v. Laine, 182 Pac. 986. However, the conclusion herein is that the court made a sufficient finding upon the fact of the continuance of the nuisance down to the date of the filing of the complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

DE SOTO et ux. v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. (Civ. 3349.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 14, 1920.)

1. Railroads ⊂=401(4)—Instruction held erroneous as authorizing recovery without negligence alleged being contributing cause.

In an action for injuries to an occupant of an automobile which overturned when the wheels entered a gutter along defendant's railroad track, instructions that if plaintiff was riding as a guest without any control over the driver, and was injured by the negligence of the defendant alone, or from the negligence of the driver, then the plaintiff could recover unless guilty of contributory negligence, were erroneous in leading the jury to believe that plaintiff could recover if the driver was negligent even though defendant's negligence may not have contributed to produce the injury.

2. Trial ⊂=243 — Contradictory instructions cause for reversal.

In action for injuries to occupant of automobile overturning when striking gutter along street car tracks, instructions combining correct rules of law with erroneous ones are contradictory and cause for reversal.

3. Trial ⊂=194(17)—Instruction in action for personal injuries held on weight of evidence.

In action for injuries to occupant of automobile in which it was claimed that negligence of automobile driver was imputable to occupant, instruction that "the case, however, is different between this plaintiff and the defendant from what it would be if it were a case between the driver of the automobile and the defendant, because she was not the one responsible for managing and driving the automobile," held on weight of evidence as to issue of whether occupant was responsible for the acts of the automobile driver.

4. Appeal and error ⊂=1064(2)—Instruction on weight of evidence held harmless in view of undisputed facts.

In action for injuries to occupant of automobile, instruction in which court invaded jury's province by stating that occupant was not responsible for managing and driving the automobile held harmless in view of undisputed facts showing that occupant was not responsible.

5. Negligence ⊂93(1) — Automobile driver's negligence not imputable to guest.

Where an automobile owner on the request of his sister-in-law conveyed her, as a matter of friendly accommodation, to a store, but she exercised no control over him other than to indicate the place to which she desired to go, his negligence was not imputable to her.

6. Trial ⊂252(9) — Refusal of instructions held proper in view of lack of evidence as to facts assumed.

In action for injuries to occupant of automobile, refusal of instruction assuming that occupant continued to ride in automobile without protest while it was being driven at a reckless rate of speed held properly refused in view of lack of evidence that driver had been traveling at a reckless rate of speed prior to accident and that occupant had time and opportunity to protest or get out of the automobile.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Chris De Soto and wife against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and E. E. Morris, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George P. Cary and Frank C. Dunham, both of Pasadena, for respondents.

JAMES, J. In this action for damages, alleged to have been caused through the negligence of the defendant, plaintiffs had judgment. Defendant appeals, assigning as prejudicial errors committed by the trial judge the giving of certain instructions to the jury as to the law and the refusal to give certain offered instructions on the part of the defendant.

Marie De Soto suffered the injuries complained of, the second party plaintiff being her husband and being joined only because of his relationship to her. For convenience we will refer to Marie De Soto as though she were the sole plaintiff. The negligence complained of consisted in leaving unattended and without repair a ragged gutter or depression on the outside of a railroad track. This track curved at the point mentioned, and the gutter or depression was for a number of yards along the outside of the outermost rail on said curve. Plaintiff was being conveyed in an automobile along the street upon which defendant's tracks were so laid and said depression existed. The wheels of the automobile entered the gutter along the rail and in some manner were so held there that the automobile was overturned and plaintiff suffered injuries. That these injuries were of a serious character, no question is made by the evidence. No question was made at the trial as to the fact that the defendant, by allowing the gutter to exist beside its tracks, was guilty of negligence. There were two questions which the jury had to resolve in order to reach a conclusion favorable to the plaintiff's claim: (1) Whether the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries. (2) Whether the plaintiff was herself guilty of such negligence as contributed proximately to produce her injuries. These further facts may be stated: That plaintiff on the night of the accident was riding in an automobile belonging to her brother-in-law whom she had requested to convey her, as a matter of friendly accommodation, to a nearby store. She exercised no control over the driver of the machine other than to indicate the place to which she desired to be transported. Under these conditions the journey was made to the store, and it was upon the return therefrom that the accident happened. There was no testimony indicating that the brother-in-law was an incompetent driver, or that prior to the time of the accident he had been driving at an unusual or dangerous rate of speed. There was the testimony of one witness who observed the marks made by the wheels of the automobile upon the ground and about the tracks at the point where it was overturned, and this testimony is made the basis for the argument that at the time of the accident the machine in which the plaintiff was riding must have been traveling at a high rate of speed. We will advert to that matter at a later point in the opinion. It may be added further that the defendant by its answer did allege in proper terms that the relationship between the plaintiff and the brother-in-law was such as to make her responsible for the negligent act of the driver; that is, that the driver was the agent of the plaintiff, and that if he were not her agent he was negligent in his handling of the machine, and that she, knowing of this negligence, continued to ride with him.

It is first insisted that the instructions given by the court were of a contradictory nature, so much so as to have been confusing and unintelligible to the jury. The instructions were contradictory, some of them correctly stating the law and others not. For instance, we find that the court instructed the jury as follows:

"If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff was riding as a guest in the automobile at the time of the accident, neither exercising nor assuming any control over it, or the person driving it, and if you further find from all the evidence in the case the plaintiff was injured by the negligence of the defendant alone, or from the negligence of the driver of the automobile in which she was riding, then your verdict must be for the plaintiff, unless you find the plaintiiff herself was guilty of contributory negligence."

[1] The error in this instruction consists in the advice to the jury, reasonably deduced from the language used by the court, that, if the plaintiff's injuries were caused by the negligence of the driver of the automobile, she could recover, notwithstanding that the negligence of the defendant may not have contributed to produce the damaging result.

[2] In an instruction immediately following, the court did conclude with the advice that, if the accident was caused solely by the negligence of the driver of the automobile, the defendant would not be liable; but the vice of this instruction consists in its being coupled with the introductory phrase that "in case you should determine that she had any control whatever of the machine." Plainly, if the negligent act of the driver was the sole cause of the accident, defendant would not be liable, regardless of whether the plaintiff had any control of the machine. As we have already stated, while the court in some of the instructions correctly informed the jury of the law applicable to the case, the particular instruction first referred to contained statements diametrically at variance with those propositions which were correctly stated, and it cannot here be told as to which had preponderating weight in the minds of the jurymen.

[3-5] It is claimed further that the court invaded the province of the jury in instructing directly as to a material fact in dispute when it gave this instruction:

"The case, however, is different between this plaintiff and the defendant from what it would be if it were a case between the driver of the automobile and the defendant, because she was not the one responsible for managing and driving the automobile."

This instruction, as insisted by the appellant, contains the direct advice that the plaintiff was not responsible for the acts of the driver, and this after the court had already assumed by other instructions given that that particular matter was in issue and one which the jury had to decide. This instruction may be relieved from its vice only by such a construction of the evidence as may warrant the assertion that, under the relationship shown to exist between the plaintiff and the driver of the automobile and her acts and conduct therewith connected, the facts were undisputed and a conclusion irresistibly indicated that no responsibility was fixed upon the appellant for any act of negligence committed by the driver, and we think that the evidence fairly shows those necessary conditions to have existed.

[6] Under the head of errors of the court in refusing to give instructions offered by the defendant, we are referred to certain instructions which deal with the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, assuming that she continued to ride in the automobile without protest while it was being driven at a high and reckless rate of speed. We have particularly called attention to the evidence offered by the defendant referring to that matter. The driver of the automobile had testified that he was traveling at a moderate rate of speed; the plaintiff had testified that the machine was traveling at an "ordinary" rate of speed. The witness for the defendant, judging from the marks on the street made by the wheels of the automobile at the time of the accident, indicated that the machine was traveling very fast at the time it was caught in the gutter. In order to make pertinent the offered instructions there should have been some evidence (and there was none) showing that prior to the time the wheels of the machine were caught in the gutter the driver had been traveling at a reckless rate of speed and that the plaintiff had time and opportunity to protest or get out of the vehicle. The offered instructions, therefore, were without proper evidence upon which to predicate them, and the court's refusal to so advise the jury was not error.

For the reasons first given, the judgment is reversed.

DANFORD v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 3560.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 16, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 15, 1920.)

1. Attorney and client ⟸56—Judgment in disbarment need not state grounds.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 299, which prescribes the form of judgment in disbarment proceedings, the judgment need not contain a statement of the grounds of disbarment.

2. Attorney and client ⟸36(1) — Superior court has jurisdiction to disbar.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 287, the superior court has jurisdiction to enter an order of disbarment.

3. Attorney and client ⟸36(1)—Statute giving superior court jurisdiction to disbar, constitutional.

The power to disbar an attorney is purely statutory, and Code Civ. Proc. § 287, giving the superior court jurisdiction to do so, is not subject to any constitutiona objection.

4. Attorney and client ⟸61—Superior court cannot consider application for reinstatement of disbarred attorney.

An application for reinstatement of an attorney disbarred by a judgment of the superior court, made after the order of disbarment has become final, must be treated as an application for admission to practice and not as an application to vacate the order of disbarment, and as such it must be addressed to the court having jurisdiction to admit an attorney to practice, and cannot be addressed to the superior court.

5. Attorney and client ⟸3 — Superior court without jurisdiction to admit attorney to practice.

Since the amendment in 1895 of Code Civ. Proc. § 276, the superior court is without jurisdiction to admit an attorney to practice in any court of the state, and hence cannot entertain an application for restoration after disbarment by it.

6. Contempt ⟸34—Superior court has jurisdiction to entertain contempt proceedings against attorney.

Where an attorney was disbarred, and, after the order had become final, a judge of the superior court had attempted to reinstate him, another judge of the superior court had power to entertain contempt proceedings against such attorney, who was holding himself out as qualified to practice.

Application by William J. Danford for writ of prohibition prayed to be directed to the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, and Honorable George E. Crothers, Judge thereof, to restrain action in a proceeding for contempt of court. Writ denied.

W. J. Danford, of San Francisco, in pro. per.

Douglas Brookman and W. M. Simmons, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Petitioner seeks a writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court from entertaining proceedings instituted against petitioner charging him with contempt of court. The affidavit upon which the contempt proceedings are based alleges that on March 1, 1909, petitioner, who theretofore had been an attorney licensed to practice law, was disbarred from practice in all courts of the state by an order of the superior court in Los Angeles county in accord with proceedings duly instituted for that purpose. About 3½ years thereafter the judge who had made the order of disbarment, acting upon his own motion, ordered the petitioner reinstated to the practice of the law in the superior court and recommended full reinstatement to practice in all courts of the state by the District Court of Appeal. In accord with this order, petitioner took the oath to support the Constitution of the United States and of this state, and to faithfully discharge the duties of attorney and counselor at law. On March 24, 1913, another judge sitting in the superior court in Los Angeles county set aside the order of reinstatement on motion of an attorney representing the Bar Association of Los Angeles county upon the grounds, as recited in the later order:

"That said order was made without notice to the accuser in said disbarment proceedings or any of the attorneys who prosecuted said proceedings, that said order was inadvertently and improvidently made; that at the time of the making of said order said Danford had been convicted in said superior court of a felony and had been sentenced to a term in the penitentiary of three years, and which sentence at the time of making said order had not expired, and that said court had no jurisdiction or power to reinstate or admit said Danford as an attorney at law to said superior or any other court in the state of California."

The affidavit then alleges that "at the present time, and for a considerable period of time, * * * said Wm. J. Danford has advertised and held himself out as practicing and entitled to practice law in the courts of this state;" that he maintains an office for that purpose in the city and county of San Francisco; that, on September 5, 1919, he filed an appearance in a certain action then pending in the superior court in San Francisco; that, thereafter, and until the 5th day of March, 1920, he frequently appeared in said superior court as attorney for the defendant in said action. The orders of the superior court in Los Angeles county which are made the basis of the claim that petitioner was not entitled to practice in the superior court in San Francisco are incorporated in the accusatory affidavit.

In his application for a writ of prohibition petitioner assigns numerous grounds upon which it is claimed that respondent is without jurisdiction to entertain the contempt proceedings. It is not necessary to discuss all the grounds urged because if it appears from the accusatory affidavit that petitioner was legally disbarred from practice and has not been restored by a court of competent jurisdiction, the respondent is not exceeding its jurisdiction.

[1-3] Petitioner attacks the original order of disbarment because it fails to show the grounds upon which he was disbarred, in that it recites merely that he "has violated the oath taken by him upon his admission as an attorney and counselor and that he has violated his duties as such attorney and counselor." But section 299, Code of Civil Procedure, which prescribes the form of judgment in disbarment proceedings, does not require a statement of the grounds of disbarment. These proceedings are peculiar to themselves and are governed by the statutes relating to them. It was so held by the Supreme Court in Matter of Danford, 157 Cal. 425, 430, 108 Pac. 322, in affirming the judgment of disbarment here under attack. It is also argued that the superior court was without jurisdiction to make the order, but such jurisdiction is specially conferred upon the superior court by section 287, Code of Civil Procedure. This power is purely statutory and is not subject to any constitutional objection.

[4] Assuming the power to disbar, the order of disbarment became final upon its affirmance by the supreme court. Thereafter no court had power to modify or set aside the order either upon motion or otherwise. An application for reinstatement of an attorney disbarred by a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, made after the order of disbarment has become final, must be treated as an application for admission to practice and not as an application to vacate the order of disbarment. As such it must be addressed to the court having jurisdiction to admit an attorney to practice. In re Mash, 179 Pac. 898.

[5] Since the amendment to section 276, Code of Civil Procedure, in 1895, the superior court is without jurisdiction to admit an attorney to practice in any court of the state. That power, at the time the order purporting to reinstate the petitioner was made, was, and now is, conferred exclusively upon the District Courts of Appeal. Hence the superior court in Los Angeles, being without jurisdiction to admit petitioner to practice, could not entertain an application for restoration after disbarment. That the court acted upon the assumption that it had such power is apparent from the order, which reads:

"That the above-named Wm. J. Danford is hereby reinstated and hereby admitted to the bar of the superior court."

In the case of In re Wharton, 130 Cal. 486, 62 Pac. 741, there is language intimating that where the disbarment took place in the superior court the motion for reinstatement should be made in that court, but the error of the ruling in that case is that the court treated the motion for reinstatement as a motion to modify the judgment of disbarment rather than a motion for admission to the bar. In view of the decision of the Supreme Court in Re Mash, supra, the Wharton Case is not controlling. Treating the motion for reinstatement as a motion for admission to the bar, as it must be treated, it necessarily follows that such motion must be addressed to a court which has jurisdiction to admit to the bar. As the superior court had no power to admit petitioner to practice in any court, there can be no doubt that the order in question is void on its face for want of jurisdiction in the court.

[6] Such being the case, the respondent is not exceeding its jurisdiction in entertaining the contempt proceedings, and the application for prohibition should be denied.

So ordered.

PEOPLE v. ZENTGRAF. (Cr. 522.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 20, 1920.)

1. Criminal law ⟸683(3)—Evidence of proceedings on arraignment admissible to rebut defense of insanity.

In a prosecution for burglary, defended on the ground of insanity, evidence that defendant had pleaded guilty with the expectation that he would be granted probation, but, it being refused, withdrew the plea by consent of court, and entered plea of not guilty, was admissible to rebut the defense of insanity.

2. Witnesses ⟸277(4)—Testimony of defendant, on cross-examination, that he had left bank because short in his collections, admissible on question of sanity.

In prosecution for burglary, defended on the ground of insanity, though defendant had not been interrogated specifically about his previous employment at a bank, his direct examination having taken a wide range to show his mental condition, it opened the door to inquiry as to other circumstances included within the same period, as the fact that he had left the bank, and that he had been discovered short in his collections.

3. Criminal law ⟸825(4) — Defendant must request more explicit instruction to limit evidence.

Where defendant did not request a more direct and explicit instruction to consider certain evidence only as bearing on defendant's sanity, he cannot complain that such instruction was not given.

4. Criminal law ⟸859—Court not required to read testimony, in absence of disagreement of jurors.

Where there was no disagreement among jurors as to the testimony of certain experts on insanity, but they were merely not clear as to the difference between medical and legal insanity, the trial court was not required by statute to read to them the testimony involved.

5. Criminal law ⟸1174(1)—Failure to read testimony on request of jury harmless to defendant.

In a prosecution for burglary, defended on the ground of insanity, any error in failing to comply with the jury's request to have certain expert testimony on insanity read held harmless to defendant.

6. Criminal law ⟸1169(1)—Testimony harmless to defendant, charged with burglary.

In a prosecution for burglary, testimony that at the time the witness heard a voice, coming from the direction of the burglarized store, saying, "Here, take this," held harmless to defendant.

7. Criminal law ⟸730(1)—Error in argument cured by direction to disregard.

Any possible injury to defendant in the argument of the district attorney was cured by the trial court's direction to the jury to disregard the argument.

8. Criminal law ⊂=1037(2)—Defendant cannot complain of argument, in absence of request for direction to disregard.

Where there was no request that the trial court direct the jury to disregard criticized statements in the district attorney's argument, defendant cannot complain of such statements on appeal.

9. Criminal law ⊂=570(2)—Insanity must be established by preponderance of evidence.

If the jury, trying a charge of burglary, entertained a reasonable doubt concerning the proof of any material issue, it was under duty to give defendant the benefit of the doubt and acquit him, unless the issue was that of his insanity; as to such issue a reasonable doubt is not sufficient to justify acquittal, but the jury must be convinced that the defense is established by a preponderance of the evidence.

10. Criminal law ⊂=810—Instructions on proof as to insanity not inconsistent.

In a prosecution for burglary, instruction that the defense of insanity need not be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, to entitle defendant to an acquittal, held not in conflict with an instruction that a reasonable doubt on the issue of insanity was not sufficient to justify acquittal, but must be established by a preponderance of evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

George M. Zentgraf was convicted of burglary of the first degree, and from the judgment, and an order denying his motion for new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

E. Fitzgerald, of Placerville, and Eugene S. Wachhorst and Donald E. Wachhorst, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Defendant was convicted of burglary in the first degree, and the appeal is from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

That defendant at night entered the store of Heusner Bros. at Shingle Springs, El Dorado county, and took therefrom a large quantity of personal property, is not disputed. He was apprehended therein about midnight with some of the property in his hands; many articles of various kinds having been loaded into his machine, which he had driven and left near the store. Thereupon defendant admitted that he had unlocked the door and gone inside; he stated why he had stolen the property, implying that his motive was that of revenge; and he promised his captors a large sum of money if they would release and not prosecute him. The facts as thus detailed by the witnesses for the people are not controverted, but the defense of insanity was interposed by appellant, and it was upon that ground an acquittal was sought. There is some support for that theory; the principal element thereof consisting of the testimony of two physician experts based upon hypothetical questions. No doubt, the jury might legally have concluded from the showing made that defendant was irresponsible; but a careful reading of the whole record can hardly fail to produce the conviction that the verdict is entirely just and should be upheld. Indeed, it is not disputed that the evidence warrants the verdict; but appellant claims that certain grave errors of sufficient moment to demand a reversal were committed at the trial.

[1] Of these the first relates to the action of the court in permitting evidence of the proceedings at the arraignment of the defendant. It thus appeared that the defendant had pleaded guilty with the expectation that he would be granted probation; but, it being refused, he withdrew the plea by consent of the court and entered a plea of not guilty. This evidence was admissible to rebut the theory of appellant that he was insane at the time the goods were taken by him. The showing for the defense extended over a long period of time, including said date, and according to the familiar rule, it was proper for the people to meet this evidence by showing that his conduct and declarations were those that characterize the normal mind. That he pleaded guilty and asked for probation, and upon its denial concluded that he would stand trial, would seem to be some evidence that he understood the nature and probable consequences of the charge against him. We think there is a distinction between such case and the one wherein the defendant does not claim to be insane. An instance of the latter is found in People v. Ryan, 82 Cal. 617, 23 Pac. 121, wherein it was held to be error for the court to allow the plea of guilty to be put in evidence, where it had been withdrawn and the plea of not guilty substituted. A peculiar feature, also, of that case, was that without said evidence the defendant could not have been legally convicted. In view of that fact the Supreme Court said:

"We do not think that the Legislature, in passing the law under which the defendant was allowed to nullify and render functus officio his plea of guilty, by substituting or putting in place of it a plea of not guilty, intended to say that, notwithstanding such substitution and doing away with the first plea, it may be given in evidence and sometimes serve as the only conclusive proof of a man's guilt under the plea of not guilty."

Herein, of course, the important part of the evidence was that relative to the change of plea after probation was refused. It was proper to have this considered as the act of a mind subject to the ordinary motives that influence human conduct.

[2, 3] Appellant claims that—

"The next serious error is the ruling of the court in permitting the prosecution to introduce testimony of an incident occurring some four or five years prior to the alleged commission of the offense for which defendant was now on trial."

The objection is based upon this part of the record:

"Q. Then you quit the bank, did you? A. Yes. Q. Why did you quit? A. I had been short a few times in my collections, small amounts, and he called my attention to it, and that was not satisfactory, of course; so that was the end of my working there."

The only objection to the question was the general one and that it was not cross-examination. The court based its ruling upon the proposition that the only defense was insanity, and since the defendant had testified to matters covering a long period of time that had a tendency to show a defective memory and impaired reasoning power, this was proper cross-examination, and also pertinent to the inquiry as to the mental status of the defendant. It is true that he had not been interrogated specifically about his employment at the bank, but the direct examination had taken a wide range for the purpose of showing his mental condition, and it opened the door for an inquiry as to other circumstances included within the same period. People v. Mammilato, 168 Cal. 207, 142 Pac. 58. We may add that from the remarks of the court the jury must have understood that the evidence was to be considered as only bearing upon the sanity of the defendant. Since defendant did not request it, he cannot complain that a more direct and explicit instruction to that effect was not given.

[4, 5] The next point is that the court erred in failing to comply with the request of the jury to have certain testimony read. After having been out for a long time they came into court and one of the jurors said:

"The jury would like to know—would like to hear the testimony of those two specialists, Hoisholt and Matthews; we got kind of mixed up on that question."

Then Juror Frost said: "We would like to know whether he was legally sane or insane at the time of the act." Then Juror Mrs. Eskew: "Or medically insane." It seems that the court understood that the jurors desired to have the instructions on the subject re-read and stated: "In answer to the question, the instructions heretofore given will be read in these particulars." After reading them the court said: "Does that answer the question?" And Juror Frost replied: "Yes sir." It is true that thereafter one of the jurors said, "I believe the information wanted is the testimony of those two doctors, if I may make clear the information we want;" and in reply to the court's inquiry, "On what point?" he answered, "As to his sanity, legal or medical, at the time of the commission of the act." The court thereupon stated: "I will again read the instructions I have read." This was done, and the jury was again sent out. Section 1138 of the Penal Code provides:

"After the jury have retired for deliberation, if there be any disagreement between them as to the testimony, or if they desired to be informed on any point of law arising in the cause, they must require the officer to conduct them into court. Upon being brought into court, the information required must be given in the presence of, or after notice to the district attorney, and the defendant or his counsel, or after they have been called."

The court and the attorneys seem to have understood that it was a question of law about which the confusion existed, and, taking the whole colloquy into consideration, that is probably not an unreasonable inference, notwithstanding one of the jurors did say that they would like to hear the testimony of the two specialists. At any rate, the attorney who was representing the defendant, if he desired to have such testimony read, should have made the matter plain to the court. We must assume, of course, that the trial judge was acting in good faith and had no disposition to withhold from the jury anything that they were entitled to. Moreover, the statute provides that only when there is a disagreement among the jurors as to the testimony must it be read to them. It does not appear that there was such disagreement, but only that they were not clear as to the difference between medical and legal insanity. This called particularly for the reading of the instructions, rather than the testimony of the specialists. Indeed, the testimony of the experts threw no light upon this subject, and its repetition would not have aided the jury. While they were subjected to a long and searching examination, the testimony amounted simply to an opinion that, assuming the facts to be as stated by defendant's counsel, appellant was insane, and incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong; whereas the question was left in doubt by reason of other facts detailed in the cross-examination. It is quite apparent that no prejudice was suffered by defendant, conceding for the sake of the point that such testimony should have been read.

[6] Mrs. Roxy Burke, a witness for the people, testified in rebuttal that about the time of the burglary she heard a voice, coming from the direction of the store, saying, "Here, take this." She could not identify the voice, but the contention of the prosecution was that, since the defendant's only plea was that "he was there in a dream and didn't know what he was doing," the voice would indicate the presence of another person and thus eliminate the theory of a dream. The argument is rather fanciful, we think; but the matter is of too little consequence to justify serious consideration. Whether the ruling was right or wrong, it could hardly have influenced the verdict.

[7, 8] Some objection is made to certain portions of the argument of the district attorney; but we find no error therein. Speaking generally, it may be said that he did not transcend the bounds of legitimate discussion. Furthermore, one statement, to which objection was made, the court directed the jury to disregard, and hence any possible injury was cured. People v. Amer, 8 Cal. App. 137, 96 Pac. 401; People v. Ward, 134 Cal. 301, 66 Pac. 372. As to the other criticized statements there was no request that the court direct the jury to disregard them, and hence appellant cannot now complain. People v. Shears, 133 Cal. 154, 65 Pac. 295; People v. Yee Foo, 4 Cal. App. 730, 89 Pac. 450.

[9, 10] The only other complaint is that two instructions given by the court are inconsistent and misleading. The first of these is:

"The jury are instructed that the law of the state of California is this: 'If the jury entertain a reasonable doubt concerning the proof of any material issue in a criminal case, it must give the defendant the benefit of that doubt and acquit him, unless the particular issue is that of the insanity of the defendant; and as to such issue of the insanity of the defendant a reasonable doubt is not sufficient to justify an acquittal at the hands of the jury, but they must be convinced that the said defense of insanity is established by a preponderance of the evidence.'"

That this instruction stated the law correctly cannot be doubted. People v. Miller, 171 Cal. 649, 154 Pac. 468. Nor can we see anything inconsistent therewith in the following instruction:

"The defense of insanity need not be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, to entitle the defendant to an acquittal; it is sufficient for the defense to be proved by a preponderance of evidence, to entitle the defendant to a verdict of not guilty. If therefore, you believe that the preponderance of the evidence introduced in this case shows that Mr. Zentgraf, the defendant, was either insane, or deprived of reason, or unconscious of what he was doing at the time of the commission of the act charged, you must acquit him."

The difficulty in the Miller Case, supra, was that the trial court went further, and gave an erroneous and misleading definition of "preponderance of evidence." No such criticism can be made here.

Finally, it may be said, the record contains such persuasive and convincing evidence that the defendant understood the nature of the act which he perpetrated, and was therefore responsible for his conduct, that, notwithstanding the supposititious opinion of said experts, it should be held that any other verdict would be unjust, and that, if any error was committed, it should be disregarded.

The judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

McGEHEE et al. v. CURRAN et al.
(Civ. No. 3398, S. F. 9192.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 1, 1920. Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing, Oct. 30, 1920.)

1. Judgment ⊂⊃441—Fraud, warranting setting aside, must be extrinsic.

A former judgment or decree may be set aside and annulled for fraud, but it must be a fraud extrinsic or collateral to the questions examined and determined in the action.

2. Appeal and error ⊂⊃909(1)—Assumed that controversy was fairly submitted in action to set aside judgment.

In an action to set aside a judgment, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, it will be assumed that the former controversy was fairly submitted.

3. Judgment ⊂⊃460(6)—Facts to be alleged to set aside former judgment for fraud.

In an action to set aside a former judgment as being procured by fraud, it is incumbent upon the plaintiffs, not only to show by their complaints the facts constituting the fraud, but also that they have a defense to the original action upon the merits, and that they are able to present to the court the evidence constituting that defense, and such matters must be alleged, not as ultimate facts, but the facts themselves constituting the defense must appear.

4. Trusts ⊂⊃43(3)—No express trust raised by proof of parol agreement by grantee in absolute deed.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1971 (Civ. Code, § 852), where land was conveyed by an absolute deed, no express trust in favor of the grantor can be raised by proof of a parol agreement by the grantee to hold the property in trust or reconvey it.

5. Trusts ⊂⊃44(3)—Oral testimony to show absolute deed created trust must be clear.

To justify a court in determining from oral testimony that a deed absolute on its face was intended to be a trust, the testimony must be clear, convincing, and conclusive.

6. Trusts ⊂⊃89(1)—Resulting trust held not sufficiently shown.

In an action to have a resulting trust declared in land conveyed by a deed absolute on its face, evidence relied upon by plaintiffs held not of sufficient compelling force to establish a resulting trust.

7. Trusts ⟸43(3)—Declaration of grantor not admissible to show trust.

A declaration of a grantor, made long after the execution of a deed absolute on its face, is not admissible in evidence to show that the land was conveyed in trust for the grantor.

8. Trusts ⟸43(3)—Declarations of grantees not admissible to prove trust.

The declarations of grantees, in a deed absolute on its face, occurring after the death of the grantor, are not competent for the purpose of proving that the land was to be held by the grantees in trust, and would be admissible only in corroboration of other evidence.

9. Adverse possession ⟸63(2) — Possession and payment of taxes by grantor did not divest grantees of title.

The fact that a grantor remained in possession of the premises up to the time of his death and used the same and paid taxes and insurance thereon did not have the effect of divesting his grantees of the title by him conveyed.

10. Judgment ⟸461(5)—Settlement by guardian ad litem of litigation held not in fraud of wards.

In an action to set aside a judgment, held that it was not established that plaintiffs' guardian ad litem, or their attorneys, corruptly or at all entered into a collusive agreement with adverse parties for an unconscionable abandonment of the defense of the plaintiffs in an action to quiet title when a motion for new trial was pending, having compromised the case.

11. Infants ⟸84—Guardian ad litem may compromise in interest of ward.

After an adverse judgment, when a motion for a new trial was pending, and no newly discovered evidence or other facts were at the command of a guardian ad litem, or the ward's attorney, it was incumbent upon the guardian and the attorney to use their best endeavors in the interests of the ward, and, if in the exercise of their honest and best judgment a compromise was the best that they could do, they were justified in compromising, and the compromise could not constitute fraud which would entitle the minors to set aside the judgment.

On Hearing in the Supreme Court.

12. Judgment ⟸423, 444 — Not vacated because of perjured testimony.

Judgment after a trial of controverted issues of fact will not be vacated on a claim that the issues were erroneously determined because of false or even perjured testimony.

13. Judgment ⟸414—Not vacated by reason of fraud not affecting judgment.

If a judgment against minors could not have been reversed or set aside on appeal or by motion for a new trial, any fraudulent settlement between the ward of the minors, by which they were prevented from appealing or moving for a new trial, did not injure them, and did not touch the judgment itself, and is not ground for vacating the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasly, Judge.

Action by Irene M. McGehee and others against John J. Curran and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appealed. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

W. H. Tully, of San Francisco, and D. T. Jenkins, of San Jose, for appellants.

Leib & Leib, L. B. Archer, and C. M. Cassin, all of San Jose, for respondents.

WASTE, P. J. This is an action brought by the plaintiffs, after a lapse of over 12 years, to set aside, and vacate a judgment, rendered in 1905 in an action to quiet title, wherein the defendants here were the plaintiffs, and these plaintiffs were the defendants. Plaintiffs also seek to establish a constructive trust in the land in their favor. It is the contention of the appellants that they did not have a just and fair trial in that action, because of the suppression of facts, and because of fraud and collusion on the part of the defendants here and the attorneys for and guardian ad litem of four of these plaintiffs, who were then minors. Demurrer to the second amended complaint was sustained, and, the plaintiffs declining to amend, judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, from which the appeal is taken.

As the litigation of which this action is but a part, had its inception 35 years ago, it is necessary for us to indulge in a somewhat extended narration of the facts, which are set out in the amended complaint. In 1884 Sarah G. Tully, who is the mother of the other plaintiffs, married John Tully, a widower now deceased and the father of defendants Mary E. Wineland, Isabella Higgins, Dorinda Tully Curran, Eleanor Tully, Joseph Tully, and Edward O. Tully. Defendant J. W. Wineland is the husband of Mary E. Wineland, defendant Maurice Higgins is the husband of Isabella Higgins, and defendant J. J. Curran is the surviving husband of Dorinda Tully Curran, now deceased, and the executor of her estate. In speaking of "the defendants" hereafter, we will refer to the said children of John Tully. On July 29, 1885, the said Sarah G. Tully instituted an action for divorce against her husband. A few days later he conveyed all his property, consisting of several tracts of land, and some of his personal property to his children, these defendants. Thereupon Sarah G. Tully amended her complaint, and made the grantees in said conveyances, parties defendant in the divorce action. Upon the trial being had, the court granted Mrs. Tully a decree of divorce and awarded her the custody of an infant child. The court also decreed that the conveyances from Tully to the children of his former marriage were fraudulent, inoperative, and void as to any interest or claim of his wife, therein or thereto. He was ordered to pay to her the sum of $50 per month for the support and maintenance of herself and the child, and the payment thereof, and of any other sum which might thereafter be awarded instead, was secured by, and declared to be a lien upon a part of the land covered by the deeds.

The parties to the divorce action settled their differences, and immediately after the filing and entry of the decree of divorce, Tully and his wife entered into an agreement, whereby Tully promised and agreed with Mrs. Tully that if she would remarry him, and would forego and release him and the lands he had conveyed to his children, from the lien, and the payment of permanent alimony for the support of herself and the child, he would convey to her an undivided one-third interest in all of the land theretofore deeded to these defendants. The parties thereupon remarried and lived together until John Tully died, November 26, 1894. Three more children were born to them. It was not until September 20, 1894, however, and just before his death, that John Tully, in part fulfillment of his marriage contract, executed and delivered to Mrs. Tully a grant, bargain and sale deed for one undivided third interest in the land. A few days later, on October 12, 1894, Tully made and delivered to his children by the former marriage another deed of the same property he had conveyed to them in 1885, excepting a portion sold. This conveyance was executed in consideration of love and affection, and for the better maintenance, support, and protection of the grantees, and granted and confirmed the land to them. From and after the death of John Tully the plaintiffs and defendants remained in joint possession of the property until August, 1905. The defendants assumed management and control thereof, and provided and cared for Mrs. Tully and her four minor children for about two years. During these years, so it is alleged, the defendants and Sarah G. Tully negotiated and consulted with a view to ascertaining what she would consider to be a fair share for herself and the minors, in a division of the property. On December 5, 1896, Mrs. Tully instituted an action in ejectment, in her own behalf, against the grantees of John Tully, to recover her one-third interest in the lands. The grantees filed their answer, in which they asserted themselves to be the owners of the land, and denied any ownership in Mrs. Tully. The trial court held that the plaintiff therein could not prove the invalidity of the deeds from John Tully to the defendants, or that said defendants held said land in trust for plaintiff. It admitted the deeds in evidence, and gave its judgment against Sarah G. Tully, and in favor of the defendants. Claiming that the defendants were threatening to dispossess her under that judgment, Mrs. Tully immediately instituted another action against the same defendants, and in which the minor children were plaintiffs, by their guardian ad litem, H. V. Morehouse. The third amended complaint in that action is attached to, and made a part of the amended complaint in this present suit. In addition to specific allegations of the facts we have narrated, it is therein averred that John Tully remained in possession and control of the land, set forth in the deeds of conveyance to the defendants, up to the time of his death, claiming the same as his own, cultivating said land and paying the taxes thereon. As the gravamen of the action it is alleged that the deed, made by John Tully to the defendants in 1884, was executed for the purpose of defeating Mrs. Tully in the divorce action, and in the assertion of her rights to maintenance for herself and offspring, and was not made in good faith, and was in fraud of creditors, of whom Mrs. Tully was one by reason of her alimony allowance. It was further alleged in that action that the second deed from John Tully to the defendants, executed in 1894, was procured by the defendants by false and fraudulent representations, at a time when said Tully was feeble in body and mind from physical disease, and for the purpose of defeating all rights and claims of the plaintiffs, and the effect of the deed of the one-third interest made by John Tully to Mrs. Tully, and also to defeat the claims which the minor children would have in the estate of John Tully, in case he should die intestate. The prayer of the complaint was that it be adjudged that the defendants, who are the defendants herein, had since the 1st day of August, 1884, held the land in trust for Sarah G. Tully and her minor children, who are the plaintiffs here, that Sarah G. Tully be adjudged to be the owner of an undivided one-third part, and the minor children of the plaintiff and John Tully, the other plaintiffs here, be adjudged to be the owner of an undivided four-tenths of the remaining two-thirds.

Demurrer to the third amended complaint in that action was sustained, the plaintiffs declined to further amend, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendants. While it does not so appear from the averments of the amended complaint in the present action, it is a matter of record to which both appellants and respondents have referred in their briefs and arguments, that on appeal the judgment was affirmed upon two grounds: (1) That the facts stated in the complaint did not state a cause of action; and (2) that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. The court held on the facts pleaded, which were those we have here set out, that John Tully had neither legal nor equitable title after his conveyance to his children in 1884, and that there was no trust relation to save the operation of the statute of limitations. Tully v. Tully, 137 Cal. 60, 68, 69 Pac. 700.

Matters appear to have remained in status quo until January 2, 1904, when these defendants instituted an action against these plaintiffs, Sarah G. Tully and her children, who were still minors, to quiet title to all of the property conveyed by the John Tully deeds, excepting the portion theretofore sold. The plaintiffs appeared in the action, the minors being at all times represented by F. J. Hambly, their duly appointed guardian ad litem. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs in that action, the defendants here. It is that judgment that the plaintiffs, all of them being now of legal age, are seeking to have vacated and set aside. They also seek to have a trust in favor of plaintiffs impressed upon the property conveyed by John Tully to the defendants, and pray for interest upon the rental value of the shares to which they claim to be entitled under the trust.

As the basis of the present action begun 12 years after the entry of the judgment, the plaintiffs allege that they did not have a just, or fair trial, in the suit to quiet title, because of the fraud of the defendants in suppressing facts which would have established the rights of the plaintiffs, and because of collusion on the part of the defendants and the guardian ad litem of the plaintiffs who were minors at the time. In support of their position the plaintiffs now allege that on August 1, 1885, the defendants induced John Tully to convey his property to themselves, by a deed absolute in form, "upon the express oral agreement with the said John Tully that they and each of them would hold the said property in trust for the use and benefit of him, the said John Tully, and would permit him to remain in possession and take the rent, issues, and profits of said property as he had always done theretofore, and would reconvey to said John Tully or to whomsoever he might direct, the whole or any portion of the same." It is alleged that the second, or confirmation deed of John Tully to the defendants, made on October 12, 1894, was executed without consideration, and was executed by John Tully, and accepted by the defendants, upon the express oral agreement that the defendants would convey to Sarah G. Tully the legal title to an undivided one-third equitable interest in said property, and that they would hold the remainder of said property in trust for the use and benefit of themselves, the said defendants, and for the use and benefit of the then four minor children.

It is these alleged facts which the plaintiffs now charge were suppressed by the defendants in the trial of the quiet title suit, the averment being that in that action:

"The said plaintiffs endeavored to defend themselves against said suit to quiet title upon every available ground then known to them; that the defense that said property was held in trust as heretofore set forth was rendered unavailable to said plaintiffs, and no fair submission of said defense was had, for the reason that the defendants fraudulently suppressed the facts of the existence of said trusts and agreements by remaining silent and refusing to disclose to the plaintiffs, their cestui, either the rights of the plaintiffs in said property or the facts to prove the existence of said rights; that the said Sarah G. Tulley, for the purpose of discovering the true manner in which said defendants held the said property, caused the depositions to be taken of Joseph Tully, Edward O. Tully, and Isabella Higgins, defendants hereto, and said defendants asserted in said depositions that they were the absolute owners of said property, and refused to disclose anything with reference to the rights of said plaintiffs; that at the trial of said suit to quiet title, the said defendants asserted that they were the absolute owners of said property, and refused to disclose the rights of the plaintiffs, their cestui; that said plaintiffs exhausted every available means to ascertain the facts and secure the evidence in regard to the manner in which the said defendants held the said property * * * that said facts of the existence of said trusts and of the evidence to prove them lay peculiarly within the minds of said defendants, for the reason that said defendants were the only parties present from whom the plaintiffs could obtain the information, except John Tully, who was at that time dead; that the plaintiffs did not have a just or fair trial in said suit to quiet title because of the said suppression of the facts of the existence of their rights by said defendants, their trustees and because of the fraud of said defendants and the guardian ad litem of said minor plaintiffs as hereinafter set forth."

As the basis of the fraud and collusion on the part of the defendants, and the guardian ad litem, and attorneys for the minors, it is alleged that before the judgment in the said suit to quiet title had become final, and while the motion for a new trial in said suit was still pending and the time for appeal still available, the said defendants, aided and assisted by their attorneys, conspired with the said guardian ad litem and the attorneys of said minor plaintiffs, J. E. Alexander and H. V. Moorehouse, to defraud the plaintiffs and to deprive them of their right to their motion for a new trial and their right to appeal; that said guardian ad litem and the attorneys of said minors entered into an agreement with said defendants, acting through their attorneys, wherein the said guardian ad litem and the attorneys of said minors, in consideration of the sum of $750, to be paid to said guardian ad litem and the attorneys of said minors by said defendants, agreed to abandon the defense of said then minor plaintiffs, and to procure a written agreement, providing for the removal of the plaintiffs from the property, and a release of all the rights of Sarah G. Tully in said property, upon a payment to said then minor plaintiffs, John J. Tully, Jennie G. Tully, Irene M. Tully, and Wilford H. Tully, of the sum of $15,000, either in the form of a portion of said property or in money, and also providing for the dismissal of a suit between the administrator of the estate of John Tully and said defendants, then pending, involving certain personal property. This agreement, duly executed by all parties, was carried out. The $750 was paid to the guardian ad litem and their attorneys. The motion for a new trial was dismissed by stipulation, and the defendants turned over to the minors $15,000 worth of property. No part of it was received by Sarah G. Tully, and she received no property or money as a consideration for her release. The terms of the agreement of settlement, which the plaintiffs now claim to be unjust and unfair to them, as securing to them only a part of what they would be entitled to if the trust in their favor had been established, were not communicated to the minors; neither did they have personal knowledge of the settlement, which they always supposed was made in good faith. The compromise on their behalf was not submitted to or approved by the court.

Three principal questions at once address themselves to our consideration upon the foregoing facts: (1) Was the judgment here attacked obtained by fraud, in such manner as to entitle these plaintiffs to the intervention of a court of equity to set it aside? (2) Was the compromise agreement, entered into by the parties after the rendition of the judgment, fraudulently procured? (3) Would the plaintiffs be in a more favorable position had it not been executed? Upon the answers to these questions depends the correct solution of this case.

[1, 2] That a former judgment, or decree, may be set aside, and annulled for some frauds there can be no question; but it must be a fraud extrinsic, or collateral to the questions examined and determined in the action. When parties have once submitted a matter, or have had the opportunity of submitting it, for investigation and determination, and when they have exhausted every means for reviewing such determination in the same proceeding, it must be regarded as final and conclusive, unless it can be shown that the jurisdiction of the court has been imposed upon, or that the prevailing party has prevented a fair submission of the controversy. Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 133, 27 Pac. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159; Steen v. March, 132 Cal. 616, 618, 64 Pac. 994; Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 477, 490–491, 89 Pac. 317. According to the averments of plaintiffs, the fraud which prevented a fair submission of their controversy lay in the fact that at the trial of the suit to quiet title the defendants "asserted that they were the absolute owners of said property, and refused to disclose the rights of the plaintiffs." The plaintiffs were not prevented by any fraudulent contrivance of the defendants from having a trial. That was their opportunity for presenting the whole matter of their alleged interest in the lands to the court for determination. In the absence of any showing to the contrary, it will be assumed that the controversy was fairly submitted. The plaintiffs did not make the judgment roll, or any part of the evidence taken and received in the court below, a part of their complaint. We do not know what transpired there, beyond the fact that a judgment was rendered in favor of these defendants. In what manner or form the defendants asserted that they were the absolute owners of the property, and under what circumstances they refused to disclose the rights of the plaintiffs, is not made to appear. Consequently, there is nothing in the record, so far as it relates to the trial, from which it may be inferred that the judgment was procured by means of any extrinsic fraud, or that it would have been different or more favorable to the plaintiffs but for the conduct of the defendants. Even though it should appear that the defendants went so far as to give perjured testimony in establishing their title to the property, and in defeating the claims of the plaintiffs, the fraud was intrinsic, and would not avail the plaintiffs to set aside the judgment. "In this state it is the settled law that a judgment cannot be set aside because it is predicated upon perjured testimony, or because material evidence is concealed or suppressed." People v. Mooney, 178 Cal. 525, 530, 174 Pac. 325; Allen v. Currey, 41 Cal. 321; Pico v. Cohn, supra.

[3] If, as alleged, but not so clearly as to be established, the guardian ad litem, and the attorneys for the minors, corruptly sold out their clients' interests, and through fraud and collusion with the defendants conspired to defraud the plaintiffs, and did deprive them of their right to a new trial, and to an appeal in the quiet title action, to their prejudice, such conduct amounted to extrinsic fraud. Pico v. Cohn, supra; Rountree v. Montague, 30 Cal. App. 170, 181, 157 Pac. 623 But even in that case, before a court of equity can set aside the judgment, it must be made to appear with reasonable certainty that the judgment was wrong, or that the result would have been different upon another trial. Davis v. Chalfant, 81 Cal. 627, 630, 22 Pac. 972; Painter v. J. B. Painter Co., 133 Cal. 129, 131, 65 Pac. 311. In the instant case it does not appear that the result would have been different, had the plaintiffs pressed their motion for a new trial, or, in the event of its being denied, had appealed to the higher court. It was incumbent upon the plaintiffs, not only to show by their complaint the facts constituting the fraud which they contend gives them the right to set aside this judgment, but they were required also to show that they have a defense to the original action upon the merits, and that they are able to present to the court the evidence constituting that defense. They were required to not merely allege these matters as ultimate facts, but the facts themselves—those constituting the fraud, those constituting the defense, and those constituting their ability to present them to the court—should appear in the complaint, in order that the court may determine that if the allegations had been admitted by the other parties the plaintiffs would have been entitled to a judgment in their favor in the original action. Bell v. Thompson, 147 Cal. 689, 693, 694, 82 Pac. 327, and cases cited. In the absence of the judgment roll and evidence in the action to quiet title, we have no means of ascertaining if there was any error in the trial of the case that might have availed the plaintiffs on their motion for a new trial or on appeal. It is not alleged in the complaint that the plaintiffs could or would have presented any newly discovered evidence to the court upon that occasion. On the contrary, it very definitely appears that they would not and could not have done so. The allegation is that "the plaintiffs endeavored to defend themselves against said suit to quiet title upon every ground then known to them." The facts constituting the defense now suggested "that the property was held in trust," were not known to the plaintiffs until many years after the rendition of the judgment. Consequently, those facts could not have been available in support of their motion.

Even if the plaintiffs had possessed the knowledge of the facts they now assert, we are of the opinion that the result of a new trial, if one had been granted, would not have been different any more than if the action were to be now tried anew. As tending to show that they have a defense to the original action upon the merits, and that they are able to present to the court the evidence constituting that defense, the plaintiffs allege the facts constituting the discovery of the purported fraud and the evidentiary matters relied upon to establish it. In 1917, 12 years after the date of the judgment, one of them, since arrived at maturity, had a conversation with the attorney, who, back in 1894, drafted the deed from John Tully to Sarah G. Tully, and was by him informed that shortly after said deed had been executed, one of the defendants, Isabella Higgins, called at his office, and in conversation had approved of the making of the deed, and during no time in said conversation regarding the deeding of said property did she lay claim to said property, either on behalf of herself or the other defendants, nor did she assert or declare that her father was not the owner of said property, and entitled to convey the same, but she stated that she was an heir of said John Tully, and so interested in his estate. Plaintiffs also learned in 1916, that a purchaser of part of the land paid the money in said transaction to John Tully, and that he and his four adult children signed the deed, but while due returns of sale of the interest of his two minor children were made to the court, "no pretense appears in said record to have been made to account to said two defendants by said guardian or otherwise." In 1917 the same plaintiff learned from one William Wehner that said Wehner was present at a family council shortly before John Tully died, at which the latter, the plaintiff Sarah G. Tully, and the defendants were present. Wehner informed this plaintiff that during the conference he asked John Tully, in the presence of the defendants, if he did not understand at the time the deed of August 1, 1884, was made, the property set out in the deed was to be deeded back to him at any time he saw fit to demand it; that John Tully said he so understood it, and none of the defendants questioned or denied the truth of the statement. As Mrs. Sarah G. Tully was present at that time, all of that information was in the possession of that plaintiff at least at all times after the occurrence, and could have been, and we think it safe to assume was, no doubt, used whenever it was considered of value, or material, in this long drawn out litigation. There is no allegation that John Tully ever demanded a reconveyance of the property. In 1917, Mrs. Nettie Shaafe, one of the former employés of the Tully property, informed the same plaintiff that John Tully, shortly before his death, informed her that he had deeded one-third of his property to Sarah G. Tully, and had given the balance, share and share alike, to his children. Other facts relied upon by the plaintiffs are that Sarah G. Tully, one of the plaintiffs, has informed her coplaintiffs that after the death of John Tully, Isabella Higgins, one of the defendants, said she hoped the said Sarah G. Tully would get "her share," presumably of Tully's property, and that upon another occasion Joseph Tully, another of the defendants, "asked her what portions of the property she would take for herself and children, and she informed him what she wanted." What that portion was, however, is not made to appear. Many evidentiary facts are pleaded to support the allegation that John Tully remained in possession of the lands, paying all charges, collecting all the revenues, and generally exercising rights of ownership over the property until he died.

[4] The foregoing allegations, if admitted or proved, would not establish an express trust in the defendants in favor of either John Tully, or the plaintiffs. That precise point was, in effect, decided upon the appeal in the former action between the same parties. There is no pretense that there was any writing creating such trust, and without it none could exist. Tully v. Tully, supra, 137

Cal. 67, 69 Pac. 700; Smith v. Mason, 122 Cal. 426, 427, 55 Pac. 143; Sheehan v. Sullivan, 126 Cal. 189, 192, 58 Pac. 543; Civ. Code, § 852; Code Civ. Proc. § 1971. As the land was conveyed by an absolute deed, no express trust in favor of the grantor can be raised by proof of a parol agreement by the grantee to hold the property in trust, or reconvey it. Barr v. O'Donnell, 76 Cal. 469, 471, 18 Pac. 429, 9 Am. St. Rep. 242.

[5-9] If the evidence pleaded be relied upon by the plaintiffs as proof of a parol promise which is unenforceable because of the statute of frauds, and which the defendants decline to recognize—in other words to show a resulting trust—it does not have that effect. It is attempted to be pleaded, and parenthetically appears, that certain oral agreements were entered into between John Tully and these defendants, which formed the consideration for the deeds, and the repudiation of which constitutes the constructive fraud upon which the alleged trust arises. Lauricella v. Lauricella, 161 Cal. 61, 65, 118 Pac. 430; Cooney v. Glynn, 157 Cal. 583, 587, 108 Pac. 506. The evidence disclosed by the averments of the complaint is not sufficient to warrant the court in finding that the deeds, which on their face are absolute conveyances of the lands in fee simple, were intended to be something else, namely, conveyances in trust. The authorities are uniform to the point that, to justify a court in determining from oral testimony that such a deed was intended to be something different, as for instance a trust, the testimony must be clear, convincing, and conclusive. The rule is so well stated in Sheehan v. Sullivan, 126 Cal. 189, 192–196, 58 Pac. 543, that we refer to that decision for a full discussion of the point, and its application to the facts of the case at bar. The evidence relied upon by the appellants does not have sufficient compelling force to establish a resulting trust in the defendants in the present action. No evidence is pleaded from which it can even be inferred that at the time the conveyances from John Tully to the defendants were executed there was any declaration or expression of any kind by the grantor or the grantees that the deeds were intended to be anything else than what they purport on their face to be. The only evidence pleaded, even tending to have that effect, that of Wehner, was a declaration of the grantor, made long after the execution of the deeds, which was not admissible in evidence. Whatever John Tully might say, or do, after the conveyance to his children, these defendants, could not affect their title as grantees. It was so held on the first appeal. Tully v. Tully, supra, 137 Cal. 67, 69 Pac. 700; Smith v. Mason, 122 Cal. 426, 55 Pac. 143; Bollinger v. Bollinger, 154 Cal. 695, 705, 99 Pac. 196. The declarations of some of the grantees, the evidence of which is supplied by one of the plaintiffs, occurring after the execution of the deeds and the death of John Tully, are not competent for the purpose of proving the trust, and would be admissible only in corroboration of other evidence. Under any view, they would seem to be of little consequence. Sheehan v. Sullivan, supra. The fact that John Tully remained in possession of the premises up to the time of his death, and used the same, and paid taxes and insurance thereon, did not have the effect of divesting his grantees of the title by him conveyed. Tully v. Tully, supra, 137 Cal. 66, 69 Pac. 700; Emmons v. Barton, 109 Cal. 662, 42 Pac. 303; Brown v. McKay, 125 Cal. 291, 57 Pac. 1001; Reed v. Smith, 125 Cal. 491, 58 Pac. 139.

From this review of the law and the facts we are of the opinion that the demurrer to the second amended complaint was properly sustained. In one of the concluding allegations of their complaint, the appellants say they "have other evidence of the said trusts and fraud that they will offer at the trial of the case." But such averment does not assist the court in arriving at a correct determination of the matter. Bell v. Thompson, supra. Appellants argue that this is not a suit to set aside a judgment upon the ground that it was secured by perjured testimony, but is an action for relief upon the ground of fraud for breach of duty by trustees. Even so, the effect of a recovery would be the same, and, as we have attempted to show, they were not entitled to relief upon either theory. No trust has been proved, the repudiation of which raised a cause of action in the plaintiffs' favor. The purported fraud in procuring the judgment was intrinsic. The alleged unfair and unjust compromise agreement resulted in no prejudice to the appellants.

[10, 11] Before leaving that subject we pause to say that, in our opinion, it has not been established that the guardian ad litem of certain of the minors, or their attorneys, corruptly, or at all, entered into a collusive agreement with the defendants, through their attorneys, for an unrighteous or unconscionable, abandonment of the defense of those plaintiffs in the quiet title action. The litigation was at that time already stale. Upon two separate occasions, following the death of John Tully, the codefendant of the minors, their mother, had unsuccessfully assailed the title by which the grantees of John Tully claimed to be the absolute owners of the land. In one of the actions, in which the minors were parties plaintiff, with their mother, an effort had been made to have it determined that such plaintiffs were part owners of the property. After what would appear to be ample opportunity for the proper presentation of every claim they might have (for the demurrer sustained was to the third amended complaint), the plaintiffs had allowed judgment to be taken against them, and affirmed upon appeal to the Supreme Court. Tully v. Tully, supra. It had there been held, on the facts presented, that the first deed of John Tully to his children, the defendants there and here, passed title to them, and that such title had continued to remain in the grantees. We have not before us the record of that case, other than the complaint, but three points appear to have been urged by the plaintiffs in support of their claim, the invalidity of the conveyance to the defendants, title by adverse possession in John Tully, and a resulting trust in these defendants. We may safely assume such facts, for the Supreme Court passed upon those questions and decided each against the contentions of the plaintiffs. After elaborate preparations for presenting their defense to the quiet title action, brought against them by these defendants, judgment had again been given against the plaintiffs, and confirming the title of these defendants. When the motion for a new trial was pending, no newly discovered evidence, or other facts, were at the command of the guardian ad litem, or the attorneys for the plaintiffs. Under such circumstances, it was incumbent upon them to use their best endeavors in the interests of their wards and clients. If in the exercise of their honest and best judgment the compromise effected was the best they could do, they were justified in entering into the agreement. Under such circumstances, the efforts of the guardian ad litem and the attorneys, did not constitute fraud, and would not entitle the minors to set aside the judgment. Collins v. Scott, 100 Cal. 446, 452, 34 Pac. 1085. The other plaintiff, Sarah G. Tully, was sui juris, and was represented by counsel. She had full knowledge of all the facts, and signed the agreement. She cannot now be heard to complain. The payment by the defendants of the sum of $750 to the guardian ad litem and the attorneys for the plaintiffs appears from the allegations of the complaint to have been a part of the settlement, and was well understood by all the parties. Aside from certain conclusions of the pleader, there is nothing in the record to establish fraud on the part of those so directly assailed. The action was apparently settled in good faith.

We think it unnecessary to devote further consideration to the many points raised by the parties on the submission of this case. For the reason, which we deem readily apparent from what we have already said, the litigation should have an end. No sufficient ground has been suggested in the second amended complaint why it should be prolonged. Further discussion would involve questions which are merely corrollary to the main issue, many of which become of material importance only when considered from a viewpoint differing from that which we have reached.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; WELCH, Judge pro tem.

Opinion of Supreme Court in bank denying hearing.

PER CURIAM. [12] We agree with the conclusion reached by the District Court of Appeal, but there are matters stated in its opinion as to which we have some doubt, and from which we prefer to withhold approval. With the general line of reasoning of the opinion we agree. The essential point of the case is that in 1905 the defendants in the present action secured a judgment against plaintiffs, quieting their title to the property involved, and this judgment is conclusive upon the plaintiffs unless their complaint alleges such fraud in obtaining the judgment as will warrant setting it aside. The only fraud in the obtaining of that judgment which the complaint alleges is that the plaintiffs there, defendants here, falsely claimed and testified that the deeds from their father, under which they claim, were intended as absolute conveyances, and were not given or received upon any trust. There is no allegation that the plaintiffs in that action prevented the defendants, or those acting for them, from controverting in every way available to them the claim and testimony of the plaintiffs that the property had been conveyed to them as absolute owners. The allegation of the complaint is, indeed, that every effort was made on behalf of the then defendants to secure evidence of the trust upon which it is now claimed the deeds were executed, but that such endeavors failed. The new matter which it is alleged the now plaintiffs have since discovered is but evidence which they claim is sufficient to show that the testimony of their adversaries given in the former action was false. This is nothing more than an allegation that the former judgment was obtained by false testimony. But the rule is thoroughly established that a judgment had after a trial of controverted issues of fact will not be reopened on a claim that the issues were erroneously determined because of false or even perjured testimony. The false or genuine character of the testimony was intrinsic to the trial in the course of which it was presented, and a judgment based upon the conclusion then made that it was genuine is final, and cannot be reopened to permit of a retrial of the same issues simply because of a claim that it can now be shown that such testimony was false. If the rule were otherwise, there could be no end to litigation.

[13] The complaint also attacks as fraudulent a settlement made between the parties after the rendition of the former judgment, but before the expiration of the time for appeal or for motion for a new trial, whereby the plaintiffs were prevented from appealing or moving for a new trial. We may assume that this settlement, according to the allegations of the complaint, was fraudulent and subject to be set aside, although even that is hardly certain, giving full value to the allegations. But even assuming this, such fraud does not touch the judgment, and, unless the judgment can be overthrown, the plaintiffs have no cause of action. The only effect which the alleged fraudulent settlement is claimed to have had upon the former litigation is that it prevented an appeal or a motion for a new trial. But there is nothing whatever alleged in the complaint showing that an appeal or motion for a new trial could or would have been successful. In fact, it is a fair inference from the complaint that they would not have been, since the only ground on which the judgment is now attacked is that it was given on false testimony, and the evidence which it is now claimed shows the testimony to have been false was not known at the time, and could not have been produced. If the judgment could not have been reversed or set aside on appeal or by motion for a new trial, it is evident that any fraudulent settlement by which the present plaintiffs were prevented from appealing or moving for a new trial did not injure them, did not touch the judgment itself, and is wholly immaterial.

What we have said is substantially said in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, and sufficiently disposes of the case. As to all other matters discussed in the opinion we withhold approval.

Rehearing denied.

All concur, except SHAW, J., and SLOANE, J., absent.

STREETER & RIDDELL, Inc., v. BACON et al. (Civ. 3322.)

Partnership ⊂=32—Father held partner with third person, though nominally represented by son.

Despite provisions of a contract between a father, his son, and a third person that the parties were not forming a partnership, and did not intend to conduct the business as partners, etc., held that the father was in fact a member of a partnership as defined by Civ. Code, § 2395, being the real partner with the third person, though nominally represented by his son.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Streeter & Riddell, Incorporated, against William S. Bacon and others. From judgment for plaintiff, a defendant, Frank P. Bacon, appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Abrahams and P. B. D'Orr, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert M. Fulton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action against William S. Bacon, W. F. James, and Frank P. Bacon, individually and as partners doing business under the firm name of Bacon & James, to recover a balance due of merchandise sold and delivered to the defendants. From a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant Frank P. Bacon appeals.

On the 28th day of August, 1918, and prior to the time when the account with plaintiff was opened, the defendants entered into an agreement which reads as follows:

"This agreement made and entered into this 28th day of August, 1918, by and between William S. Bacon and W. F. James, parties of the first part, and Frank P. Bacon, party of the second part, witnesseth that:

"Whereas, the parties of the first part are about to engage in the business of threshing beans and the operating of an outfit for the threshing of beans for hire; and

"Whereas, the above-named W. F. James is now the owner of and in possession of a Yuba tractor and horses, harness, and other equipment useful and usable in said business; and

"Whereas, the party of the second part has agreed to and is about to purchase one complete thresher, eight wagons, one derrick outfit, nets, etc., one cookhouse, one set forks and tools, all at a cost to him not to exceed the sum of three thousand ($3,000) dollars; and

"Whereas, the parties of the first part are unable to furnish the necessary capital to pay the operating expenses, wages, etc., of carrying on said business, and the party of the second part is willing and has agreed to furnish such working capital:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, it is hereby mutually agreed by and between the parties hereto as follows:

"First. The parties of the first part agree to enter upon and engage in the business of threshing beans for hire, each of said parties to devote his time and best energies to the promotion of said business, and each to do that part of the work for which he may be best fitted, and to receive the daily wage for such work usually and customarily paid to employés therefor.

"Second. The party of the second part agrees to furnish the capital necessary to pay the pay rolls and operating expenses.

"Third. The equipment belonging to said W. F. James, as aforesaid, and that to be purchased by Frank P. Bacon, shall be used in said business and furnished by the owner thereof as his contribution toward the business; it being expressly understood and agreed that at the end of the present threshing season all equipment furnished by said Frank P. Bacon shall be and remain his sole and separate property, and all of the equipment furnished by said W. F. James shall be and remain his sole and separate property.

"Fourth. All moneys received or earned by the parties hereto in the operation of said business, either as hire for said outfit or in payment for threshing beans, or from the sale of bean straw or beans, shall be deposited in the First National Bank of Van Nuys, Cal., to the credit of W. N. Hamaker, trustee. From said moneys the party of the second part shall be paid all moneys advanced by him as capital for payment of pay rolls, or the carrying on of said business, together with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. After the party of the second part has been paid said moneys, with interest, as aforesaid, then all moneys remaining in said account shall be divided equally, one-half to W. F. James, and one-half to Frank P. Bacon; it being understood and agreed that William S. Bacon, one of the parties of the first part, shall look to said party to the second part for his compensation, and shall be entitled to no part of the proceeds, profits, or revenues from the carrying on of said business, except by express agreement and understanding with the party of the second part.

"Fifth. The parties hereto further agree that the bean crop belonging to the party of the second part and that belonging to said W. F. James shall be threshed without charge, with the express reservation and condition that each of said parties shall pay the actual cost of such threshing operation.

"Sixth. This agreement shall remain in force and effect during the bean-threshing season of 1918.

"Seventh. It is expressly declared that the parties hereto are not by this agreement forming a partnership, nor do they intend to conduct said business under the terms of this agreement as partners, and neither of the parties hereto shall be liable for the acts or obligations of the other, except as herein expressly provided.

"Eighth. The party of the second part is hereby given a lien and charge upon all moneys, accounts, or other things of value had or to be had by the parties hereto by reason of any business done or contracts procured, to secure to him the repayment of the moneys advanced hereunder.

"Ninth. The parties of the first part shall at all times carry an insurance policy with the state compensation insurance fund or some other reliable insurance company, to the party of the second part, covering their liability, under the laws of California, commonly known as the Workmen's Compensation Law, the premium upon which shall be considered operating expense, and be deductible as such from the receipts.

"In witness whereof the parties hereto have signed these presents in duplicate this the day and year first above written.

"[Signed] William S. Bacon,
"W. F. James,
"Parties of the First Part.
"Frank P. Bacon,
"Party of the Second Part."

Immediately before the plaintiff began to furnish the goods which it claims to have sold to the defendants, the defendant W. S. Bacon applied to the plaintiff for merchandise to be furnished in carrying out the contract above set forth, and exhibited said contract, which then and there was read by the president of the plaintiff corporation. Shortly thereafter W. S. Bacon came to the plaintiff's store with his father, the defendant Frank P. Bacon. Frank P. Bacon stated that the boys, referring to W. S. Bacon and W. F. James, were starting a threshing machine, and that he had entered into an agreement with them to finance them on this enterprise, and that all bills would be paid; that the boys were starting a threshing machine, and he was backing or financing them on this enterprise; that accounts opened in the name of Bacon & James were backed by him and would be paid. Thereafter the goods were sold and delivered "to Mr. William S. Bacon and W. F. James for the firm of Bacon & James."

The defense of appellant is that he was not a member of the partnership, that he did not in writing agree to pay any debt of his codefendants and that therefore he is not liable in this action.

We are of the opinion that, notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 7 of the contract, appellant was in fact a member of the partnership. "Partnership is the association of two or more persons, for the purpose of carrying on business together, and dividing its profits between them." Civ. Code, § 2395. Relying upon the law as stated in Coward v. Clanton, 122 Cal. 451, 55 Pac. 147, appellant claims that profit sharing is not a test of partnership, and that he was not associated with his codefendants for the purpose of carrying on business, and therefore was not a partner with them. If this be true, it is equally true that W. S. Bacon was not a partner in the business; for it clearly appears by the contract that W. S. Bacon made no investment of capital in the business, that he was to receive a daily wage for his work, and that he had no share in the profits. All of the essential facts necessary to make Frank P. Bacon a member of the partnership, if any partnership existed, are found in this contract. Frank P. Bacon was to make an initial investment in the business and to make continuing investments therein to cover operating expenses as the business progressed, and was to have all of the profits other than the share belonging to W. F. James. Although nominally W. S. Bacon was engaging with James in the described business, the real partner was Frank P. Bacon.

The decision above indicated on the question stated is sufficient to dispose of the case, and the other questions presented need not be considered further than to suggest that, if there was no partnership between the parties in the strict sense of that word, then the evidence is sufficient to sustain the court's finding that the goods were sold and delivered "to the said three defendants and each of them," and to warrant the court in holding all of them liable as principals by whom the account was incurred.

The judgment is affirmed.

LEWIS v. TANNER et al. (Civ. 3348.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 14, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations ⊂706(3)—Burden on defendant automobilist to establish defense of contributory negligence.

In an action by a pedestrian for personal injuries received in a collision with defendant's automobile, the burden of establishing contributory negligence rests upon the defendant.

2. Municipal corporations ⊂706(7) — Contributory negligence of pedestrian, run down by automobile, held for jury.

In an action by a pedestrian for personal injuries received when he was run down by defendant's automobile, which the evidence tended to show was running at an unlawful rate of speed on the wrong side of the street, whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in not seeing or hearing defendant's automobile held for the jury.

3. Negligence ⊂136(8)—Question for jury.

Even though the facts are undisputed, if reasonable minds might draw different conclusions on the question of negligence, the question is one of fact for the jury.

4. Municipal corporations ⊂705(10)—Pedestrian has right to assume that no automobiles are on wrong side of street.

A pedestrian, crossing a street after passing its center, has the right to assume a zone free from automobiles coming from the left.

5. Trial ⊂260(1) — No prejudice resulting from refusal to give instruction covered.

No prejudice could result from the failure of the court to give requested instructions, the substance of which was elsewhere given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Burbank E. Lewis against Charles C. Tanner and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert and Stannard A. McNeil, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Charles E. Williams and Robertson Abbot, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In this action plaintiff sought recovery of damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by colliding with an automobile, which defendant negligently operated upon a street at a point where the former was crossing. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals.

[1-4] While conceding his own negligence, appellant insists that his plea of contributory negligence, of which he alleged plaintiff guilty, was clearly established by the evidence to the effect, as claimed, that plaintiff, while crossing the street, neglected to use proper precautions for his own safety, in that, conceding the automobile was running on the wrong side of the street and at an unlawful speed, plaintiff might have heard the same and could have seen it, had he looked in the direction from which it was approaching. As we gather from the record, and in the absence of any statement as to the existing conditions made by counsel for either party, it appears that the accident occurred on Colorado boulevard, which extends east and west and, measured between curb lines, is 80 feet in width. At the time in question, about 6:10 p. m., November 21st, plaintiff, after looking in both directions and finding the street free from travel, stepped from the curb on the southerly side and proceeded to cross the street diagonally, going in a northeasterly direction. Before he reached the opposite side he was struck by defendant's car, which at the time was being operated at a speed of some 38 miles per hour. Not only was the speed thus unlawful, but there is testimony and circumstantial evidence tending strongly to show that the car was running on the left side of the street near the curb line, and struck plaintiff after he had passed the center of the street, as a result of which he had little recollection of the occurrence, other than that, immediately upon his sensing a bright light, which was that upon a car some 500 feet back of that which caused the injury, and a dim light, with which latter it appears defendant's car was equipped, he was rendered unconscious. Indeed, the occurrence was so sudden that plaintiff from his personal knowledge could not say he was struck by an automobile. This evidence, together with testimony not spoken, but indicated by designations upon a map of the street and vicinity used at the trial, which, in so far as not inconsistent with the record, must, since the burden of establishing the defense rested upon defendant, and in the absence of such map not brought up or presented, be considered favorable to the plaintiff, amply justified the implied finding of the jury that the automobile, when it collided with plaintiff, was not only being run at an unlawful speed, but operated on the left side of the street, without any reason therefor, which act was likewise unlawful. Section 20 (a) of Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1919, p. 215).

Notwithstanding such facts being established, appellant insists that plaintiff must be deemed chargeable with negligence because, although he did look for cars proceeding west on the right side of the center of the street, he failed to keep a watchful eye to his rear and left for the approach of cars which might thus unlawfully be operated on that side of the center of the street, and, had he done so, the accident might not have happened. In other words, he should have anticipated defendant's unlawful act. In support of this contention he cites several authorities, in all of which the circumstances were different from those here involved and were in affirmance of judgments by the trial court. Thus, in Moss v. Boynton Co., 186 Pac. 631, the plaintiff was injured immediately upon stepping off of the curb and colliding with an automobile which was traveling at a lawful speed upon the side of the street to which it was entitled. And in Sheldon v. James, 175 Cal. 474, 166 Pac. 8, 2 A. L. R. 1493, the automobile was on the side of the street to which it was entitled, and, while backing into a parking position at the curb, as it was entitled to do, collided with plaintiff and injured him. In both of these cases the circumstances were such that the plaintiff should, as a reasonably prudent man, have anticipated the peril of his position. Not so in the instant case, where, when struck, plaintiff had reached what he had a right to assume, and was, except for defendant's unlawful act, a zone of safety and free from automobiles on that side of the street coming from the direction defendant was traveling, and hence, under all the circumstances, he may be said to have acted with ordinary prudence and with such regard for his safety as a reasonably prudent man would act, and the application of this rule to the instant case is unaffected by the uncontradicted testimony of the driver of the car that, when operated, it made a whistling sound that was plainly audible. The jury might well have discredited such testimony, in view of the fact that, notwithstanding his car was badly battered and broken by the impact due to the collision, so that it had to be towed into a garage, the witness testified that he did not know a collision had occurred until thereafter made aware of it by the acts of others. As often said, even though the facts are undisputed, if reasonable minds might draw different conclusions upon the question of negligence, the question is one of fact for the jury, and its determination of the question will not be disturbed by an appellate court.

[5] What we have said is sufficient answer to appellant's complaint that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions to the jury. One of these was to the effect that, notwithstanding plaintiff had crossed the center of the street and reached a point therein upon which automobiles had no right to travel in the direction in which defendant was operating his car, nevertheless the duty devolved upon plaintiff, not only to look in the direction from which the car approached, but to continue to look for cars coming from that direction until he completed the crossing of the street, which instruction, for the reasons hereinbefore given, we hold inapplicable to the facts herein. As to the other requested instructions, the substance thereof was elsewhere given, and hence, conceding they embodied correct principle of law applicable to the case, no prejudice could result from the failure of the court to repeat them.

The judgment is affirmed.

MORGAN et al. v. ASHER. (Civ. 3430, L. A. 6158.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. Sept. 1, 1920. Rehearing Denied Oct. 1, 1920. Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing Oct. 28, 1920.)

1. Trusts ⟸30½(2) — Executrix, handling estate prior to death of deceased, trustee for heirs and legatees.

Where executrix, by reason of deceased husband's sickness, had control of his entire personal estate prior to his death, she occupied a more vital relation to heirs and legatees than merely that of the executrix of his estate, since, as she was trustee for her husband during his life and at the time of his death, immediately upon his death she became the trustee of all heirs or beneficiaries under the will, and it became the duty of such executrix to exercise the utmost good faith toward each and all of such persons, and, through the course of the probate of the estate, to make full disclosure as to the estate, and as to their rights.

2. Executors and administrators ⟸315(4)— Fraud of executrix held to entitle heirs and legatees to relief from the decree of distribution.

Where executrix, prior to death of husband, had control of his entire personal estate, and acted as his agent, and after his death concealed the personal property from the court, and thereby caused the whole of the estate to be distributed to her, she was guilty of extrinsic fraud, entitling heirs and legatees to relief from the decree of distribution.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

3. Executors and administrators ⟸516(2)— Reopening of account after settlement of estate same as for trustees in general.

Executrix holds property in a trust capacity for those entitled to it, and she must account for such property in such trust capacity, and to such accounting, to its settlement, and to the opening of the account after settlement, in order to charge her with additional property not accounted for by her, the principles apply which are applicable in the case of accounts of trustees in general.

4. Executors and administrators ⟸516(1)— Opening of decree of distribution held only incident to reopening of account of executrix.

In an action against an executrix to have it adjudged that she holds money and other property which was the property of her deceased husband as the trustee of the plaintiff, and that the same be applied to the payment of certain legacies, held really an action to reopen the settlement of the defendant's account and charge her with property, which she was alleged to have fraudulently failed to return, and that the reopening of the decree of distribution was but an incident.

5. Executors and administrators ⟸513(10)—Decree of distribution conclusive as to property properly chargeable against executrix.

The question as to what property was properly chargeable against executrix was concluded by a settlement of the accounts of the executrix, so far as heirs and legatees had information upon which they could make the issue, subject to the qualification that the heirs and legatees were not fraudulently prevented in some manner from raising the issue.

6. Appeal and error ⟸856(2)—Reversal for sustaining demurrer on erroneous ground, though demurrable on another ground.

Where trial court erroneously sustained a demurrer to a complaint on a certain specified ground, the order sustaining the demurrer will be reversed, although the complaint was open to demurrer in a particular to which attention was not called, either in the trial court or the appellate court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by Martha Morgan and others against Lizzie Asher. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appealed. Reversed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in the Supreme Court.

Davis & Rush and Earle & McLaughlin, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Nathan Newby, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in the defendant's favor after her demurrer to the fourth amended complaint of the plaintiffs had been sustained.

The defendant is the widow of one G. M. Asher, deceased, and the executrix of his last will. She is also the sole distributee of his estate under the decree of distribution made in the course of the probate of the decedent's said will and estate. The plaintiffs are relations of the said deceased in various degrees, the plaintiffs, Mrs. Martha Morgan and Mrs. T. S. Gibson, being his sisters, Mrs. Cynthia Hall and Mrs. Sarah Wilsey his nieces, Tyons Howard his nephew, and Mrs. Nancy Asher the wife of his brother, A. B. Asher. This action was instituted by these plaintiffs to have it adjudged that the said defendant holds certain money and other personal property, which was the separate property of her deceased husband, as the trustee of the plaintiffs, and that the same be applied to the payment of certain legacies to said plaintiffs and to certain other of his heirs and devisees under the terms of his said will.

The averments of the plaintiffs' fourth amended complaint set forth the facts upon which the plaintiffs predicate their demand for said relief, and these facts may be briefly summarized as follows: G. M. Asher at the time of and for several years prior to his death resided in the city of Los Angeles with his wife, Lizzie Asher, and he was then the owner of certain real and personal property, all of which the plaintiffs allege to have been the separate property and estate of said G. M. Asher prior to and at the time of his death, which occurred on or about March 4, 1915. For some time previous to his death G. M. Asher was in a feeble state of health, on account of which he was unable to look after and attend to his business as he had previously done, and that, owing to his sickness and ailments, his said wife had been given the care and management of all of his said property as his agent or employé, and that as such she had in her personal possession and control the whole of said property, and particularly the said personal property and estate of said G. M. Asher, which consisted chiefly of notes and bonds of a value in excess of $100,000. That said G. M. Asher left a last will and testament, by the terms of which he bequeathed to his said wife, Lizzie Asher, the sum of $80,000, to be first paid out of the funds and properties in his estate, and further bequeathed the sum of about $20,000 in the form of specific legacies directly or in trust to a number of his said relatives, including the plaintiffs herein, and also those several persons who are joined as parties defendant with the defendant herein. Certain of these legatees were his brothers and sisters, and were thus his heirs under the law of succession, as well as his legatees under the will. Certain others were nephews and nieces, among the latter of which was Hannah Asher, in trust for whom the said G. M. Asher bequeathed the sum of $1,000 to his said wife, Lizzie Asher, to be held by the latter in such trust until said Hannah Asher reached the age of 21 years, the said Lizzie Asher being in the meantime nominated in said will to act as her guardian without bond, The will provided that these legacies should abate in the event that his estate was found to be worth less than $80,000, in which event the whole of his said estate was to be devoted to the payment of the bequest of $80,000 to his said wife.

The plaintiffs further allege that, upon the death of said G. M. Asher, and while said Lizzie Asher was in possession and control of the whole of his property and estate as aforesaid, and was also possessed of full knowledge that the same and the whole thereof was the separate property and estate of her said husband, and was of a value in excess of $100,000, and that these plaintiffs and also those other persons who were named in said will as legatees and who are joined with the defendant herein as defendants were and each of them was entitled to the several legacies to be paid to them and each of them according to the terms of said will, she formed the purpose of fraudulently deceiving the court within which the said last will and testament was to be offered for probate, and within which the said estate of said decedent was to be probated, and that in pursuance of said fraudulent intent she concealed from said court during the entire course of the probate of said will and of said estate the fact that said decedent had or left at the time of his death any property whatever other than the said piece of real property, which was of the value of about $6,000, and that in returning her inventory of said estate and also in her account and petition for distribution therein, she falsely and fraudulently represented to said court that the said piece of real estate was community property of the value aforesaid, and that her deceased husband had no property or interest in any property other than said real estate, and that she purposely and falsely and fraudulently, and with intent to deceive said court and to defraud the aforesaid legatees of said decedent out of their portion of said estate, failed to set forth or disclose in any of said proceedings, and particularly in the final account and petition for distribution therein, the existence of the said personal property of said decedent, or the fact that the same was a portion of his estate, and that the said court in the course of the probate of said estate, and being deceived and misled by the said defendant's fraudulent acts and practices, distributed the entire estate of said decedent to said defendant, Lizzie Asher, to the exclusion of all the aforesaid heirs and legatees of said deceased; that at and during the whole period of the probate of said estate each and all of the said plaintiffs and legatees, other than said Lizzie Asher, were nonresidents of the state of California and were absent therefrom, and were residents of various other states of the United States, and that none of them had any notice or knowledge of the aforesaid false and fraudulent acts of said defendant, Lizzie Asher, and particularly of her filing of said false and fraudulent account and petition for distribution or of the contents thereof, or of the hearing thereon; and that in consequence thereof said plaintiffs were not present or represented at said hearing nor in the making or filing of said decree of distribution whereby the said defendant, Lizzie Asher, was given the whole of her deceased husband's property and estate. The plaintiffs further allege that after said decree of distribution had become final they became advised of the true state of facts and of the fraud practiced by the said defendant, Lizzie Asher, upon said legatees of her deceased husband, and that upon coming into possession of such knowledge they instituted the present action, seeking the relief set forth in the prayer to their said fourth amended complaint, or such other or further relief in equity as should be meet in the premises.

The demurrer of said defendant, Lizzie Asher, to said fourth amended complaint was sustained by the trial court, and from the judgment thereon the said plaintiffs have prosecuted this appeal.

The sole question presented for determination upon this appeal is as to whether or not the aforesaid acts and conduct of the respondent herein—which for the purposes of the demurrer were conceded to be fraudulent throughout—constituted such extrinsic fraud as would be sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs herein to relief in a court of equity. The position of the respondent herein is that her said fraud, conceived prior to and persisted in during the course of probate of her husband's estate, was intrinsic fraud; and that being so, and the appellants herein having been admittedly given constructive notice of every step in the course of the probate of said estate through the publication and posting of the several notices required by law to be published or posted during the course of the administration of estates, and the court having thereby acquired jurisdiction, not only over the probate of said estate, but over the plaintiffs and all other persons having or claiming, either as heirs or legatees of said decedent, an interest therein, the said plaintiffs are now precluded by the finality of the decree of distribution in said estate from seeking or obtaining relief in a court of equity.

In making this contention the respondent strongly relies upon the cases of Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 25 Pac. 970, 27 Pac. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159; Fealey v. Fealey, 104 Cal. 354, 38 Pac. 49, 43 Am. St. Rep. 111; The William Hill Co. v. Lawler, 116 Cal. 359, 48 Pac. 323; Crew v. Pratt, 119 Cal. 139, 51 Pac. 38; Mulcahey v. Dow, 131 Cal. 73, 63 Pac. 158.

We have carefully examined the foregoing line of authorities and many others to which our attention has been directed in the course of this inquiry; but these have not satisfied us that the fraudulent designs and actions of the respondent herein, conceived and carried into effect prior to and during the course of probate of the estate of her deceased husband, were such as to constitute merely intrinsic fraud, from the effect of which these appellants were not entitled to relief in a court of equity.

[1] It is to be noted herein that the respondent is not shown to have occupied, with reference to the heirs and devisees of her deceased husband, merely the position and attitude of an executrix of his estate. As such executrix she probably, under some of the authorities relied upon by the respondent, owed to the said heirs and legatees of said deceased no other or further duty than that of giving them such notices of the various steps in the course of the probate of the estate of said decedent as are required to be given by law. But the said respondent, according to the averments of the plaintiffs' fourth amended complaint, is shown to have occupied another and more vital relation to these heirs and legatees of her husband than merely that of the executrix of his estate. She is averred to have occupied toward her said husband during the latter days of his lifetime and up to the date of his death the position of his agent, intrusted by him with the exclusive custody and control of the whole of his real and personal property, and particularly of that most important portion thereof which consisted of bonds and other securities of the value of at least one hundred thousand dollars. As to these latter properties she was his trustee, as such agent, at the time of his death, and immediately upon his death she became the trustee of all those persons who, either as heirs or legatees, were entitled to share in his said estate by virtue of this relationship or under the provisions of his will.

In addition to this trust imposed upon the respondent by the fact of her husband's death, and which antedated the presentation of his will for probate, the respondent was also made by the terms of said will the trustee of a certain legacy given to one Hannah Asher, and was nominated in said will as the guardian of said Hannah Asher during the period of her minority. In her capacity as the said trustee of each and all of these beneficiaries, and particularly as the guardian of said minor, it became and was the duty of said respondent to have exercised the utmost good faith toward each and all of said persons in relation to the extent and nature of her deceased husband's property and estate. It was her duty, not only during and through the course of the probate of said estate to make full disclosure to the court and to these several parties as to the nature, extent, and character of said estate; but, independent of and apart from such probate proceedings, it was her further duty to see to it that those several persons entitled to their distributive share in said estate were fully informed as to their rights in the premises, to the end that said rights might be fully protected in the distribution of said estate.

[2] We are of the opinion that in respect of the aforesaid duties of said respondent and of their alleged breach on her part the case of Sohler v. Sohler, 135 Cal. 323, 67 Pac. 282, 87 Am. St. Rep. 98, is to be given application to the facts of this case. In that case the defendant complained of was shown to have occupied, not merely the relation to the plaintiffs therein of executrix of the estate in question, but she occupied the further relation of mother and natural guardian of the plaintiffs in the case, who were entitled as the children of her deceased husband to certain distributive shares in his estate. Her fraud consisted in certain false and fraudulent representations made to the court in the course of the distribution of said estate, by which the plaintiffs therein were prevented from receiving such shares. The Supreme Court, while fully recognizing the rule that intrinsic fraud was not such fraud as equity would relieve against, proceeded to say:

"But when we come to scan the allegations of this complaint, it will be discovered that there is more alleged than the mere procurement of this decree by false evidence. The executrix of the estate was not alone the trustee of all of the heirs of the estate and of all the parties in interest thereto and thereunder. She was the mother of these minor plaintiffs, had their actual custody and control, and, as their natural guardian, was chargeable with all the high duties pertaining to that relationship. As executrix merely, it might be argued that she was a disinterested party, having no concern whatsoever in the question of heirship or right of distribution, standing indifferent between the parties, and interested only in carrying into effect the determination of the court upon these questions. But, as the mother and natural guardian of these plaintiffs, her position was a very different one. She was under most solemn obligation to protect the legal rights of her infant and dependent offspring. She was under like obligation to disclose to the court, on their behalf and in their interest, all knowledge which she possessed, and she was under the same obligation to see that their legal claims to the estate were properly presented before the court in probate. * * *"

And the Supreme Court holds that her failure to perform the duties imposed upon her by the aforesaid relationships constituted extrinsic fraud which entitled the plaintiffs to relief in a court of equity. We are of the opinion that the same situation is presented in the instant case; and that the fraud of the respondent herein in failing to apprise the parties plaintiff in this case and the other heirs and legatees of her deceased husband, who are also parties hereto by being made codefendants with her therein, as to the existence of the large amount of personal property of her deceased husband of which at the time of his death she was his agent and thereafter their trustee, and her further failure to keep them informed as to the status of their rights during the course of the probate of the estate, and of her especial failure to set forth their respective claims and rights in her petition for distribution of said estate, and the fraud, deception, and concealment which she thereby practiced upon said court and upon each of them in causing the whole of said estate to be distributed to herself, must be held to have been extrinsic fraud, entitling said plaintiffs to the relief from the effects of said decree which they are now seeking in a court of equity. Sohler v. Sohler, supra; Aldrich v. Barton, 138 Cal. 220, 71 Pac. 169, 94 Am. St. Rep. 43.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to overrule the said defendant's demurrer and require said defendant to answer the averments of the plaintiffs' fourth amended complaint.

I concur: WASTE, P. J.

WELCH, Judge pro tem. I concur in the conclusion of Mr. Justice RICHARDS, and particularly in that portion of the opinion holding that the defendant was at the time of the death of her husband a trustee of plaintiffs, and that she now holds the property of the estate in trust. I am inclined to hold to the opinion that all the personal property of the estate was never administered upon. The executrix of the estate was interested in the property of the estate. She chose to present to the court for administration one piece of property only. In her final account and petition for distribution she stated and under oath verified:

"The entire estate of said deceased now in the hands of said executrix consists of the following [then follows a description of the piece of real estate, the only property inventoried and the only property mentioned anywhere in any of the proceedings of the estate]."

And in this same final account and petition she alleges and verifies:

"That the only property belonging to said deceased at the time of his death was the home place, being community property [and again describing the $6,500 piece of realty, the only property mentioned in the estate], * * * and all said property belonging to said estate shall be distributed to her [the defendant]."

Again, in the same final account and petition, she stated under oath that there are "no moneys or funds or personal property belonging to said deceased; 'that the estate to be distributed consists of' [again describing the before-mentioned lot of real estate]."

The decree of distribution ordered, adjudged, and decreed:

"That said Lizzie Asher, as such executrix, has in her possession belonging to said estate * * * a balance of $6,500, which consists of the real property hereinafter described, * * * and that by operation of law and in pursuance of and according to the provisions of the last will and testament of said deceased, the aforesaid balance of real estate hereinafter described and all other property belonging to said estate, whether described herein or not, is distributed as follows."

The defendant is named as the sole distributee, and the property specifically described is the same property inventoried and none other. In reference to the personal property of a value of more than $100,000 the plaintiffs, in paragraph 13 of their fourth amended complaint, seem to seek to have this property impressed with a trust independent of the administration of said estate. The paragraph reads as follows:

"Plaintiffs are informed and believe, and upon such information and belief aver the truth to be, that all of the said property mentioned in paragraph 6 hereof is now, and ever since the death of George M. Asher has been, in the hands of defendant Lizzie Asher, and this is the same property that was owned, possessed, and controlled by George M. Asher as his sole and separate property at the date of his death, and that the same was never scheduled or accounted for in any way as the property of said decedent, and said Lizzie Asher now holds said property as trustee for the benefit of plaintiffs to the extent of said abovementioned legacies, payable to each of them, and that the total value of said property so held by defendant Lizzie Asher, as before stated, is in excess of the sum of $100,000."

Under the caption, "The complaint does not state a cause of action also because it does not show injury to the appellants," the respondent argues that, inasmuch as the court found that "the property of said estate to be community property," the plaintiffs are not injured, even if defendant did deceive the court and defraud, or attempt to defraud, the plaintiffs by withholding the main body of the estate from specific administration. They reason that since plaintiffs were to receive their legacies from an excess over $80,000 and not otherwise, the allegations of the complaint show that the whole value of the estate was about $100,000, and, the court having found that the property of the estate was community property, it would leave only about $50,000 in value subject to testamentary disposition.

The portion of the decree above quoted is found in the recitals of the decree. Even if we consider such recital as an adjudication of the fact, such a judgment applies to the specific property before the court. The trial court in all of its adjudications in the matter of this estate had but one piece of property before it, and it was passing judgment on that one piece alone. It may well be that the home place was community property, and all other property not administered upon was separate property. To hold that all of the property belonging to the deceased in this case under the allegations of the pleadings of plaintiffs was distributed to defendant under the general clause of the decree would certainly be placing a high premium upon fraud. For the express purpose of defrauding the legatees named in her husband's will she withheld the property from administration. She intended the court to believe, and the court did believe, that there was no other property than the lot of real estate hereinbefore mentioned. The court on the face of the decree, where it found that said property was "the property of said estate * * * so far as the same is known," was dealing with and passing judgment upon that piece, and that piece alone. Section 1698 of the Code of Civil Procedure implies that administration of a part of an estate, such as disclosed here, is not exclusive and complete. The property not administered upon, and which by the majority opinion is held in trust for the appellants, may be considered as property discovered after the final settlement, and therefore subject to be administered upon under a subsequent issue of letters testamentary.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [3, 4] In denying the petition for rehearing, there is one point not touched upon in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, of which we would speak. The defendant, as executrix of her husband's will, held the property of the estate in a trust capacity for those finally entitled to it. That property she was required to account for in that trust capacity. To such accounting, to its settlement, and to the reopening of the account after settlement in order to charge her with additional property not accounted for by her, the principles apply which are applicable in the case of accounts of trustees in general. These are the principles applicable in the present case. The respondent, however, if not the appellants as well, treats the case as one of reopening a decree of distribution. It may be that in one sense, but the decree of distribution under the will in the present case was dependent upon and was determined by the amount of property for which the defendant was held accountable upon the final settlement of her accounts as executrix. The present action is therefore really one to reopen the settlement of the defendant's account, and charge her with property which she is alleged to have fraudulently failed to return. The reopening of the decree of distribution is but an incident of the reopening of the account by which the decree of distribution was determined. The principles applicable are therefore, as we have said, those applicable to the reopening of the account of a trustee after final judicial settlement.

[5] Applying those principles, the complaint in the present case is defective in a particular not noticed apparently by the counsel. It does not allege that the plaintiffs at the time of the settlement of the defendant's account were unaware of the existence as a part of the testator's estate of the property with which they now seek to charge the defendant. The defendant's application for the settlement of her account directly put in issue, as between herself and the beneficiaries for whom she was acting, among whom were the plaintiffs, the question as to what property was properly chargeable against her, and the question was concluded by the settlement of the accounts so far as the plaintiffs had information upon which they could make the issue. This last statement is subject to the qualification, of course, that the plaintiffs were not fraudulently prevented in some manner from raising the issue, but this element does not seem to be present in the case at bar. The case is one in which the beneficiaries of a trust merely refrain from taking any part in the settlement of the trustee's account. Their so absenting themselves cannot affect the conclusive nature of the settlement of the account as to any issue involved which they might have raised and contested if present. But, on the other hand, whether present and participating in the settlement or not, the settlement is not conclusive against a charge of fraud upon an issue which the plaintiffs could not have raised. Such fraud is "extrinsic" to the proceeding. There is, as we have said, no allegation in the present complaint that the plaintiffs were unaware of the property in question as a part of the testator's estate, and in the absence of such an allegation there is nothing to show that the plaintiffs were not in a position to present the claim that it was such property.

[6] While the complaint was open to demurrer in the particular mentioned, yet it is a particular to which attention was not called either in this court or in the district court. It would not be just under the circumstances that the judgment on demurrer be sustained without the plaintiffs' having an opportunity to amend the complaint if they can do so by averment in accordance with the fact. We therefore concur in the order of reversal by the District Court of Appeal.

MARIN WATER & POWER CO. v. TOWN OF SAUSALITO. (Civ. 3395; S. F. 9003.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 26, 1920. Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank, Denying Hearing, Oct. 25, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations ⊂=57—Proprietary and not governmental power exercised in administering water system.

In administering such a public utility as a water system, a municipality is engaged in the exercise of proprietary rather than governmental power.

2. Execution ⊂=27—Right of municipal corporation to distribute water not a "franchise," subject to execution.

The right of a municipality to distribute water derived from its waterworks to its customers, and to make charges therefor, is not a "franchise," within Civ. Code, §§ 388, 389, providing for sale of franchises under execution.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Franchise.]

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

3. Municipal corporations ⊂=1038—Waterworks property owned by municipal corporation not subject to sale under execution.

Property which a municipal corporation holds for the purpose of exercising its governmental powers, or for the purpose of exercising its constitutional power to operate waterworks to supply its inhabitants with water, or other like public purposes, is not subject to execution; but property which it holds merely as a proprietor, devoting it to no use of a public character, such as lands acquired or held for other than public purposes, and not in trust for public use, are subject to execution, unless some statutory or constitutional provision forbids it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Action by the Marin Water & Power Company against the Town of Sausalito. From an order recalling and quashing writs of execution against defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Lilienthal, McKinstry & Raymond, of San Francisco, for appellant.

O. F. Meldon, of Sausalito, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from an order of the trial court, recalling and quashing certain writs of execution, and the levies made thereunder, which had been caused to be issued by the plaintiff upon a money judgment obtained by it against the town of Sausalito, a municipal corporation, and which under the plaintiff's direction the sheriff had undertaken to levy upon the plant and waterworks owned and operated by the defendant as such municipal corporation for the purpose of supplying water to the town and people of Sausalito, and also upon the so-called franchise of the said defendant to use the streets and highways of such town for such purpose, and to sell such water to the inhabitants of Sausalito and its vicinity, and to charge and collect tolls therefor.

The sole question presented upon the hearing of this matter in the trial court and upon this appeal is as to whether the municipally owned waterworks of said defendant and its so-called franchise for supplying water to its people can be made the subject of levy and sale upon execution issued on a money judgment obtained against said municipality. The trial court determined this contention adversely to the plaintiff, and we are asked to reverse its order made in that regard upon this appeal.

[1] In support of its contention the appellant urges that, in undertaking to acquire and operate a municipal waterworks system, the town of Sausalito is undertaking to act not in a governmental, but in a proprietary, capacity, and that since it is so engaged in acting it stands in respect to its liability for its debts, and also in respect to the means for the enforcement of such liability, in the same position as a private corporation would stand if engaged in a similar enterprise. In making this contention the appellant strongly relies on the cases of Davoust v. City of Alameda, 149 Cal. 70, 84 Pac. 760, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 536, 9 Ann. Cas. 847, South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land Co., 152 Cal. 593, 93 Pac. 490, and Marin Water & Power Co. v. Town of Sausalito, 168 Cal. 587, 143 Pac. 767. It may not be denied that in each of these cases and in respect to the questions presented for determination therein the Supreme Court has committed itself to the proposition that in administering such a public utility as a water system a muncipality is engaged in the exercise of proprietary rather than governmental powers, and hence that it may become liable in damages, for example, for injuries caused through the negligence of its servants in the operation of such a utility, when it would not otherwise be responsible for the acts of its servants while occupied in the administration of governmental powers.

We are constrained, therefore, to accept the distinction which the Supreme Court has thus made between the governmental and proprietary functions of municipalities, although in doing so we are disposed to give our approval to that portion of the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Shaw in the case of Davoust v. City of Alameda, supra, in which such a distinction is declared to be wholly fictitious, and apt to produce embarrassing consequences, if extended and applied to other cases than those then before that court.

We also desire to approve and adopt the language of Mr. Justice Shaw in the case of City of Pasadena v. Railroad Commission of the State of California, 192 Pac. 25, decided August 12, 1920, and not yet [officially] reported, wherein the learned justice says:

"It is not true that a city is a private corporation when carrying on a municipally owned public utility. No decision so holds. All the decisions on the subject recognize the fact that a city does not change its character by engaging in such enterprises. The entire course of reasoning in the opinions is founded on the postulate that such city retains its character as a municipal corporation, and the burden of the arguments consists of efforts to find reasons for holding it liable to the same extent as a private corporation engaged in the same service, notwithstanding the fact that the city carries on the business as a municipal corporation. They all assume that such city is as much a municipal corporation with respect to such business functions as it is with regard to the exercise of its purely governmental powers. The distinction does not go to its character as a corporation, but to its liabilities when exercising one class of its powers, as compared to its liabilities in the exercise of its functions as a local governmental agency."

We think the foregoing language may be given pertinent application to the questions presented upon this appeal, since the effect thereof is to determine that a municipality operating a municipally owned water system is not the less a public corporation while engaged in the exercise of its powers. This being true, we are confronted with the question as to whether or not a strictly public or municipal corporation, owning and operating its own waterworks and system for supplying itself and its inhabitants with water under the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution and by the Municipal Corporations Act (Laws 1883, p. 93), under which it is organized, can have its said waterworks and system seized and taken from it under a writ of execution, and be thus deprived of the right which it thus possesses and exercises to supply its inhabitants with water. We are of the opinion that this cannot be done, that the sections of the Code giving creditors of corporations the right to enforce their judgments by means of writs of execution have reference to private and not public corporations, and that a public corporation does not become a private corporation when it undertakes to exercise such proprietary functions as the establishment and operation of such public utilities as waterworks or light works or other activities of a like character. In the case of People ex rel., etc., v. San Joaquin Agricultural Ass'n, 151 Cal. 797, 91 Pac. 740, it was held that the property of a district agricultural association, while engaged in carrying on the public functions and activities for which it was organized under the laws of the state, could not be taken by means of a writ of execution in the absence of an express statute authorizing such a levy.

In the case of Tulare Irrigation District v. Collins, 154 Cal. 440, 97 Pac. 1124, it was held that an irrigation district, organized under the statutes authorizing the formation and conduct of such districts, was a public corporation holding and using its property as such for a public use, and that its said property, while so devoted to such use, could not be made the subject of such levy and sale upon execution at the instance of a private creditor. To like effect is Denicke v. Santa Clara Agricultural Ass'n, 9 Cal. App. 228, 98 Pac. 687.

We are satisfied that a like reasoning is to be applied to the facts of the case at bar. The town of Sausalito, as a public corporation, is engaged through its waterworks and system in administering a public use under the express authority of the Constitution and of the Municipal Corporations Act under which it was organized. To permit a private creditor of such public corporation to levy an execution upon its said property while so devoted to public use would be in effect to permit such private creditor by such means to nullify the provisions of the Constitution which invest it with such powers and terms of the Municipal Corporations Act by virtue of which it is undertaking to exercise the same.

[2] It is further contended by the appellant herein that the right which the defendant as a municipal corporation possesses to distribute the water derived from its waterworks by means of its distributing system to its customers, the water users of said town and its vicinity, and to make charges therefor, is a franchise, which may be seized and sold under execution under sections 388 and 389 of the Civil Code. While it may be conceded that the grant to a private corporation of the right to exercise such functions as that of supplying water to a body of customers for a consideration in the way of tolls would be a franchise under the accepted definition of that term, we do not think such definition is to be extended to similar powers and activities, when the same are being exercised by a public corporation by virtue of the powers possessed by it under the Constitution and laws of the state. It is true that in one of the cases from which excerpts were quoted in the case of Davoust v. City of Alameda, supra, similar proprietary functions of a municipality were referred to as a franchise; but we do not understand that the Supreme Court of this state became thus committed to such an extended definition of that term. Nor do we think it can be rightly extended to such powers and functions when exercised by a public corporation within the domain of its sovereignty and under the authority and powers with which it is invested as such public corporation by the Constitution and laws of the state. Neither do we think that sections 388 and 389 of the Civil Code can be held to have application to such public uses, for the reason that to permit the right of a city or town to deliver water or light, or any like commodity to its inhabitants, to be made the subject of sale under execution at the instance of a private creditor would be to not only interfere and destroy its exercise of this public use, but would amount to its transfer through such sale to private persons, contrary to the Constitution and legislative intent by which such corporations were invested with the powers to establish municipal waterworks and similar public utilities and to serve their people with these commodities. It seems clear that these rights of the municipality, whether properly designated as a franchise or not, cannot be made the subject of a sale.

For the foregoing reasons, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: WASTE, P. J.; WELCH, Judge pro tem.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank, Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [3] In denying a rehearing in this case we think it proper to say that we do not entirely approve the reasoning of the opinion of the District Court. A city is never other than a public corporation, whether exercising its governmental powers, or other powers, in the operation of public utilities, or acting in the quiescent state of a property owner. The fact that it is a public corporation does not determine the question whether or not its property is subject to execution. The true rule is that the property which it holds for the purpose of exercising its governmental powers or for the purpose of exercising its constitutional power to operate waterworks to supply its inhabitants with water or other like public purposes is not subject to execution; the reason being that to subject it to sale would interfere with the exercise by the city of some of the powers for which it was organized. On the other hand, property which it holds merely as a proprietor, devoting it to no use of a public character, such as lands acquired or held for other than public purposes and not in trust for public use, is subject to execution, unless some statutory or constitutional provision forbids it. Holladay v. Frisbie, 15 Cal. 630; Wheeler v. Miller, 16 Cal. 124. The property here proposed to be taken in execution was used for public purposes and was necessary therefor, and hence it comes within the classes first described.

MITCHELL v. HENRY et al. (L. A. 6272.)

Municipal corporations ⊜29(4)—Annexation of territory to city of sixth class valid, though annexed territory was part of other school districts.

Annexation of territory to a city of the sixth class under St. 1913, p. 587, held valid, though annexed territory was a part of both a common school district and a high school district of which such city was not a part, notwithstanding Pol. Code, § 1576, providing that territory within the city of the sixth class shall not be in more than one school district, since such statute, whether construed applicable only to the matter of forming school districts, or construed to take annexed territory from school district of which it was a part ipso facto on annexation thereof, would not affect validity of annexation.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Petition by Robert H. Mitchell for writ of review to review acts and proceedings of C. H. Henry and others, trustees of the City of Glendale, in annexing certain territory to such City. Writ denied, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Anderson & Anderson and Victor T. Watkins, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Evans, Abbott & Pearce and W. E. Evans, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. The city of Glendale, by proceedings completed in the spring of 1919, endeavored to annex unto itself certain adjacent unincorporated territory. The petitioner in the court below and the appellant here owned land in the annexed district, and after the completion of the annexation proceedings sought to have them annulled by writ of review from the superior court. The writ was denied him, and he appeals.

Objection is made at the outset by the respondents that the annexation proceedings cannot now be annulled upon certiorari, since the writ was sought only after the annexation, or purported annexation, was complete. But this objection we need not consider in view of the conclusion we have reached that no grounds exist for declaring the annexation invalid either upon certiorari or otherwise. Apparently contention was made in the lower court that while the annexation proceedings were taken under the statute of June 11, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 587), providing for the annexation of inhabited territory, the territory annexed was, in fact, uninhabited. The lower court, however, found that the territory was inhabited, and the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain this finding is not attacked. With this objection removed, there is no contention that the proceedings taken did not in all respects meet the requirements of the annexation statute.

Before this court the sole contention of the petitioner is that the annexation is invalid because it would result in a violation of the provisions of section 1576, Political Code, with reference to school districts. It seems that the city of Glendale is a city of the sixth class, and that the annexed territory was a part of both a common school district and a high school district of which Glendale is not a part. The result of the annexation will be that, if the annexed territory remains a part of the school districts of which it was formerly a part, the city of Glendale will as to part of its territory be within one school district, and as to part be within another. This result, it is claimed, is in violation of the section of the Political Code mentioned, the material portion of which reads:

"Every city or incorporated town, except cities * * * of the sixth class, unless subdivided by the legislative authority thereof, shall constitute a separate school district: * * * Provided, however, that in no instance shall the territory within an incorporated city of the sixth class be in more than one school district."

The prohibitory proviso just quoted was added to the Code by amendment in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 208), while the annexation statute was passed in 1913, and the contention of the petitioner is that the Code section had the effect of impliedly repealing the annexation statute, or, more accurately, of amending it, so that it does not apply in any case where the territory sought to be annexed to a city of the sixth class is a part of a school district of which the city is not a part. In fact, if the petitioner's contention be correct, we cannot stop with an implied amendment of this particular annexation statute, but must extend the amendment to all annexation statutes applicable to cities of the sixth class. Not only this, but we must extend it to the statutes for the incorporation of such cities in the first instance, so that no city of the sixth class may be formed whose proposed territory is not at the time wholly within a single school district. These are rather remarkable results. The Code section is concerned only with school districts. It does not purport to touch upon and be concerned with the matter of incorporating cities or annexing territories to them. When it was amended it was certainly not contemplated that the statutes upon these wholly distinct matters were likewise being amended. That result can be justified only in case there is no reasonable construction which can be given the Code section as amended which will avoid it. But there are at least two constructions of this character which, it seems to us, can be given the section.

In the first place, the section, as we have said, is concerned and purports to deal only with the matter of school districts. In view of this it is reasonable to conclude that the prohibition it contains against more than one school district in a city of the sixth class is limited to the matter of forming school districts, is a prohibition on the creation of more than one school district in such a city, and does not extend to a forbidding of the creation or extension of a city when such creation or extension will happen to have the purely incidental effect of causing the territory of the city to be divided between two school districts.

In the second place, a not unreasonable construction of the Code section is that by it the annexed territory is upon annexation ipso facto taken out from the school district of which it was before a part and made a part of the district of which the city is either the whole or a part. This, in fact, would seem to be the probable effect in the case of the annexation of territory to a city other than one of the sixth class. Such cities have each as a part of its municipal organization a school department. Even in the absence of any express statute on the matter, it would seem likely on the principle declared in Petition of East Fruitvale Sanitary District, 158 Cal. 453, 111 Pac. 368, that it would not be permitted that the municipal school organization and an entirely distinct school organization should both function within the same municipality at the same time, and that the annexed territory by virtue of the mere fact of its annexation would pass under the jurisdiction of the municipal school department. It would seem probable that this would also follow from the language of the Code section under consideration that—

"Every city * * * except cities * * * of the sixth class * * * shall constitute a separate school district."

It may be said that the reason for the distinction which the portion of the section just quoted makes between cities of the sixth class and others is that the former do not have school departments as parts of their organizations, and that for this reason likewise the rule of the Sanitary District Case mentioned would not apply to such cities. This is true, but it might well be replied that the prohibition of the section on a city of the sixth class being in more than one school district means that nevertheless the same rule shall apply as to it, so that when territory is annexed to it it follows as an incident that the territory becomes a part of the same school district as the city.

As between the two possible constructions which we have discussed, it is not necessary to decide which is the correct one. The question has not been argued, and it is possible that there is still some other construction which is preferable to either. It is sufficient for the disposition of this case that either of the two discussed, which limit in a not unreasonable manner the effect of the Code section to the matter with which the section deals, that of school districts, is preferable in our judgment to the construction necessarily advocated by the petitioner which would extend that effect to the very different matter of the creation and extension of municipalities.

Judgment affirmed.

CITY INV. CO. v. PRINGLE et al.
(Civ. 3510.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 23, 1920.)

1. Costs ⊂=3—Right to costs purely statutory.

The right to allowance of costs is purely statutory.

2. Costs ⊂=172—Attorney's fees based upon contracts not taxable as costs.

Where right to attorney's fee is based upon contract and not upon statutes, recovery, if at all, must be had upon that contract, and such fees cannot be taxed as costs under Code Civ. Proc. § 1021.

3. Costs ⊂=172—Party not entitled to attorney's fees under contract unless attorney is employed.

The object of a provision for attorney's fees in a contract is to reimburse a party for sums he pays or becomes liable to pay as attorney's fees; and, where a party has not paid attorney's fees or has not become liable therefor, he is not entitled to any.

4. Costs ⊂=203—Waived by failure to file memoranda.

Parties waived their costs through failure to file memoranda of costs.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by the City Investment Company, a corporation, against Edward J. Pringle and Sydney J. Pringle, as executors of the last will and testament of William B. Pringle, deceased, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed, and cause remanded.

Charles S. Wheeler, John F. Bowie, and Nathan Moran, all of San Francisco (A. A. Heer, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Charles A. Christin and Hutchinson, Van Fleet & Christin, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

KINSELL, Judge pro tem. Action was brought to recover unpaid rent and possession of certain real property. Demurrer to complaint was sustained. Amended complaint was filed, and defendants, Edward J. Pringle and Sydney J. Pringle, as executors of the last will and testament of William B. Pringle, deceased, moved to strike out the same. This motion was granted. Thereafter, before any further pleadings were filed, appellant filed a voluntary dismissal of the action, which was duly entered.

Defendant executors then filed a memorandum of costs, claiming an appearance fee of $3 and "attorney's fee, fixed as costs, $350." None of the other defendants filed any memorandum of costs. Appellant moved to tax costs, the grounds of the motion being:

(1) That no attorney's fee is chargeable or taxable as costs against plaintiff under the terms of the contract of lease involved in the action.

(2) That no amount has been fixed or liquidated as a reasonable attorney's fee.

(3) That it does not appear that the sum of $350, or any sum, has been incurred by the said defendants in the said action.

The motion was supported by an affidavit, from which it appears that in the lease upon which the action was founded it was agreed as follows:

"That in the event that the lessors, their successors or assigns, shall commence an action against the lessee for the enforcement of any of the provisions or conditions in the lease, and if judgment in said action shall be rendered in favor of the lessee and against the lessors, their successors or assigns, then and in that event the lessors, their heirs or assigns, will pay to the lessee the cost and expense of said action, including a reasonable attorney's fee, which said fee shall not in any event exceed the sum of $350 gold coin of the United States."

Testimony was taken on the hearing of the motion to tax costs, and the motion was denied, whereupon the court signed and filed a judgment of dismissal which provided:

"* * * That judgment be given in favor of defendants and against the plaintiff, and that said defendants have their costs, taxed at $———."

The clerk inserted therein the amount of the costs at $353. The appeal is prosecuted from the portion of the judgment awarding costs.

[1, 2] The real question presented is whether attorney's fees provided for in a contract can be allowed "as costs." It is our opinion that they cannot, and that the inclusion of the attorney fee of $350 in the present judgment is error. It must be conceded that the right to allowance of costs is purely statutory. While in certain specified cases attorney's fees may by statute be made allowable as costs, this cause does not come within the purview of any such statute. Where the right to attorney's fees, as in this case, is based upon contract and not upon statute, recovery, if at all, must be had upon that contract, and such fees cannot be taxed as costs. Code Civ. Proc. § 1021. Attorney's fees provided for in a contract have been held to be in the nature of special damage, and must be specially averred in order to admit of their recovery. Prescott v. Grady, 91 Cal. 518, 27 Pac. 755.

In the case of Brooks v. Forcington, 117 Cal. 219, 48 Pac. 1073, action was brought to foreclose a mortgage. The defendant defaulted. The mortgage provided that in the event of foreclosure the mortgagee might retain from the proceeds of the sale costs and charges of suit, "including counsel fees." The prayer of the complaint asked for principal and interest "and for costs of suit," and prayed for general relief, but did not in terms ask an award of counsel fees. The trial court made plaintiff an allowance for counsel fees. In deciding, on appeal, whether such allowance was proper the court said:

"Counsel fees are not costs or disbursements in the action allowed by the statute to the prevailing party. Code Civ. Proc. § 1021. Nor, when provided for by the terms of the contract, is such charge deemed a part of the costs, or recoverable as such, but is in the nature of 'a special damage expressly authorized by the contract to be recovered in addition to the general damages;' and must be expressly averred, with the right in defendant to defend specially against its allowance."

Irrespective of the evidence adduced, therefore, it is our opinion that counsel fees were not properly allowable as costs.

But even if we concede that such fees might be allowed "as costs," it appears affirmatively that the defendant executors had neither paid nor become obligated to pay any attorney's fee. On the hearing of appellant's motion to tax costs Edward J. Pringle, one of the executors, testified that after the commencement of the action the attorney for other defendants requested that he be allowed to defend the action in the name of the executors; that Pringle told him that he would consent to such proceeding "only upon the express understanding and agreement that his so acting would be without any expense or liability on the part of the estate or the executors, either in their official or individual capacities." This was not denied.

[3] The object of a provision for attorney's fees in a contract is to reimburse a party for sums he pays, or becomes liable to pay, as attorney's fees. As was said in Bank of Woodland v. Treadwell, 55 Cal. 379, the allowance of attorney's fees is not to afford an opportunity, under cover of the name, for a speculation on the part of the creditor, but is to reimburse him in a proper amount for a sum which he pays or becomes liable to pay, or to relieve him from the burden of paying counsel fees.

[4] Accordingly, that portion of the judgment appealed from, in so far as it relates to counsel fees, should be modified, and since the respondents other than the executors waived their costs through failure to file memoranda of costs, such portion should be modified so as to provide that judgment be given in favor of defendants and against the plaintiff and that said defendants, Edward J. Pringle and Sydney J. Pringle, as executors of the last will and testament of William B. Pringle, deceased, have their costs taxed at $3. As so modified let the judgment stand.

The cause is remanded, with directions to the trial court to modify its judgment accordingly, appellant to have its costs on appeal.

Ex parte AZHOCAR. (Cr. 740.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 22, 1920.)

Habeas corpus ⊜27—Minor illegally adjudged ward of court will be discharged.

Where an order adjudging a minor to be a ward of the juvenile court was based upon a petition filed in such court insufficient to confer jurisdiction, she will be discharged in a habeas corpus proceeding.

In the matter of the application of Esther Galvan Azhocar for a writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the juvenile court of Los Angeles County to secure release from detention. Petitioner discharged.

C. J. Novotny, of San Diego, for petitioner.

H. S. Utley, Dist. Atty., and J. D. Malcolm, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Diego, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. It appears from the petition for the writ, as well as from the return thereto, that the minor, Esther Galvan Azhocar, is illegally restrained of her liberty. The petition filed in the juvenile court, upon which the order adjudging the minor to be a ward of that court was based, was insufficient to confer jurisdiction.

It is ordered, therefore, that the minor be discharged.

LYNCH v. HOLBROOK et al. (Civ. 3503.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 28, 1920.)

1. Attorney and client ⊜104—Knowledge of attorney derived from other transactions not imputed to client.

Where the same attorney represented the payee of a promissory note in the transaction in which the note was given, and at the same time represented a subsequent transferee of the note in a matter unconnected with the former transaction, the attorney's knowledge of defects in the note is not imputed to the subsequent transferee.

2. Witnesses ⊜383—Statement witness had never had possession of note held immaterial, and not subject to impeachment.

In an action by the indorsee of a note against the makers, who denied bona fide purchase by plaintiff, and alleged fraud as a defense, testimony by one who was attorney for the original payee and the indorsee that witness had never had possession of the note is immaterial, so that statements by him, showing that he had possession of the note subsequent to the time plaintiff claimed delivery to him was not admissible to impeach the testimony.

3. Bills and notes ⊂497(1) — Evidence of fraud inadmissible, before proof that plaintiff indorsee was not bona fide purchaser.

In an action by an indorsee of a promissory note against the makers, evidence that the note was procured from the makers by fraud is not admissible, before the makers have proved that the indorsee was not a bona fide purchaser for value before maturity.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Thomas B. Lynch against C. H. Holbrook and others to recover on a promissory note. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Alfred J. Harwood, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Charles L. McEnerney, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This was an action brought to recover upon a promissory note for the sum of $1,500, signed by the defendants and payable to one J. B. Graves or order one month after date, and transferred by said Graves to plaintiff before maturity.

The defendants in their answer denied that the note had ever been delivered to said Graves, alleged that the same had been transferred to the plaintiff after maturity, and had been taken by him from Graves with notice of the fact that it was without consideration, and further alleged that said note had been obtained by said Graves through certain fraudulent representations which would have entitled said defendants to avoid said note in the hands of any but a bona fide transferee for value before maturity and without notice.

When the cause came on for trial the trial court refused to permit defendants to make proof of their said defense of fraudulent misrepresentations in avoidance of said note until they had presented evidence to show that the plaintiff was not a bona fide purchaser of said note for value and before maturity. In an attempt to make this showing the defendants offered evidence of the fact that Mr. C. L. McEnerney, who was the attorney of record for the plaintiff in the case at bar, had also been acting as the plaintiff's attorney in other matters at the time of the transaction between the defendants and said Graves through which said note had been given, and that said C. L. McEnerney was also at said time attorney for said Graves in connection with said transaction; the claim of the defendants being at the time of the offer of such evidence that whatever knowledge said McEnerney had become possessed of by virtue of the fact that he was the attorney for Graves in said transaction was to be imputed to the plaintiff for whom said McEnerney was at the same time the attorney in other matters unconnected with said transaction. The trial court refused to concur in this contention, and also refused to admit in evidence a letter written by said McEnerney to one of the defendants shortly after the time of the transaction between the defendants and said Graves, by the contents of which they claim the plaintiff would be bound, and by which they also claimed they would be able to contradict certain testimony which McEnerney had given as to the date and fact of the delivery of said note to plaintiff. The court refused to admit such letter for that purpose, and also refused to permit the defendants to inquire of a witness named McGuire as to certain statements which McEnerney was claimed to have made to him as to the time of the delivery of the note in question to the transferee. These various rulings the defendants have assigned as error upon this appeal.

[1] In their final brief upon appeal the appellants withdraw their contention that the plaintiff, as the transferee of the note in question, was chargeable with whatever knowledge his attorney, Mr. McEnerney, in other matters had become possessed of while acting as the attorney for Graves in the transaction in the course of which said note had been given. They still insist, however, upon the four other grounds which are specified in their closing brief. The first of these is that the court erred in its refusal to admit in evidence the aforesaid letter, written by McEnerney to one of the defendants shortly after the transaction in question, wherein he stated that he had been in possession of said note at a date after that which the plaintiff had testified as the date when the note had been delivered to him. It is clear that the defendants were not entitled to the admission of said letter for any such purpose, since nothing that McEnerney, while acting as Graves' attorney, might have written or said as to his own possession of said note could have been binding upon the plaintiff, or serve to contradict his own sworn statement as to the time of the delivery of the note to him.

[2] The appellants, however, make the further contention in respect to the admissibility of said letter that it would have served to contradict certain testimony which said McEnerney had given as a witness in the case, to the effect that he had never been in possession of said note. This contention may be well founded; but the contradiction of McEnerney's testimony in that regard was quite an immaterial matter, since said testimony of McEnerney was purely negative as to his possession of the note at any time, and his letter, tending to contradict such statement, would only amount at best to his impeachment in that regard, but would not otherwise tend to show that the plaintiff's testimony as to the time of the delivery of the note to himself was not true. The plaintiff, on the other hand, had affirmatively shown himself to have been possessed of said note at the time to which the testimony and also the letter of McEnerney were referable, and this testimony stands without contradiction in the record. The case, therefore, will not be reversed upon the ground that there was error committed by the trial court in the exclusion of said letter.

The same reasoning and conclusion apply to the statements of McEnerney, which the defendants sought to show had been made to McGuire regarding the former's possession of the note.

[3] The next three contentions of the appellants refer to rulings of the trial court in the rejection of evidence tending to show that said note was without consideration, and was obtained by Graves through fraud; but, since the defendants had failed to produce any evidence sufficiently tending to show that the plaintiff was not the bona fide transferee of said note before maturity, for value and without notice of the alleged equities of the defendants, such offered testimony was clearly inadmissible, and hence the court was not in error in the exclusion of the same.

This disposes of the several contentions upon which the appellants have finally relied for a reversal of the cause.

Judgment affirmed.

HURD v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 3512.)

Appeal and error ⊂⊃1052(5), 1068(4) — Instruction and evidence harmless in view of verdict.

Admission of evidence, in an action by an administratrix for the benefit of herself and minor children for death of her husband, of acceptance of pension by plaintiff from defendant, and an instruction that on account thereof recovery must be limited to damages suffered by the children, if error, was harmless; there having been, under other proper instructions and the evidence, a general verdict for defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by Beatrice Hurd, as administratrix of John B. Hurd, deceased, against the City and County of San Francisco. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Harry I. Stafford and W. F. Stafford, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

George Lull, City Atty., and R. T. Ainsworth and Chas. S. Peery, Asst. City Attys., all of San Francisco, for respondent.

KINSELL, Judge pro tem. Action by administratrix to recover damages for death of her intestate alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant.

Cause was tried before a jury and a general verdict was rendered in favor of the defendant.

It appears that John B. Hurd on January 27, 1918, was a police officer in the city and county of San Francisco, and while he was on duty on that day he was crushed between two cars of the Geary street line operated by the municipality, an died the following day. He left surviving his widow, Beatrice Hurd, and two minor children. The widow was appointed administratrix and sues in that capacity under section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Over the objection of plaintiff, defendant introduced evidence to the effect that the injury which resulted in John B. Hurd's death befell him while he was engaged in the performance of his duty as a police officer; that after his death, pursuant to application by his widow, the board of police relief and pension fund commissioners of San Francisco, on April 1, 1918, ordered paid to the widow a monthly compensation of $61 per month for the benefit of herself and the minor children of decedent, which amount she received and accepted every month after such date.

It was the contention of respondent that by reason of such facts plaintiff was barred from maintaining the action.

The court instructed the jury, among other things, as follows:

"In such an action plaintiff sues in her representative capacity for the benefit of all the heirs at law of said deceased, and there can be but one recovery, if any, of a total sum for the one death, and the recovery, if any, is for the benefit of all persons interested as heirs of the deceased. In such an action the jury may, if they find for the plaintiff, award such damages as under all the circumstances may be just; but, in arriving at what is just under all the circumstances, the jury must take into consideration the fact, which appears in this case, that the plaintiff as widow of said deceased, has already accepted a certain pension in compensation for her share of the damage sustained by the death of said deceased, and any recovery herein, if you find for the plaintiff, must be for damages other than those to said plaintiff as such widow."

The court also gave the following instruction:

"You are therefore instructed that by accepting the benefit of said pension said plaintiff as an individual has waived any further or other claims for compensation against said city and county which might otherwise exist in her behalf by reason of the injuries received by said deceased John B. Hurd or by reason of the death of John B. Hurd, resulting therefrom."

And further instructed the jury that in fixing damages to which plaintiff, as administratrix, might be entitled, "* * * you are limited to the damages suffered by the children of said deceased, and you can make no allowance for the individual benefit of said plaintiff as widow."

These instructions, as well as others which it is not necessary to quote, are assigned by appellant as prejudicial error. Each of the instructions complained of, however, bears solely upon the amount of damages sustained. If they be erroneous, they could prejudice the plaintiff's case only in the event that the jury found in favor of the plaintiff on the main issue of negligence.

The jury having heard the evidence, and under other proper instructions having found a general verdict in favor of the defendant, it necessarily follows that the instructions complained of, even if erroneous, do not constitute reversible error. Wilhelm v. Donegan, 143 Cal. 50, 76 Pac. 713; Cook v. Los Angeles Ry. Corporation, 169 Cal. 115, 145 Pac. 1013.

Upon the same theory appellant was not injured through the overruling of her objection to the introduction of evidence as to her acceptance of a pension from the board of relief and pension fund commissioners.

The other points urged by appellant are without merit. The evidence is in our opinion amply sufficient to support the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

NAVE v. TAUGHER. (Civ. 3389.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 17, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 15, 1920.)

1. New trial ⟸137—Notice of motion for new trial properly signed by defendant, who appeared for himself.

Where defendant, an attorney, appeared for himself at all times in the action, filing the pleadings and other papers, the fact that at the opening session of the trial he requested that the record show he had associated another attorney with himself did not render it necessary that notice of intention to move for a new trial be signed by defendant's associate; there being nothing to indicate that defendant had surrendered control of the litigation.

2. Appeal and error ⟸345(1)—Appellant has 30 days after determination of motion for new trial to appeal.

Where the proceedings for a motion for new trial were initiated by proper notice, the time for appeal from the judgment did not, under Code Civ. Proc. § 939, expire until 30 days after entry in the trial court of the order determining motion.

3. Attorney and client ⟸165—Complaint held to state cause of action for reasonable value of services.

A complaint alleging that plaintiff's intestate rendered legal services for defendant under an agreement that defendant should fix and determine the reasonable value of the services, that defendant fixed the value at the sum of $200, and that such sum was not the reasonable value, but that the reasonable value was $4,500, states a cause of action under Civ. Code, § 1611.

4. Pleading ⟸53(2) — Joinder of count on quantum meruit with a count asserting defendant failed to fix reasonable value not improper.

In an action for legal services, it was not improper to join one count on the quantum meruit with another count asserting that defendant was to fix and determine the value of such services, and that he fixed an unreasonably small sum.

5. Attorney and client ⟸144—Where party is to fix and determine value of services, he must fix reasonable value.

When a contract for legal services did not determine the amount of compensation, but left it to the determination of the defendant, defendant must, under Civ. Code, § 1611, fix a reasonable value on the services, and, where he does not, the reasonable value may be recovered.

6. Attorney and client ⟸167(2)—Where defendant was to fix value of services, matter should be submitted to a jury in case of difference.

Where a contract for legal services did not determine the compensation, but left the matter to defendant, there is an implied agreement that in case of difference of opinion in regard to the proper amount of remuneration the matter should be submitted to a jury.

7. Attorney and client ⟸167(2)—Questions of disputed fact for jury.

In an action for the value of legal services, where the question whether the attorney rendering them had agreed to accept a fixed sum was disputed, it was for the jury.

8. Attorney and client ⟸144—Value of services must be determined, at least on request.

Where a contract allowed defendant to fix the value of legal services, he is bound to exercise his right at the completion of services, or at least when called on to do so, and, having failed, the attorney may recover the reasonable value of his services.

9. Attorney and client ⊂=167(2)—Question of defendant's good faith in fixing value of legal services for jury.

Where defendant, an attorney, engaged another attorney to render legal services under an agreement that he should fix the value, the fact that the attorney employed, in a letter to defendant, stated that he did not question defendant's good faith in fixing the value of the services, is not conclusive in an action for the reasonable value, so as to restrict recovery to the amount fixed, and the matter should be submitted to the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by George M. Nave, as administrator of the estate of Jacob M. Blake, deceased, against J. L. Taugher. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. L. Taugher, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Douglas A. Nye and Vincent Surr, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $4,500, alleged to be due as the reasonable value of legal services rendered by plaintiff's intestate to the defendant, who is also an attorney at law, in connection with an action pending in the United States District Court. The defendant admitted that the services were worth the sum of $200, and offered to pay that amount. The offer was declined, and the jury rendered a verdict in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $950. From the judgment entered for that amount the defendant has appealed, after motion for a new trial made and denied. He is apparently not seeking a review of the ruling on motion for a new trial, but confines himself to an attack upon the judgment. We are guided to that conclusion by the opening brief. It becomes necessary, however, to examine into the proceedings looking to a new trial, in order that we may dispose of certain preliminary objections made by respondent to a consideration of the appeal.

[1, 2] Respondent contends that the notice of intention to move for a new trial and the notice of appeal are not the notices required by law. His point is that each is signed only by the defendant personally, and by no other counsel. There is nothing in the contention. Mr. Taugher, an attorney at law, appeared for himself at all times in the action, signing the pleadings and other papers as defendant. At the opening session of the trial he asked that the record show that he had associated Mr. Frank D. McClure with himself "in the trial of this case." No formal substitution of attorneys was asked for, or made, and there is nothing to indicate that Mr. Taugher surrendered the control of the litigation to Mr. McClure, or withdrew from its active direction. He was therefore the only attorney authorized to sign a notice of motion for a new trial, or a notice of appeal. McMahon v. Thomas, 114 Cal. 588, 591, 46 Pac. 732; Beardsley v. Frame, 73 Cal. 634, 15 Pac. 310; Whittle v. Renner, 55 Cal. 395; Prescott v. Salthouse, 53 Cal. 221. As the proceedings on motion for a new trial were initiated by a proper notice, the time for appeal from the judgment did not expire until 30 days after entry in the trial court of the order determining such motion. Code Civ. Proc. § 939.

[3, 4] The respondent stated his cause of action in two counts. The first is on quantum meruit for the reasonable value of the services rendered. In the second, he alleged that the services were rendered to the defendant under a contract whereby plaintiff's intestate agreed that the defendant should fix and determine the value of the services; that defendant fixed the value thereof at the sum of $200; that said sum is not the reasonable value thereof, but that the reasonable value thereof is $4,500. An allegation of nonpayment followed. The second count, therefore, stated a cause of action under section 1611 of the Civil Code. The complaint was not rendered objectionable because the cause of action was stated in these two counts. Estrella Vineyard Co. v. Butler, 125 Cal. 232, 234, 57 Pac. 980; Cowan v. Abbott, 92 Cal. 100, 101, 28 Pac. 213.

As before stated, this is an action by the administrator of the estate of Jacob M. Blake, deceased, to recover the amount of an attorney fee alleged to be due from the defendant. In 1915 the defendant brought suit in the United States District Court against the Moore Filter Company for the value of legal services rendered to that company by himself. When the case came on for trial before the court, sitting with a jury, Taugher, intending to be a witness in his own behalf, engaged the decedent, Blake, to assist him. The trial lasted 4½ days, and Mr. Blake conducted the case, according to the testimony of Hon. William C. Van Fleet, the judge before whom it was tried, in an able manner and to a successful conclusion. He was an attorney of standing and ability, earning large fees, and experts fixed the value of the services rendered to the defendant from $2,500 to $5,000. The jury rendered a verdict in Mr. Taugher's favor in the sum of $18,358, the full amount sued for. The judgment was subsequently paid in full, with interest and costs. Taugher has never paid for the work done by Blake; hence this suit.

The defendant resisted this action in the lower court, and seeks a reversal of the judgment in favor of Blake's administrator, upon the ground that the services were rendered by Blake under an express contract that he was to be paid for his services a sum not exceeding $50 a day for each day he was actually engaged in court, the amount to be determined upon, and fixed by Taugher; that the trial occupied 4½ days, including one day of effort on the part of Taugher in arguing a preliminary matter; that at the most the fee could only have been the sum of $225, hence he had fixed it at $200, which should be the amount of the judgment, and which he was ready to pay. At the conclusion of the testimony he moved the court for an instructed verdict to that effect, which was denied. He then requested the court to include an instruction to the same effect in its general charge, which was also refused.

From certain correspondence passing between Blake and Taugher, and from the latter's testimony, it clearly appears that at the outset of the employment Blake left the question of the amount he should receive for his services entirely to Taugher. The latter also testified that the agreement limited the compensation to a sum not to exceed $50 per day. Appellant contends, therefore, that the court should not have submitted the case to the jury without instructing it that it could not render a verdict in excess of $225.

[5, 6] There is a complete answer to this contention. The agreement left the amount of the compensation to be fixed by the defendant. When a contract does not determine the amount of the consideration, but leaves it to the discretion of an interested party, the consideration must be reasonable. It was therefore incumbent upon the defendant to pay to Blake so much money as his services, which were the object of the contract, were reasonably worth. Civ. Code, § 1611; Security Trust & Savings Bank v. Clausseu, 187 Pac. 142. Even without recourse to the statute the rule is the same. The person having power to fix the fee may not act fraudulently. Foster v. Young, 172 Cal. 317, 325, 156 Pac. 476. When such contracts have been made they import "an implied agreement by the parties that, in case of a difference of opinion between them with regard to the proper amount of remuneration, the question is to be submitted to a jury." 2 Labatt, Master and Servant, p. 1298, par. 438. Assuming, therefore, the contract to have been as testified to by Mr. Taugher, the question of the reasonableness of the award made by him to plaintiff's intestate was a matter for the jury to determine. The motion for an instructed verdict was therefore properly denied, and the requested instructions were correctly refused.

[7] As a part of his defense, the defendant attempted to establish a contract, which placed a limitation of $50 per day on the amount of Blake's compensation. In the light of the evidence, including the correspondence which passed between the parties to the agreement, and in view of all the circumstances of the case, it was the province of the jury to consider and determine the correctness of that contention. It may have been unwilling to accept the defendant's version of the matter. The instructions given by the trial court amply covered both of the foregoing propositions.

[8] The evidence also strongly points to the fact that Taugher unreasonably delayed the fixing of Blake's fee. The letters passing between them so indicate. For six months after the services were rendered Blake was constantly seeking a settlement. Finally he saw fit to treat Taugher's repeated refusals, based upon various excuses, to fix the fee, as a repudiation of the contract, and elected to proceed against him to fix the amount of the obligation upon quantum meruit. Of this he gave Taugher due and written notice. Not until then did the defendant fix the fee, and he never offered to pay the amount until after suit was brought. When a contract of employment is entered into, whereby the employer is to fix the compensation for the services to be rendered, if such contract is enforceable at all, the employer must exercise his right at the completion of such services, or at least when called upon to do so; otherwise, the employee will be entitled to recover the reasonable value of his services. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. Ry. Co. v. Lott, 3 Ohio Dec. 136, 10 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 249; 34 Am. Dig. (Century Ed.) 523. Having been employed under an arrangement by which he was to have some compensation, the manner and method of fixing which was left to the defendant, and the defendant not having carried out his agreement, as he was obligated to do, Blake was entitled to proceed as he did. Ruttle v. Foss, 161 Mich. 132, 147, 148, 125 N. W. 790; Torrey v. Shea, 29 Cal. App. 313, 319, 155 Pac. 820; Rawle v. Gilmore, 76 Ill. App. 372, 375.

[9] Appellant argues that because the decedent, Blake, in one of his letters to him, wrote that he did not question Mr. Taugher's good faith in the matter of fixing his compensation, he is conclusively absolved from all imputation of fraud and bad faith in the transaction, and that the jury should have been so instructed, and directed to render a verdict in plaintiff's favor not exceeding the sum of $200. We think, under the law as we have found it, it was proper for the trial court to submit the entire transaction to the jury. It did so, under full and explicit instructions on the whole most favorable to the defendant. Foster v. Young, supra.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BRUNO. (Cr. 914.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 27, 1920. Rehearing Denied Oct. 25, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 24, 1920.)

1. Indictment and information ⇐110(42)—Information for kidnapping following language of statute held sufficient.

An information for kidnapping following the words of the statute held to state the time, place, and circumstances with certainty sufficient to inform accused of the specific offense charged and enable him to answer it, and hence sufficient.

2. Kidnapping ⇐1 — Intent or purpose need not be alleged or proved.

In a prosecution for kidnapping, it is not necessary to allege or prove the intent or purpose with which the kidnapping was accomplished.

3. Criminal law ⇐1186(4)—Failure of information to allege that subject of kidnapping was human being not reversible error.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, prohibiting reversals except for miscarriage of justice, the failure of an information to allege that the subject of the alleged kidnapping was a human being was not ground for reversal, where defendant did not demur, and the evidence showed that she was a person.

4. Kidnapping ⇐1—Forcible carrying away sufficient though without intent to injure and under belief that it would not be objectionable.

Where defendant forcibly placed the complaining witness in an automobile and carried her away, he was guilty of kidnapping, though he did so with no intent of injuring her or her feelings, but solely for the purpose of conversing with her, and under the belief, based on probable ground therefor, that such action would not be offensive to her or hurt her feelings.

5. Criminal law ⇐1172(7)—Defendant not entitled to complain of inconsistency in instruction, favorable to him.

An inconsistency in an instruction on a trial for kidnapping resulting from including, at defendant's request, the statement that if the carrying away was without intent to injure, and under the belief that the complaining witness would not be offended, there could be no conviction, was favorable to defendant.

6. Criminal law ⇐1134(3)—Whether defendant could be found guilty of offense submitted a moot question when convicted of crime charged.

Where on a trial for kidnapping the court submitted a form of verdict for false imprisonment, but defendant was convicted of kidnapping as charged, the question whether he could be found guilty of false imprisonment is a moot question.

7. Criminal law ⇐863(2)—Court should not have informed jury as to punishment carried by different verdicts on their request.

Where the jury returned into court and asked the court whether all verdicts of guilty submitted carried a state prison sentence, the court, after explaining that the punishment was a matter with which they had nothing to do, should not have explained the punishment that might be imposed under each verdict and the procedure that might follow a conviction.

8. Criminal law ⇐1172(9)—Explaining punishments carried by each verdict, though improper, not prejudicial error.

Though it was improper for the court on request of the jury to explain the punishment that might be imposed under different verdicts and the procedure that might follow a conviction, it was not prejudicial error, where there was no promise as to what the court would or would not do in event of a conviction.

9. Criminal law ⇐1163(1)—No presumption of prejudice from error.

No presumption of prejudice arises from the mere fact of error, and it must affirmatively appear that defendant has been substantially injured by the error complained of.

10. Criminal law ⇐762(1)—Court's remark as to second trial being unnecessary not reversible error.

On a trial for kidnapping, the court's remark at the conclusion of an explanatory instruction, given on request of the jury after they had been out for some time, that he did not want to try the case again, and felt that it was unnecessary to do so, was not ground for reversal, because expressing court's opinion, though such explanations are hazardous and might better be omitted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Domenic Bruno was convicted of kidnapping, and he appeals. Affirmed.

H. A. Gabriel, of San Jose, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WASTE, P. J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of kidnapping and as punishment was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison. He appeals from the judgment, upon the grounds: First, that the information does not charge the offense of kidnapping, as defined by section 207 of the Penal Code; second, that the evidence is insufficient to support the conviction; and, third, that the court misdirected the jury in matters of law.

The information charges that—

"The said defendant, on or about the 27th day of October, A. D. 1919, at the county and state aforesaid, did willfully, unlawfully, feloniously and forcibly, without lawful warrant or authority, and against the free will and without the consent of one Rosie Sunseri steal, take, kidnap, and carry said Rosie Sunseri from a place in said county near the McKinley School, on McLaughlin avenue in the county of Santa Clara, state of California into another part of said county of Santa Clara, state of California, to wit, the home and dwelling of Tony Cracolice on White Road, all of which is contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California."

[1, 2] The allegation of the offense follows the words of the Code section defining it. The time, place, and circumstances are stated with that certainty, which informed the accused of the specific offense with which he was charged under the statute, and gave him the necessary information to enable him to answer the charge. That was all that was required. People v. Ward, 110 Cal. 369, 372, 42 Pac. 894, and cases cited. It was not necessary to allege or prove, as contended for by appellant, the intent and purpose with which the kidnapping was accomplished. People v. Fick, 89 Cal. 144, 150, 26 Pac. 759.

[3] Appellant's further objection to the information is that it nowhere appears therein that "Rosie Sunseri," the subject of the alleged kidnapping, is a person or a human being. The omission to so state is merely an error of pleading. It has been held by this court, following the mandatory direction of the Constitution (section 4½ of article 6), that the judgment in such cases should not be reversed, or a new trial granted, "unless that error of pleading has, in the opinion of this court, formed after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, resulted in a miscarriage of justice." People v. Bonfanti, 181 Pac. 80. An examination of the record of this case, as in the one just cited, immediately discloses that the omission in question did not affect the trial, or the rights of the defendant, in the least. The defendant did not demur to the information, and it appeared from the evidence (a fact already well known to the defendant) that Rosie Sunseri was a person, a young schoolgirl, 15 years of age, to whom the defendant pretended to be engaged. No miscarriage of justice resulted from the error in the information.

The appellant does not specify wherein the evidence was insufficient to support the charge of kidnapping. We will therefore not consider the point any further than to briefly narrate the facts. The sister of the complaining witness is married to the brother of the defendant. The latter had been ordered away from the home of the complaining witness by her parents, because of his constant attention to her. On the afternoon in question, as the girl was going home from school, in the city of San Jose, he seized her, and forcibly dragged her into an automobile, which he had hired for the purpose. He covered her head with an overcoat and attempted to stifle her screams and outcries by putting the sleeve in her mouth. At that time the defendant told the complaining witness that he "wanted to marry her," or that "she would have to marry him." He took a pistol from his pocket and told the girl he would kill anybody who followed them, at the same time telling the driver of the automobile to drive on. A number of people witnessed the abduction, and some of them told the defendant to let the girl alone. Rosie succeeded in freeing herself sufficiently to scream and call to a number of people for help as the automobile sped along, and told the defendant the policemen would soon be after him. The party did not go very far. When they reached the home of one Cracolice, still in Santa Clara county, after a further demand or statement from the defendant that the complaining witness marry him, the girl pushed defendant out of the automobile, got into the front seat with the driver and was taken home by him.

As against this accusation, the defendant's position is that he was engaged to marry the complaining witness, that he had reason to believe that placing her in the automobile for the sole purpose of talking to her, would not be objectionable, or offensive to her, and that she would make no objection thereto. His contention is that the evidence warrants the assumption that he was justified in this belief, and that but for a misdirection in the law of the case by the court, the jury would have so concluded.

[4, 5] In this connection he submitted an instruction, modeled, he asserts, after one given in Stripling v. State (Tex. Civ. App.) 80 S. W. 377, which was as follows:

"If from the evidence you believe that this defendant took hold of the prosecuting witness for the sole purpose of placing her in the automobile for the purpose of being enabled to converse with her, and then returning her to place from which he met her, but did so with no intention of injuring her or her feelings, and had probable ground to believe, and did believe, that such placing her in said automobile, if he so did, or driving her in said automobile, if he so did, would not be objected to by her, or would not be offensive to her, or hurt her feelings—then he would not be guilty of the crime of kidnapping (and you will acquit him on that charge. And in passing upon this issue, you will look to all of the facts and circumstances in evidence, and the conduct of the parties, both before and after the commission of the alleged offense; and if you have a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, or of his intent to injure the prosecuting witness, you will find him not guilty of this charge.)"

The court struck out, and refused to give the portion italicized, and gave the instruction with the following in its place:

"But if you should find from the evidence and circumstances in the case, beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty, that this defendant, Domenic Bruno, on the McLaughlin road, on or about October 27, 1919, laid hands on Rosie Sunseri, and forcibly took her against her will and consent, and placed her in an automobile which he had provided for the occasion, and forced her to ride therein to the residence of Cracolice near Capitol avenue, then I charge you under such circumstances the defendant is guilty of violating the law of kidnapping, and that whether or not he was engaged, or sought to be engaged, to be married to her."

Appellant's complaint of this action of the court is groundless. The purported authority for the proposed instruction is a case arising out of a charge, and conviction, of the crime of assault and battery, and has no application to the facts of the case at bar. The requested instruction is an incorrect statement of the law of this state, relating to kidnapping (Pen. Code, § 207), and no part of it should have been given. The portion included in the charge of the court only resulted in an inconsistency, which was favorable to the appellant, and he did not suffer thereby.

[6] At the request of the defendant the court instructed the jury that certain lesser crimes were included in the offense charged in the information. Of its own motion the court submitted a form of verdict for false imprisonment, effected by violence and menace. Whether or not the defendant could be found guilty of that offense under the information in the case is a moot question, for he was convicted of the crime of kidnapping as charged.

When the jury retired to deliberate, two forms of verdict finding the defendant guilty of a felony, two finding him guilty of a misdemeanor, and one finding him not guilty, were submitted to it. After the jurors had deliberated for some time (appellant in his brief says 5½ hours), without arriving at a verdict, they were brought into court upon their request for further instructions, and through their forelady stated that they wished to know if all of the verdicts of guilty carried a state prison sentence. This request appears to have been predicated upon the argument of appellant's counsel in his argument. The court, in response to the query, proceeded to correctly explain to the jurors that the matter of punishment, in the event they should find the defendant guilty, was a matter with which they had nothing to do. Instead of stopping there, however, and apparently being of the view that some confusion had crept into the minds of the jurors by reason of the argument of counsel, the court took the verdicts one by one, and at some length explained the extent of the punishment that might be imposed in the event the defendant should be found guilty. The procedure that might follow a conviction, in the way of a motion for a new trial, and application for probation, was likewise stated in detail. The jury was then directed to continue its deliberation, with the admonition that out of the verdicts, explained by the court, including a verdict of "not guilty," it should select the one that conformed to its conclusions, and that if the jurors in good conscience could agree upon a verdict the court desired them to do so, but if they could not, and felt they had acted honestly and conscientiously, they would be discharged in due time.

[7-9] After some further deliberation the jurors returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty as charged in the information. The appellant attempts to predicate error upon the episode, and contends that the jury could not but be, and were influenced by this charge of the court to arrive at a verdict, believing that if they found the defendant guilty, the court would either deal leniently with the defendant, or place him on probation. His argument is that the remarks of the trial court amounted, in substance, to an admonition to the jurors not to "worry about the punishment. The punishment will be commensurate with the crime. This is not a case that would carry a 10 year sentence, it is only the most aggravated case of kidnapping where a 10 year sentence is imposed. This defendant will be taken care of. He can apply for probation, and the court will consider it." We do not so understand the remarks of the trial judge. The matter of punishment of the defendant, in the event the jurors should find him guilty, was, as bluntly stated to them by the court, "none of their business." It was for them to weigh and consider the evidence, and upon that alone, and the law as given to them by the court, to determine the defendant's guilt or innocence. Having properly instructed the jury as to their duty, the court should have stopped there. But while we are convinced that the remarks of the court were entirely unnecessary, and should not have been indulged in, we cannot hold that they were so improper as to form the basis of prejudicial error. As was said in People v. Lawlor, 21 Cal. App. 63, 71, 131 Pac. 63, 67:

> "No presumption of prejudice arises from the mere fact of error. On the contrary, it must affirmatively appear to this court that the defendant has been substantially injured by the error complained of."

There was no promise on the part of the trial court as to what it would, or would not, do in the event the defendant be found guilty, or treaty entered into to induce the jury to arrive at a verdict. This fact differentiates the situation here presented from that considered in the cases relied upon by the appellant. In State v. Kernan, 154 Iowa, 672, 135 N. W. 362, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 239, the jury, after being out all night, came into court, and, after stating that they had failed to agree, desired permission to make a recommendation to the court. Thereupon the judge informed them that, while it was unusual, he did not object to such a procedure, and would consider any recommendation made by the jury. The jury thereupon retired, and brought in a verdict of guilty, coupled with a plea for the clemency of the court, and the recommendation that the sentence be made as light as possible. The Iowa Supreme Court was "of opinion that the promise of the court to give the recommendation consideration might well have led the jury to believe, and doubtless did, that the sentence to follow would be somewhat modified because thereof, and that this was extremely prejudicial to the defendant." It, therefore, reversed the judgment. An almost exactly parallel case is that of Territory v Griego, 8 N. M. 133, 42 Pac. 81. In McBean v. State, 83 Wis. 206, 211, 53 N. W. 497, the error consisted of the promise made by the trial judge to the jury to the effect that if they found McBean guilty they might rely upon him to extend the clemency of the court to the prisoner. In State v. Kiefer, 16 S. D. 180, 91 N. W. 1117, 1 Ann. Cas. 268, after the jury had retired to deliberate on a verdict, the foreman sent a communication to the judge, asking if the jury could recommend the defendant to the mercy of the court, to which the judge answered in the affirmative, stating that he made it on invariable rule to follow such recommendations. This case does not fall within the application of any of the decisions cited by appellant in support of his last contention.

[10] The only other point relied upon for a reversal is that the trial judge indicated that he viewed the evidence as pointing to defendant's guilt, and that the jury should so declare by its verdict. He concluded the supplemental charge with the admonition:

"Now, as I remember it, those are the only verdicts that have been submitted to you that will carry a punishment. The other form of verdict is 'not guilty.' Now out of these verdicts that have been submitted to you ladies and gentlemen, you will select the one that conforms to your conclusion. The Court does not want to try this case again. It feels that it is unnecessary to do so."

It is claimed that because of the sentences which we have italicized, the reason for a reversal given in People v. Kindleberger, 100 Cal. 367, 34 Pac. 852, and People v. Conboy, 15 Cal. App. 97, 113 Pac. 703, are applicable. The aggravated situation considered in those cases is not presented here. The facts disclosed by this record are so similar in their essentials with those considered by this court in People v. Rhodes, 17 Cal. App. 789, 793, 121 Pac. 935, that we may say they are the same. In that case, quoting from People v. Miles, 143 Cal. 636, 639, 77 Pac. 666, 668, this court said:

"That it was proper for the court to urge the importance of reaching a verdict, and as it intimated no opinion of its own or suggested how the verdict should go, the defendants were not prejudiced."

However, let this court say again, as it said upon the former occasion, that we agree with what Justice McFarland said in concurring in judgment of affirmance in People v. Miles, supra, that such expressions as the one used by the trial court in this case "are hazardous, and it would be better for the court to say nothing on that subject."

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; KINSELL, Judge pro tem.

DONLEY v. VAN HORN. (Civ. 3213.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 28, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 24, 1920.)

1. Public lands ⟹29—On withdrawal of land from entry, no rights by settler can be initiated.

Under Reclamation Act Cong. June 17, 1902 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4700–4708), authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw lands from entry, such withdrawal is absolute, and no rights can be initiated by a settler during the existence of the withdrawal order.

2. Public lands ⟹53—Patent may not issue on lands for disposition of which Congress has not provided.

Under Act Cong. May 2, 1914, authorizing selection in lieu of school lands of other lands "vacant" and "unreserved," lands not within such qualification are those for which Congress has made no provision, and land not provided for is not subject to the disposition of the Land Department, and any patent therefor is void.

3. Public lands ⟹53—Lands held not "vacant" or "unreserved" lands, subject to selection in lieu of school lands.

Public land, withdrawn from entry in 1909 in connection with a reclamation project, was settled on by defendant in 1911; he making improvements and applying for a desert land entry. In May, 1915, plaintiff made selection of the land under Act Cong. May 2, 1914, authorizing selection of "vacant" and "unreserved" lands in lieu of school lands. In November, 1915, the Secretary of the Interior approved recommendations of the Commissioner of the Land Office that "the withdrawal order of 1909 be revoked and that plaintiff's selection be approved." Held, that the land was not "unreserved" until the attempted approval of plaintiff's selection, at which time, if it was vacant, defendant's rights attached, notwithstanding the revocation of the withdrawal and the approval of the selection were simultaneous acts. "Vacant" lands are those absolutely free, unclaimed, and unoccupied, and it is not vacant, if occupied by a settler under claim and color of right. "Reserved" land is land that has been withheld or kept back from sale or disposition.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Sarah F. Donley against Erwin Ray Van Horn. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Conkling & Brown, of El Centro, for appellant.

Haines & Haines, of San Diego, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Plaintiff, to whom had been issued a patent to the land in controversy, sued for recovery of the premises and to quiet title. The lower court adjudged plaintiff to be the owner and entitled to possession. From this judgment, defendant appeals.

[1] The land, which is situated in Imperial county, has been in the exclusive occupancy of defendant ever since some time prior to December 26, 1911, on which date he filed in the proper office, viz. the local land office at Los Angeles, his application to make entry under the Desert Land Law. The land is a part of a large tract that, on April 2, 1909, was withdrawn from entry by the Secretary of the Interior in connection with the Yuma reclamation project, pursuant to authority conferred by the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stats. at L. p. 388), commonly known as the Reclamation Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4700–4708). This withdrawal was under what is known as the first form of withdrawal; that is, it was the withdrawal of lands that, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, may be needed in the construction and maintenance of irrigation works. Such a withdrawal amounts to a legislative withdrawal, and is absolute. Until again restored to entry, the land so withdrawn is segregated from the public domain. It is excepted from the operation of public land laws, and is not subject to settlement or entry. No right can be initiated by a settler during the life of the withdrawal order, and every such settler is but a naked trespasser. Woodcock's Case, 38 L. D. 349; Pratt's Case, 38 L. D. 146; Wolsey v. Chapman, 101 U. S. 755, 25 L. Ed. 915; Bullard v. Des Moines & Ft. D. R. R. Co., 122 U. S. 167, 7 Sup. Ct. 1149, 30 L. Ed. 1123; Spencer v. McDougal, 159 U. S. 63, 15 Sup. Ct. 1026, 40 L. Ed. 76; Scott v. Carew, 196 U. S. 100, 25 Sup. Ct. 193, 49 L. Ed. 403; Whitehill v. Victorio L. & C. Co., 18 N. M. 520, 139 Pac. 184, L. R. A. 1918D, 593.

On May 10, 1915, while the land still was withdrawn from entry or sale under the Secretary's withdrawal order of April 2, 1909, plaintiff, who claimed to be the owner of a certain section of state school land, for which the state had issued to her a patent, made selection of the land in controversy under the act of May 2, 1914 (38 U. S. Stats. 372), in lieu of her school land, and a patent of the lieu land so selected by her was issued to her by the United States on August 9, 1916. The act under which plaintiff made her lieu selection—the act of May 2, 1914—provides that—"The state of California or its grantees may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, reconvey to the United States any of the lands heretofore granted to said state in the townships authorized to be resurveyed by the act of July 1, 1902, * * * and select in lieu thereof an equal amount of vacant, unappropriated, surveyed, unreserved, non-mineral public lands within said state."

[2] It will be noticed that by the terms of this act the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to approve a selection of land in lieu of the base land reconveyed to the United States when, and only when, the lieu land so selected is "vacant" and "unreserved." If it be not "vacant" and "unreserved," it is land for the disposition of which, by selection in lieu of land reconveyed to the United States, Congress has made no provision. Land for the disposition of which Congress has made no provision is not intrusted to the disposition of the Land Department, and any patent issued therefor is void, and subject to collateral attack in an action at law. Doolan v. Carr, 125 U. S. 618, 8 Sup. Ct. 1228, 31 L. Ed. 844; Burfenning v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 163 U. S. 321, 16 Sup. Ct. 1018, 41 L. Ed. 175; King v. McAndrews, 111 Fed. 860, 50 C. C. A. 29; Cucamonga Fruit Land Co. v. Moir, 83 Cal. 101, 22 Pac. 55, 23 Pac. 359; Edwards v. Rolley, 96 Cal. 408, 31 Pac. 267, 31 Am. St. Rep. 234; Klauber v. Higgins, 117 Cal. 451, 49 Pac. 466; Williams v. San Pedro, 153 Cal. 44, 94 Pac. 234. The doctrine of the cases last cited is thus stated by Mr. Justice Brewer with his usual lucidity and vigor, in Burfenning v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., supra:

"It has undoubtedly been affirmed over and over again that in the administration of the public land system of the United States questions of fact are for the consideration and judgment of the Land Department, and that its judgment thereon is final. Whether, for instance, a certain tract is swamp land or not, saline land or not, mineral land or not, presents a question of fact not resting on record, dependent on oral testimony; and it cannot be doubted that the decision of the Land Department, one way or the other, in reference to these questions is conclusive and not open to relitigation in the courts, except in those cases of fraud, etc., which permit any determination to be re-examined. * * * But it is also equally true that when by act of Congress a tract of land has been reserved from homestead and pre-emption, or dedicated to any special purpose, proceedings in the Land Department in defiance of such reservation or dedication, although culminating in a patent, transfer no title, and may be challenged in an action at law. In other words, the action of the Land Department cannot override the expressed will of Congress, or convey away public lands in disregard or defiance thereof."

Appellant contends that, upon the facts found by the trial court—facts that appear on the face of the record of the Land Department—the land, when respondent's lieu selection received the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, was not "vacant" and "unreserved" public land, within the meaning of the act of May 2, 1914; that therefore the Land Department had no authority to issue the patent, and no title passed to respondent. We are constrained to hold that this is an unescapable conclusion.

[3] All the controlling facts in the case are disclosed by the records of the Land Office, copies of which were incorporated into the trial court's findings. The following summary, based upon the Land Office records and found by the trial court to be true, will suffice for an understanding of what we conceive to be the ultimate question in the case:

Subsequently to the withdrawal of the land from entry on April 2, 1909, under the first form of withdrawal authorized by the act of June 17, 1902, viz. on March 17, 1913, the reclamation service reported to the Secretary of the Interior that certain of the lands so withdrawn, including the land in controversy, were not necessary to the reclamation project, and recommended the revocation of the withdrawal order. The day following the filing of this report, viz. March 18, 1913, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior indorsed on the report of the reclamation service an order approving the recommendation. This indorsement did not operate as an absolute and immediate revocation of the withdrawal order of April 2, 1909; for, by the express terms of this order of March 18, 1913, so indorsed on the report of the reclamation service, the Assistant Secretary directed the Commissioner of the General Land Office to ascertain whether the lands included in the report of the reclamation service had been otherwise withdrawn or reserved by law, and, if not, to cause notice to be given that they will be open to settlement and entry at times to be fixed by the Commissioner. Before such notice could be given, viz. on April 17, 1913, the order of March 18, 1913, was suspended, after a copy thereof had been forwarded to the register and receiver of the Los Angeles land office. The order that the Assistant Secretary had so indorsed on the report of the reclamation service on March 18, 1913, was thus suspended "pending determination of the best method of opening the lands to entry." At the date of the suspension of the order of March 18, 1913, viz. on April 17, 1913, it was further ordered that the land that plaintiff proposed to select in lieu of her state school land be not restored to entry, in order that the Land Department might effect the exchange that it was proposed to make with her if and when the bill that later was enacted as the act of May 2, 1914, should become a law. On the same day that this suspension order of April 17, 1913, was made, the Assistant Commissioner of the General Land Office sent a telegram to the register and receiver of the Los Angeles land office, notifying the latter that the order of March 18, 1913, revoking the withdrawal of the lands, had been suspended, and to return the revocation order to the General Land Office in Washington. This was done. Thereafter no attempt was made by the Land Department to revoke the original withdrawal order of April 2, 1909, in so far as the land in controversy is concerned, until November 3, 1915, on which date the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior approved a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, recommending that, as to this land, the withdrawal order of April 2, 1909, be revoked, and that the lieu selection that plaintiff previously had made on May 10, 1915, under the act of May 2, 1914, be approved. The net result of the foregoing is that, as to the land in controversy, the withdrawal order of April 2, 1909, was in full force and effect from the time when it was made until November 3, 1915.

On December 26, 1911, defendant, as we already have stated, tendered to the local land office in Los Angeles an application to make a desert land entry on the land in controversy. This application was rejected on the ground that the land had been withdrawn from entry by the withdrawal order of April 2, 1909, and that such withdrawal was still in full force and effect. Defendant appealed successively to the Commissioner of the General Land Office and to the Secretary of the Interior, by both of whom his right to make such entry while the land was withdrawn for irrigation works was denied. During all these times defendant was a citizen of the United States, possessed of all the qualifications essential to qualify him to make entry upon such of the public lands as might be open to entry and legal settlement. At all times since December 26, 1911, the land has been in the exclusive occupancy of defendant, who went upon it and made settlement, with the intention of perfecting a title thereto under the United States land laws, as soon as an application to make entry might be favorably acted upon by the Land Department. During his occupancy he cultivated the land, and, at considerable expense, made valuable improvements thereon. Notwithstanding his possessio pedis and evident good faith, defendant's occupancy, during all the time that the Secretary's withdrawal order of April 2, 1909, was in force, was no better than that of a naked trespasser, and his improvements were made at his own risk. But this would not prevent his occupancy from becoming lawful, and the land removed from the category of "vacant" land, if, before any inceptive right could vest in plaintiff, or other third person, the withdrawal order of April 2, 1909, should be revoked, and the land again restored to settlement and entry while occupied by defendant.

On February 17, 1914, which was prior to the passage of the act of May 2, 1914, and while the land was still withdrawn from settlement or entry under the Secretary's withdrawal order of April 2, 1909, plaintiff wrote a letter to the Land Department, expressing a willingness to select the land in controversy in lieu of her state school land. The First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, in a letter dated March 21, 1914, addressed to plaintiff, informed her that if the bill then pending in Congress, and which subsequently was enacted as the act of May 2, 1914, became a law, its provisions would enable her to make the selection. "In the meantime," so the letter runs, "the Commissioner of the General Land Office has been directed to withhold any of the above tract that you desire to select from restoration to entry. Should H. R. 122 be enacted into law, proper steps will be taken by this department to enable you to make selection of the land in lieu of that claimed by you under the grant from the state of California." On November 14, 1914, the Secretary of the Interior notified the Commissioner of the General Land Office that, in view of the fact that the department had knowledge of the character and status of the land that plaintiff desired to select under the act of May 2, 1914, the usual affidavit as to the character and status of lieu land, required by the departmental regulations to be made by persons making such lieu selections, could be waived. The Secretary also notified the Commissioner to instruct the local register and receiver to transmit to the General Land Office at Washington, without action on their part, the papers to be filed by plaintiff in the Los Angeles office, when she should make her lieu selection. The Commissioner likewise was instructed to take prompt action upon plaintiff's deed of reconveyance and lieu selection, upon receipt thereof. On May 10, 1915, plaintiff filed in the local land office at Los Angeles her lieu land selection, whereby she made selection of the land in controversy, and, at the same time, recorded a deed whereby she conveyed to the United States the base land for the lieu selection, viz. the state school land for which she held a patent from the state.

On June 27, 1915, the Commissioner of the General Land Office transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior a written report wherein he recommended approval of plaintiff's lieu selection. This report to the Secretary of the Interior, after reciting the complications and conflicts involved in plaintiff's school section and stating that plaintiff is willing to reconvey her school land to the United States, and, in lieu thereof, select the land in controversy, and after reciting the facts showing the exact status of the land, including defendant's attempted desert land entry and his occupancy, concludes with the following recommendations: (1) That the withdrawal order of April 2, 1909, be revoked, and the fixing of dates for settlement and entry waived; and (2) that plaintiff's selection, made May 10, 1915, be approved. On November 3, 1915, these recommendations were approved by the following order indorsed on the Commissioner's written report:

"Nov. 3, 1915. Approved; and it is so ordered. Andrieus A. Jones, First Assistant Secretary."

Thereafter, on August 9, 1916, the United States issued to plaintiff the patent under which she claims title to the land in controversy.

As we already have pointed out, the act under which respondent claims that the Land Department was authorized to issue the patent to her, the act of May 2, 1914, expressly provides that the land to be selected in lieu of the base land shall be "vacant, unappropriated, surveyed, unreserved, nonmineral public lands," and, as we have shown, if the lieu land selected under the act be not "vacant" and "unreserved," no provision for its disposition as lieu land has been made by Congress, and any patent thereto under the act of May 2, 1914, is void and no title passes. In view of appellant's contention that, when respondent's selection was made and approved, the land was not "vacant" and "unreserved," it becomes necessary to consider the meaning of those words.

"Vacant lands," says the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in Cosmos Exploration Co. v. Gray Eagle Oil Co., 112 Fed. 13, 50 C. C. A. 89, 61 L. R. A. 230, "are such as are absolutely free, unclaimed, and unoccupied." (Italics ours.) Public land is not vacant, if it is lawfully occupied by a settler under a claim and color of right. "The land was not vacant and open to settlement, * * * because it was then occupied by the defendant's grantors under a claim and color of right. It matters not that they had not at that time acquired any rights against the United States. * * * Whatever his rights may be, the fact that the miner is in the actual possession without having made any location at all shows that the land is not 'vacant.' " Id. If the occupancy be unlawful, and the occupant but a mere trespasser, as is the case where the land occupied by the settler is withdrawn from settlement and entry, the land, doubtless, should be deemed to be "vacant," notwithstanding the settler's actual occupancy; but if, during the occupancy of land that, for any reason, has been withdrawn from settlement and entry, it again is thrown open to settlement, the settler's occupancy ceases to be unlawful, it immediately becomes lawful, he no longer is a trespasser or intruder, and the land so occupied by him immediately ceases to be within the category of "vacant" land.

Reserved land is land that has been withheld or kept back from sale or disposition. The word "reserved" is defined in the Standard Dictionary as "retained; kept back." Pending its withdrawal for the Yuma reclamation project, the land in controversy was "kept back" by the government from sale. It was withheld or reserved; it was not "unreserved" public land, within the meaning of the act of May 2, 1914. It is not necessary, as respondent contends, that, to be "reserved" land, the reservation should be of a more or less permanent character, as in the case of reservations for Indians, forests, forts, arsenals, and the like. In Northern Pacific Ry. Co. v. Musser-Sauntry L. & M. Co., 168 U. S. 604, 18 Sup. Ct. 205, 42 L. Ed. 596, it was held that lands within the indemnity limits of a railroad grant, that have been withdrawn from sale by order of the Secretary of the Interior until it should be known whether they would be needed to satisfy the grant, are, by the order of withdrawal, "reserved," within the meaning of a subsequent act granting lands to which the United States has "full title, not reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated." In the opinion in that case it was said:

"The withdrawal by the Secretary in aid of the grant to the state of Wisconsin was valid, and operated to withdraw the odd-numbered sections within its limits from disposal by the land officers of the government under the general land laws. The act of the Secretary was in effect a reservation."

In Alberger v. Kingsbury, 6 Cal. App. 93, 91 Pac. 674, it was held that an order of the Secretary of the Interior, withdrawing lands from disposition pending determination of the advisability of including them within a forest reservation, constitutes a "reservation" of such lands, within the meaning of section 2275 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. St. § 4860). We think it clear that from the date of the withdrawal order of April 2, 1909, made pursuant to the Reclamation Act of June 17, 1902, until the final unequivocal revocation of the withdrawal order on November 3, 1915, the land that respondent attempted to select under the provisions of the act of May 2, 1914, was reserved, and was not "unreserved" public land within the meaning of that act.

This brings us to the ultimate question in the case, viz.: Was the land, at the time of the approval of respondent's selection, both vacant and unreserved? Her counsel say that—

"The revocation of the withdrawal of the selected land and the approval of the selection thereof was made by the same indorsement and at the same instant, strictly in uno flatu."

It evidently is respondent's contention that, notwithstanding appellant's continued and uninterrupted occupancy, with the intent to make entry just as soon as it again should be thrown open to settlement, the land continued to be "vacant" up to and including the very instant when, by the revocation of the withdrawal order and the approval of plaintiff's selection, it ceased to be reserved and became "unreserved." This contention is based upon the claim that the revocation of the withdrawal order and the approval of plaintiff's lieu selection occurred at the same instant—as respondent's counsel put it, "in uno flatu"—both acts having taken place by the indorsement of the Assistant Secretary's approval on the written report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, wherein the Commissioner had recommended the revocation of the withdrawal order of April 2, 1909, and the approval of the lieu selection that plaintiff had made on May 10, 1915.

This claim that the revocation of the withdrawal order and the approval of respondent's lieu selection took place at the same instant, without any interval of time whatever, is the Achilles' heel in respondent's contention that she acquired a right to the land under her lieu selection. If the revocation of the withdrawal order and the approval of respondent's lieu selection were so absolutely synchronous that no instant of time whatever, however short, elapsed between the revocation of the withdrawal and the approval of respondent's lieu selection, then it necessarily follows that, at the very instant when the Secretary approved respondent's lieu selection, the land still was under the spell of the withdrawal order, and that therefore, when her selection was approved, the land was not "unreserved" public land subject to disposal by the Land Department under the act of May 2, 1914.

If, to avoid this dilemma, some interval of time, however short, may be deemed to have elapsed between the revocation of the withdrawal order and the approval of respondent's lieu selection, notwithstanding both acts were effected by the one act of the Assistant Secretary in indorsing his approval on the Commissioner's written recommendations, then, during that interval, however short, appellant's occupancy of the land ceased to be unlawful and he ceased to be a trespasser. At the very instant that the withdrawal order was revoked, the land became open to entry, and appellant, who had occupied the land all this time, waiting for the day when he lawfully could make entry under the public land laws, who had made valuable improvements, who, possessing the necessary qualifications, had vainly tried to enter the land under the Desert Land Act, who diligently prosecuted appeals from adverse decisions of the local land officers and the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary of the Interior himself, and whose every act betokens a patient awaiting of the time when he could make lawful entry under the public land laws, became a lawful settler in actual and lawful occupation, and at that very instant the land ceased to be "vacant." For these reasons we see no escape from the conclusion that, when respondent's lieu selection was approved, the land either was not unreserved or it was not vacant.

The status of the land at the time of the Secretary's approval of respondent's selection is the crux of the case; that is to say, in order that title should pass to respondent under the patent issued to her August 9, 1916, it is essential that the land should have been both vacant and unreserved at the time of the Secretary's approval of her lieu selection. That particular point of time, and none other, is the crucial or determinative point of time. That this is so will readily appear when we remember that at the date when respondent made her lieu selection, May 10, 1915, the land unquestionably was not "unreserved." It still was in the category of reserved land by reason of the withdrawal order of April 2, 1909, which, as to the land selected by respondent, was still unrevoked and in full force and effect. Consequently, no right in respondent, inchoate or inceptive, could attach to the land by virtue of her act of selecting it as lieu for her state school section. Unless, therefore, the land was both vacant and unreserved at the very instant of the Secretary's approval of her selection—and that, we think, was an impossibility—so that the Secretary's act of approval could create in her some sort of a right to the land, inchoate or inceptive, she never could acquire any right thereto; for, without doubt, when, on November 3, 1915, by revocation of the withdrawal order, the land ceased to be reserved and became "unreserved," appellant's occupancy, unless a right of some sort already had vested in respondent, immediately became a lawful occupancy, and, being lawful, the land ceased instanter to be "vacant," and thereby it ceased to possess one of the attributes essential to the right of disposal under the act of May 2, 1914.

Our conclusion is that the land in controversy was not subject to disposition under the act of May 2, 1914. Respondent never initiated a right at a time when the land was both vacant and unreserved. And since the United States, the proprietor of the public domain, can be dispossessed of its lands only by strict compliance with some law of Congress, we conclude that no title passed under the patent issued to respondent, and that therefore the judgment should be reversed.

It is so ordered.

DONLEY v. WEST. (Civ. 317I.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 28, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 24, 1920.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

On rehearing. Judgment reversed.
For former opinion, see 189 Pac. 1052.

Conkling & Brown and Banta & Banta, all of El Centro, for appellant.
Haines & Haines, of San Diego, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. At the oral argument following the order granting a rehearing, it was stipulated by the parties hereto that all proceedings in the land department affecting the respective rights of the parties, as shown by the records of that department, are correctly set forth in the record on appeal in Donley v. Van Horn, 193 Pac. 514, No. 3213, this day decided, and that on the appeal in this case judicial notice might be taken of all the records of the land department so set forth in the record in the Van Horn appeal. The effect of that stipulation is to show that, mutatis mutandis, the facts in this case are, in all substantial respects, the same as in the Van Horn case.

For the reasons stated in the opinion this day filed in Donley v. Van Horn, the judgment is reversed.

COLLETTE v. SARRASIN. (L. A. 5521.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 12, 1920.)

1. Witnesses ⟸222—Prior relation of attorney does not establish relation existed when deed was drawn.

That an attorney drew a will for a client and retained it in his possession until drawing a deed some two years later will not itself establish the relation of attorney and client at the time of drawing the deed so as to render testimony by the attorney as to the grantor's declarations concerning the deed privileged communications within Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 2.

2. Witnesses ⟸200—That attorney acted as mere scrivener does not make communication privileged.

Where an attorney acted as a mere scrivener in drawing a deed, and the grantor asked no advice and solicited no services from the attorney other than the delivery of the deed, communications in that connection were not privileged within Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 2; the relation of attorney and client not existing.

3. Witnesses ⟸205—Statement by client directed to be communicated to grantee of deed not privileged.

Though the relation of attorney and client existed between a grantor and the attorney who drew a deed, a communication which the grantor directed be communicated to the grantee is not privileged within Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 2.

4. Witnesses ⟸201(1)—Attorney can testify as to instructions.

Where the communication between the client and attorney is one authorizing the attorney to perform some act on behalf of the client, the communication giving such authority is not a confidential communication by the client, and the attorney may testify to the instruction, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 2.

5. Witnesses ⟸222—Person objecting to testimony as privileged has the burden of showing relation of attorney.

A party objecting to testimony by an attorney on the ground that it was to a privileged communication with a client has the burden of showing the relationship.

6. Evidence ⟸471(30) — Attorney may be asked whether he was acting as such in particular transaction.

Where testimony of an attorney concerning delivery of a deed was objected to on the ground that it was privileged, it was proper to ask him whether with relation to that transaction he was acting as attorney for the grantor whose declarations were sought to be elicited.

7. Witnesses ⟸217 — Communications to attorney not competent merely because both parties claimed under client.

The mere fact that both parties claimed under decedent, who was asserted by plaintiff to have occupied towards an attorney the relation of client, does not make communications by decedent to the attorney admissible, for, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 2, a privileged communication cannot be received unless the privilege is directly or inferentially waived by the client.

8. Descent and distribution ⟸90(1) — Heirs may maintain action to have deed declared mortgage.

As Code Civ. Proc. § 1452, authorizes the heirs of a decedent to sue for possession of real estate or for quieting title thereto, the heirs of a decedent may maintain a suit to have declared a mortgage an absolute deed executed by decedent.

9. Descent and distribution ⟸71(1)—In action to have deed declared mortgage question of heirship may be decided.

In an action by the alleged heirs of decedent to have a deed executed by him declared a mortgage, the question of heirship may be decided; the decree sought being in effect both to quiet title to the land against the grantee's claim of ownership and to establish a right to possession subject to the rights of the administrator.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by Zephir F. Collette against Hyacinthe Sarrasin. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Emmet H. Wilson, G. C. De Garmo, and J. Wiseman Macdonald, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Oscar Lawler and James E. Degnan, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This action is brought by the plaintiff, the father and sole heir of Clifford Collette, to have a grant deed from the latter to the defendant, his uncle, declared to be a mortgage. The judgment was in favor of the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. The appellant claims that the property was conveyed to him as a gift. When eight years of age Clifford was brought to California by the defendant and was reared by the uncle, who, when Clifford was 23 years old, purchased the land here involved, each taking title to an undivided one-half thereof. Afterwards defendant conveyed his half to the nephew Clifford and took a mortgage for $5,000 on the property. Defendant advanced about $4,000 additional to Clifford, and the property had appreciated in value until at the time of the death of the latter it was worth about $28,000. About two weeks before his death Clifford executed the deed in question. The defendant testified that Clifford gave him an old deed containing a description of the property and requested him to take it to Emmet H. Wilson, an attorney at law, and have a deed drawn conveying the property to defendant, stating that he would later go to the office and execute it. This was done. The next day the deed was delivered to defendant by the stenographer in Wilson's office. Defendant denied that the deed was given to him as security. Mr. Wilson was called to the stand by the defendant. Because of plaintiff's objection that the matter sought to be elicited from this witness was privileged he was only permitted to testify to the following effect: That he was an attorney at law; that he was acquainted with the parties to this action, and with Clifford Collette; that he became acquainted with the latter in 1910, and in June, 1912, drew a will which he executed; that he kept the will in his safe at his request until March 2, 1916, at which time he returned it to him. The trial court rigidly adhered to the ruling that upon this state of the case everything said and done between Mr. Wilson and the deceased was privileged, and therefore sustained objections to every attempted offer of proof, and to every question asked which sought to elicit any additional evidence, and declined to permit defendant's counsel to make any offer of proof, or to state what they expected to prove by the witness. Inasmuch as the deed was delivered by Mr. Wilson to the grantee, it must follow that such delivery was in accordance with the instructions of the grantor, unless we infer that such delivery was unauthorized. Under the rulings of the court, the instructions given by the deceased with relation to the deed were not admitted in evidence. Whether such delivery was authorized, and whether in connection with the delivery of the deed Mr. Wilson was either authorized or directed by the deceased to make any statement or representation as to its purpose or effect, or to make any request or to give any instructions with reference to the property, is not known because of the rulings of the court excluding such evidence.

[1, 2] Plaintiff's objection was not well taken unless the relation of attorney and client existed between the witness and the deceased. Section 1881, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc. The fact that Mr. Wilson had drawn a will two years before and retained possession thereof did not establish the relation of attorney and client with reference to the transaction concerning the deed. The only conversation with reference to the drafting of the deed, so far as we know, was the conversation with the defendant. The record leaves us wholly in the dark as to whether anything occurred between the witness and the deceased at the time the latter signed the deed which would establish the relation of attorney and client. If Mr. Wilson acted as a mere scrivener in drawing the deed, and if the deceased asked no advice concerning it and solicited no service from the attorney other than the delivery of the deed, it is clear that communications in that connection were not privileged, for the reason that the relation of attorney and client in the matter inquired about is not established and did not exist. Gulick v. Gulick, 38 N. J. Eq. 402; Hatton v. Robinson 14 Pick. (31 Mass.) 416, 25 Am. Dec. 415; De Wolf v. Strader, 26 Ill. 225, 79 Am. Dec. 371; Borum v. Fouts, 15 Ind. 50; Grimshaw v. Kent, 67 Kan. 463, 73 Pac. 92; Randel v. Yates, 48 Miss. 685; Todd v. Munson, 53 Conn. 579, 4 Atl. 99; Branden v. Gowing, 7 Rich. (S. C.) 459; Carroll v. Sprague, 59 Cal. 655; Delger v. Jacobs, 19 Cal. App. 197, 125 Pac. 258; Smith v. Caldwell, 22 Mont. 331, 56 Pac. 590; Machette v. Wanless, 2 Colo. 169; Monaghan Bay Co. v. Dickson, 39 S. C. 146, 17 S. E. 696, 39 Am. St. Rep. 704; Aultman & Co. v. Daggs, 50 Mo. App. 280.

[3, 4] If the deceased made any communication to Mr. Wilson, and if the relation of attorney and client existed, if that communication was directed by the client to be communicated to the grantee in the deed the communication was not privileged. Rosseau v. Bleau, 131 N. Y. 177, 30 N. E. 52, 27 Am. St. Rep. 578; Koeber v. Somers, 108 Wis. 497, 84 N. W. 991, 52 L. R. A. 512; Herman v. Schlesinger, 114 Wis. 382, 90 N. W. 460, 91 Am. St. Rep. 922; Estate of Nelson, 132 Cal. 182, 64 Pac. 294. Where the communication between the client and attorney is one authorizing the attorney to perform some act on behalf of the client, the communication giving such authority is not a confidential communication by the client, and the attorney may testify to the instructions given to him. Burnside v. Terry, 51 Ga. 186; Williams v. Blumenthal, 27 Wash. 24, 67 Pac. 393; Bruce v. Osgood, 113 Ind. 360, 14 N. E. 563.

[5-7] The defendant was not even permitted to state to the court what he intended to prove by the witness, or the nature of the evidence sought to be elicited. The witness was asked the following questions, to wit:

"Did you have any conversation with Mr. Collette about the deed at the time the deed was prepared? Was there any conversation between you and Mr. Collette at the time the deed was prepared as to the legal effect of it? Did Mr. Collette say anything to you as to why he was having the deed prepared? Did Mr. Collette ask you any questions or any advice or seek from you any advice concerning this deed? Did he say anything about what he intended to do with the deed, or what he wanted to have done with the deed when it was prepared?"

To all these questions objection was sustained, upon the ground that the matter sought to be elicited was privileged. Defendant's attorney, failing to elicit any information by question, attempted to make an offer of proof. The making of the offer was objected to, and the court sustained the objection. The colloquy in part was as follows:

"Mr. De Garmo: We offer to show at this time, your honor, by this witness, that at the time the deed was prepared, Mr. Collette told Mr. Wilson—

"Mr. Lawler: I think that is even highly improper."

After a somewhat acrimonious discussion by counsel, the following occurred:

"Mr. De Garmo: My contention of the proper way to do where the evidence sought to be elicited could not be ascertained by the question to offer—

"The Court: I don't.

"Mr. De Garmo: For instance, your honor, if he had consulted him relative to the effect of this will and this deed, then surely it is a privileged communication. Now, how does the question which I put to the witness indicate whether it is a privileged communication or not?

"The Court: Why, the circumstances fix that.

"Mr. De Garmo: Not necessarily.

"The Court: Well, presumably.

"Mr. De Garmo: I don't know of any other way of showing it.

"The Court: I don't think there is any other way.

"Mr. De Garmo: Whether this is a privileged communication according to the theory—

"The Court: I am drawing the line right here."

The court then stated that it was ruling thus "because it was shown that right up to the time that he called there, and as a part of that transaction, Mr. Wilson had retained his confidence as an attorney, and acted as custodian of his will, and the relation had not been severed." It is manifest that, if an attorney has drawn a will for a client and retained possession of it at the client's request, this fact alone would not constitute him an attorney as to every communication to him made after the execution of the will. The question as to whether or not he was acting in the capacity of an attorney and the communications to him were privileged must be determined with relation to the particular transaction involved in the inquiry, and the burden of showing such relationship is on the party objecting to the evidence. Respondent claims that the offer of proof was particularly objectionable because the effect of the offer would be to reveal the very matter that was privileged. If this contention be upheld, it is obvious that counsel are thereby precluded from showing or offering to show that the particular conversation or communication was within any of the well-recognized exceptions to the rule excluding privileged communications, and would be also prevented from offering any proof as to whether or not the witness was in fact acting as an attorney. It is true that an offer of testimony which incorporated privileged communications of such a character that it would reflect upon the client, if proved in evidence, might be nearly as objectionable as the proof itself, but something should be left to the judgment of the attorney making the offer and to the witness, who, of course, is aware of his obligations as an attorney. It is proper to ask the attorney whether or not with relation to the transaction under inquiry he was acting as the attorney for the person making the statements. If either of the parties are not satisfied with the answer of the witness, the dissatisfied party can ask such questions as are essential to enable the court to determine whether or not the relationship existed. If the relationship is established to the satisfaction of the court, it remains to be determined whether or not the communication was of such a character as comes within any of the exceptions to the rule concerning communications between attorney and client. The burden of showing that the confidential relation existed was upon the respondent. The showing made being insufficient for that purpose, the rulings excluding the testimony were for that reason erroneous, and the judgment must be reversed. Our opinion follows that of the District Court of Appeal, and we were satisfied with its conclusion. A transfer to this court was made because it was thought the exception to the rule of privilege was too broadly stated. We have therefore indicated the length to which we think the rule extends in the present case. The mere fact that both parties claim under the deceased does not, in our opinion, make the communication admissible, for under our Code (section 1881, Code Civ. Proc.) the privileged communication cannot be received unless that privilege is directly or inferentially waived by the client.

[8, 9] In view of a new trial it is proper to say that the contention of the appellant that the heir of the intestate could not maintain the action and that the trial court could not in this action determine the heirship of plaintiff is not well taken. The heirs of the deceased were expressly authorized to bring suit for the possession of real estate, or for the purpose of quieting title to the same. Code Civ. Proc. § 1452. The decree sought was, in effect, both to quiet title to the land against defendant's claim of ownership, and to establish a right to possession, subject to the rights of the administrator of the estate, and it was proper and necessary in the case to determine whether or not the plaintiff was an heir or devisee, and thus entitled to bring the suit. We think it unnecessary to pass upon any other point presented by the appellant, as the rules of evidence with relation thereto are well settled.

The judgment is reversed.

In re PINNELL'S GUARDIANSHIP. (S. F. 9558.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 5, 1920.)

1. Guardian and ward ⟸13(6)—Statute provides for temporary guardianship on ex parte showing.

The order provided for by Code Civ. Proc. § 1747, is designed simply to enable the superior court, on ex parte showing of necessity, to provide for temporary custody of a child and its production in court until hearing can be had on petition for guardianship of its person and estate in the superior court, and the court informed of the immediate necessities with regard to the welfare of the child.

2. Guardian and ward ⟸13(6) — Superior court can vacate ex parte order as to temporary custody of child.

It is within the power of the superior court finally to vacate an ex parte order for the custody of a child whose guardianship is sought, made pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1747, at any time during the course of the guardianship proceedings, and thus to restore the status quo if on investigation of the facts such action seems proper.

3. Guardian and ward ⟸13(6)—Order vacating temporary order for custody incorporated in judgment was not part of judgment.

The fact that the order of the superior court vacating its ex parte order, made pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1747, for the custody in the father of the child whose guardianship was sought by him, was physically incorporated in the final judgment of the court denying the application of the father for letters and awarding the permanent custody of the child to the mother, does not make it part of the judgment in the guardianship proceeding; it being simply an express disposition of the provisional order for temporary custody having effect to restore the status quo.

4. Guardian and ward ⟸10—Welfare of child paramount consideration on father's application.

The welfare of the child is the paramount consideration in proceedings by its father for letters of guardianship of its person and estate as against its mother.

In Bank.

In the matter of the guardianship of the person and estate of Mildred Bernice Pinnell, wherein John Harold Pinnell, her father, applies for writ of supersedeas, pending his appeal from order denying his petition for guardianship. Order granting stay vacated, and application for writ denied.

A. M. Drew, of Fresno, for appellant.
Henry Hawson, of Fresno, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an application by John Harold Pinnell for a writ of supersedeas pending the determination of an appeal taken by him to this court from an order of the superior court of Fresno county denying his petition for letters of guardianship of the person and estate of his minor daughter, Mildren Bernice Pinnell, a child of the age of 3½ years.

At the time of the initiation of the guardianship proceeding, on June 8, 1920, the child was in the care and custody of her mother, Erma May Pinnell, the wife of the petitioner, who was living at the home of her father in Fresno, the husband and wife having been living separate and apart for some time. On the institution by petitioner of the proceeding for letters of guardianship, he obtained from the superior court, upon an affidavit to the effect that the welfare of the child would be imperiled if she were allowed to remain in the custody of the mother, and that the mother would take the child from the state unless restrained from so doing, an ex parte order under section 1747, Code of Civil Procedure, directing the sheriff to take possession of the child and deliver her to Ella M. Towle, assistant probation officer, who should have and retain the custody "until the final hearing of the petition for letters of guardianship." Under this order the child was taken from the mother and delivered to the assistant probation officer, who has ever since retained her in her custody. The application for letters was opposed by the mother, and the matter was heard by the superior court in July, 1920. The court on August 7, 1920, gave its judgment denying the application of the father for letters of guardianship, and further decreeing that both petitioner and the mother are fit and proper persons to have the custody of the child, that neither has any right superior to the other in regard to such care and custody, and that it would be for the best interests of the minor child in respect to her temporal, mental, and moral welfare that she be placed and remain in the custody of her mother. By the judgment the custody of the child was awarded to the mother, when she should have filed an undertaking with two sureties in the sum of $1,000, conditioned that she would not take the child from the state. Included in the judgment was an order vacating and setting aside the order of June 8th relative to the temporary custody of the child, and providing that upon the filing of the decree and the giving and approval of the undertaking the assistant probation officer shall surrender the custody of the child to the mother. The undertaking was given and approved. The petitioner at once appealed to this court from the whole of said judgment. The whole object of this application for supersedeas is to prevent the redelivery of the child to the mother pending the determination of the appeal, and in so far as any substantial material showing is concerned the application is based solely on the theory that the appeal stays the effect of the order of the superior court vacating and setting aside the order of June 8, 1920, for temporary custody and restoring the custody of the child to the mother, from whom it was taken at the commencement of the proceeding.

[1-3] We are of the opinion that the contention of petitioner involves a misconception of the nature and effect of the order provided for by section 1747, Code of Civil Procedure. It was solely by virtue of the order made under that section that the child was taken from the custody of the mother and withheld from such custody pending the hearing in the superior court. She was in the custody of the mother at the time of the institution of the guardianship proceeding, and there she would have remained throughout the proceedings in the trial court and during the pendency of any appeal but for such order. Such was the status quo. The order provided for by the section is clearly one designed simply to enable the superior court, upon an ex parte showing of necessity therefor, to provide for the temporary custody of the child and its production in court, until a hearing can be had on such petition in the superior court, and the court informed of the immediate necessities with regard to the welfare of the child. The material part of the section provides:

"In all such proceedings [applications for letters of guardianship], when it appears to the satisfaction of the court, either from a verified petition, or from affidavits, that the welfare of the minor will be imperiled if such minor is allowed to remain in the custody of the person then having the care of such minor, the court may make an order providing for the temporary custody of such minor until a hearing can be had on such petition."

And this is followed by the provision for a warrant to a peace officer for the taking of the child by the officer and the delivery by him into the "temporary custody" provided wherever it appears to the court that there is danger that the child will be carried out of the jurisdiction of the court or will suffer some irreparable injury before compliance with the order for temporary custody can be enforced. In nature and effect the order is somewhat analogous to a temporary restraining order, the functions of which are ended when a hearing is had and the trial court gives its judgment against the party in whose favor the order was made. That it is within the power of the superior court to finally vacate such an ex parte order at any time during the course of proceedings therein, and thus restore the status quo, if upon investigation of the facts it deems it proper that this should be done, cannot be doubted. This the superior court effectively did by order at the close of the hearing therein, and the fact that such order was physically incorporated in the signed judgment of the court denying the application of the father for letters and awarding the permanent custody of the child to the mother does not make it a part of the judgment in the proceeding. It is in effect simply an express disposition of a provisional order for the temporary custody pending further action by the superior court, and the effect thereof was, at least upon the giving of an undertaking satisfactory to the court, to at once restore the status quo and entitle the mother to a return of the child notwithstanding the taking and pendency of an appeal by petitioner from the judgment.

[4] We are not called upon here to question the power of the superior court to make appropriate provision for the temporary custody of a minor pending an appeal, where upon the hearing it concludes that the welfare of the child will be imperiled if it be allowed to be in the custody from which it was taken. As the welfare of the child is the paramount consideration under such circumstances as we have here, there can be no doubt that some lawful method could be found to prevent even a temporary custody imperiling such welfare. But we have no such question here. In this case the superior court, after a full hearing, has determined that the welfare of the child will be promoted, rather than imperiled, by her restoration to the custody from which she was taken under the provisional order, and therefore has vacated such provisional order for temporary custody pendente lite. That its order in this behalf is final, and not reviewable on appeal, we have no doubt.

The order heretofore made granting a stay pending determination of this application is vacated, and the application for a writ of supersedeas is denied.

HARPER v. MURRAY. (S. F. 8659.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 12, 1920.)

1. Cancellation of instruments ⟸37(1) — Complaint by divorced wife to set aside agreement modifying decree as to alimony sufficient.

Complaint by a divorced wife against her husband to set aside agreement between them modifying the decree of divorce as to alimony, on the ground that such modifying agreement was procured by fraud and duress on the part of defendant husband, in that he procured a man to follow and make love to plaintiff wife and compromise her, which was done, so that defendant threatened plaintiff wife with exposure and modification of the decree, held sufficient as against general demurrer.

2. Divorce ⟸246—Agreement by wife to modify her decree of divorce as to alimony procured by duress of husband.

A divorced husband, who instructed a man to follow his former wife and make love to her, and, if possible, compromise her, and who broke in on them in a compromising situation, when the wife had not in fact been guilty of any improper conduct, so that he threatened her with exposure and suit for modification of the divorce decree as to alimony unless she consented to modify it by agreement, exercised upon her duress by threats, entitling her to set aside an order modifying the decree as to alimony in accordance with agreement which she was thus forced to make.

3. Divorce ⟸246 — Fact of false charge against divorced wife, used to induce her to agree to modify decree as to alimony, the basis of her action to set aside agreement.

Where a divorced husband made a false charge against his former wife of improper conduct with a man in whose room he discovered her, and used the situation as a threat of exposure to force her to agree with him to modify the divorce decree as to alimony, it was the fact of such false charge against her and its threatened publicity by the husband that gave the wife her cause of action to set aside the agreement modifying the divorce decree as to alimony as procured by duress, and not the manner in which the apparent foundation for the false charge was laid by the husband, so that, in the wife's action to set aside the agreement and to vacate order modifying alimony decree, it was immaterial that the evidence that defendant husband conspired with the man in whose room he discovered his wife was insufficient.

4. Divorce ⟸246—Evidence held to support finding defendant husband threatened divorced wife to induce her to release alimony.

In such action, evidence held sufficient to sustain the finding that defendant husband used threats to induce plaintiff to release her rights to alimony and the decree, also to sustain finding that the agreement of release was induced by fear of publicity and disgrace.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Rose Harper against Warren E. Murray. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Abbott, Wm. M. Cannon, and Kingsley Cannon, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Theodore J. Savage and R. H. Morrow, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. [1] The complaint in this action sets forth that plaintiff and defendant were husband and wife; that they were divorced, and that by the decree of divorce the plaintiff was restored her maiden name of Rose Harper, and was given judgment against defendant for alimony in the sum of $100 per month until further order of the court; that subsequently defendant obtained an order of court discharging said defendant from further payment of alimony; that such release was obtained through a purported agreement, signed by plaintiff, whereby, in consideration of a promissory note for $300 executed by defendant to plaintiff, the plaintiff released defendant from further payment of alimony; that said agreement was procured from plaintiff through menace, duress, and undue influence of the defendant. The facts pleaded as constituting the fraud, menace, and undue influence were that defendant conspired with one Esterbrook to have the latter gain the confidence of plaintiff and compromise her in some fashion that would enable defendant to procure a modification of the decree for alimony; that in pursuance of this plan Esterbrook made the acquaintance of plaintiff and made love to her, followed her from San Francisco to Los Angeles, where she had gone with her married daughter, invited her to his hotel to dinner, induced her to visit his room, where the defendant and a companion suddenly rushed in upon them and accused plaintiff of having improper relations with Esterbrook; that thereafter defendant threatened plaintiff that he was about to file a petition to modify said decree of divorce by striking therefrom the provision for alimony, and would support his application by affidavits charging plaintiff with improper relations with Esterbrook, unless plaintiff entered into the agreement of settlement and release already referred to; that the charges of improper conduct were false and unfounded, but that in fear of the publicity, humiliation, disgrace, and embarrassment which would result from the filing of such affidavits, and because of the duress, menace, and fraud thus exercised, plaintiff signed the agreement, and permitted the modification of said decree; that thereafter, having become free from the influence of such fear and menace, plaintiff served notice of the rescission of said contract, offered to return to defendant said promissory note and repay him $50 that had been paid thereon. Plaintiff prays the court for rescission of said contract, and that the order modifying her decree for alimony be vacated. A second cause of action sets up practically the same facts, and alleges invalidity of the contract of settlement for want of consideration. Defendant filed a general demurrer which was overruled. As against a general demurrer the complaint is sufficient.

[2] On the trial of the case the court found for the plaintiff in substantially the language of the complaint and against the allegations of defendant's answer, and particularly that the plaintiff had not been guilty of any improper conduct or of immoral relations with said Esterbrook, but that defendant had threatened to file affidavits accusing her of such improper conduct and immoral relations unless she entered into the agreement to release him from further alimony, and that the agreement of release was made by plaintiff because of such threats, and for no other reason. As its conclusion of law the court found that plaintiff was entitled to a judgment reviving her decree for alimony, and judgment was entered accordingly. Appellant contends that the findings of fact do not support the judgment; that the alleged menace, duress, and undue influence consisted merely of a threat to institute a proceeding in court, which defendant was entitled to resort to, and that a compromise by plaintiff to avoid further litigation was a legitimate settlement, based upon a sufficient consideration. The position of appellant is not well taken. It was the threat to disgrace and humiliate plaintiff by charging her publicly with immoral conduct that constituted menace. The fact that the threatened accusations were untrue does not relieve the threat from its unlawful force, but enhances it. It may well be that if plaintiff had been guilty of the alleged immorality it would have constituted sufficient ground for demanding a release from further liability for alimony. But the court having found her innocent, and having found that the charges against her were false, and necessarily known to be false by defendant, his threat to thus assail her reputation was as directly a menace as if he had threatened her with bodily harm.

Appellant contends that certain of the findings are not supported by the evidence.

[3] First, that the evidence that defendant conspired with Esterbrook is insufficient. The evidence of such conspiracy is entirely circumstantial, but we cannot say that it was inconsequential, and in any event, such finding is not essential to support the judgment. It does appear from the testimony that defendant had employed a detective to obtain evidence against his wife, and that apparently through this source of information he followed plaintiff to the room in the hotel, and on this circumstance trumped up a false charge against her. It is the fact of this false charge and its threatened publication, and not the manner in which the apparent foundation for it was laid, that is material.

[4] The second insufficiency of proof alleged is as to the evidence supporting the finding that defendant used any threat to induce the release by plaintiff. The testimony on this point is that shortly after the hotel episode defendant's attorney approached the plaintiff's attorney and informed him that defendant was about to move the court for a modification of the decree for alimony; that he had discovered the plaintiff in flagrante delicto with Esterbrook, and was going to base his application to the court upon affidavits containing such charge against the plaintiff. It is true there is no direct evidence that this communication to plaintiff's lawyer was made at the instigation or with the knowledge of defendant, and the circumstance, standing alone, might be insufficient to bind the plaintiff, but it further appears that the plaintiff wrote a letter to the defendant prior to the settlement, disclosing the information received from his attorney as to defendant's purpose, in which she bitterly denounces him for threatening to disgrace her. The letter contains the following language:

"I have just received a letter from my attorney and you know what it contains. Has your love for money or other influences robbed you of all sense of honor and manhood. You mean to disgrace me and my daughter by accusations you see fit to bring to cheat me of my alimony which you justly owe me."

The settlement arrived at was conducted through defendant's attorney, and it thus sufficiently appears that defendant was informed before the agreement was signed that threats had been made as an inducement to the settlement. This state of the case is strengthened by the fact that no attempt was made by defendant to deny that he instigated and had knowledge of such threat, and availed himself of the results.

The evidence also sufficiently sustains the finding that the agreement of release from alimony was induced by fear of publicity and disgrace from the threatened accusations. The plaintiff so testifies, and the circumstances are entirely consistent with her testimony.

In considering this entire case the significant fact is that the plaintiff had not been guilty of anything immoral, and that defendant had seen nothing to justify accusing her of immorality. The trial court has so found upon evidence sufficient to make the finding conclusive on this appeal. That she had been indiscreet and had placed herself in a compromising position is evident from her own admission. There was enough foundation for the threatened accusation that she was discovered in bed with Esterbrook to make such accusation peculiarly damaging to her reputation. Had the charge been true, there would be reason to assume that the settlement was voluntary on plaintiff's part, induced by a knowledge of her guilt. But, being innocent of any actual wrongdoing, it is reasonable to conclude that she only relinquished her right to future alimony because she was driven to it by the threat of defendant to take advantage of her indiscretion to ruin her reputation by a false accusation against her chastity.

We think the evidence is also adequate to show a sufficient offer of rescission.

Judgment is affirmed.

McCARTY v. WILSON. (L. A. 4839.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 20, 1920. Rehearing Denied Nov. 18, 1920.)

1. Exceptions, bill of ⊂⊃59(4)—Application for re-engrossment held not subject to statutory limit of six months.

Where bill had been ordered settled and engrossed, but was not in fact settled at the time of an order directing a re-engrossment, the application for re-engrossment was made in a proceeding which had not been taken or completed in a legal sense so as to be susceptible of having applied to it the statutory limit of six months, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, and the trial judge still retained jurisdictional control over the settlement of the bill, even though the time prescribed for the original presentation had expired.

2. Exceptions, bill of ⊂⊃59(1)—Court has power to direct re-engrossment by excluding matters not necessary to appeal.

A court, having jurisdictional control over settlement of a bill, has power to direct a re-engrossment so as to make the bill conform with verity and brevity by excluding therefrom such matters as are admittedly or obviously not necessary to a proper presentation of the appeal.

3. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1024(5)—Directing re-engrossment held conclusive as to materiality of matter excluded.

Where, upon plaintiff's application for re-engrossment of a bill, counsel for defendant was present by agreement and was heard upon his objection that matters material to him would be eliminated by the engrossment as ordered, and the court being fully advised in the matter denied the objection, the order of the court is conclusive that the matter stricken out was not material.

4. Executors and administrators ⊂⊃337—Order to show cause why real estate should not be sold held valid.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1536, prior to 1919 amendment (St. 1919, p. 1179), and section 1538, prior to repeal in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 1177), an order, requiring persons interested "to show cause why an order should not be granted to said executor to sell so much of the real estate of said deceased at private sale as shall be necessary," was not invalid as amounting to a fatal variation from the language required by the statute, although the sale was not sought because it was "necessary" to meet debts, but rather on the ground that it would be beneficial to the estate.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⊂⊃135(1) — Agreement to convey free of incumbrances did not apply to visible easement.

A general agreement to convey land free and clear of all incumbrances did not refer to an easement of way for an electric power and transmission line, consisting of wires carried upon steel piers 60 feet in height and 14 feet square at the base, resting upon solid and permanent foundations, one of which piers was known by the purchaser to be upon the land.

6. Executors and administrators ⊂⊃370—Purchaser from executor not excused from performance by depreciation caused by flood.

One contracting to purchase land from an executor under order of court under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1536, 1538, as they stood prior to 1919, was not excused from performance by reason of fact that the property suffered depreciation by flood, being in equity the owner of the land, of which he was in possession under the contract.

7. Specific performance ⊂⊃4 — Executor may sue for specific performance, notwithstanding remedy provided by statute.

The remedy provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1554, providing that property sold by an executor under contract pursuant to an order of court under sections 1536, 1538, as they stood prior to 1919, might be resold, and the present purchaser held responsible for any deficit, is not exclusive, and does not prevent a resort by the executor to a suit for specific performance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Alva R. McCarty, executor of the last will and testament of Anna E. McCarty, deceased, against Philip L. Wilson, who filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment denying either party relief, both appeal. Reversed as to plaintiff, and affirmed as to defendant.

Alva R. McCarty and Allison & Dickson, all of San Bernardino, and Edwin A. Meserve and Shirley E. Meserve, both of Los Angeles, for plaintiff.

A. W. Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for defendant.

LENNON, J. This is an action wherein plaintiff, as executor of the estate of one Anna E. McCarty, deceased, seeks the specific performance of a contract to purchase certain real property belonging to said estate. Defendant has undertaken to avoid the contract on various grounds, and by cross-complaint seeks to recover a deposit made by him. The trial court denied relief to plaintiff on his complaint and to defendant on his cross-complaint, and each party has appealed from that portion of the judgment adverse to him, both appeals being presented in a joint transcript and joint briefs.

[1-3] There is no merit in the contention that the bill of exceptions cannot be rightly resorted to in aid of the points made upon appeal. The bill was returned engrossed within the required time, and whether or not it had been correctly engrossed was a matter for the determination of the trial judge. Merced Bank v. Price, 152 Cal. 697, 93 Pac. 866. Although the bill in the instant case had been ordered settled and engrossed, it was not in fact settled at the time the order in question here directing a re-engrossment was made. That is to say, the bill was not then certified as settled and filed as a record of the court, and, of course, this could not be done until it was engrossed. Fountain Water Co. v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. 648, 73 Pac. 590; Houghton v. Superior Court, 128 Cal. 352, 60 Pac. 972. Therefore, plaintiff's application for a re-engrossment of the bill was made in a proceeding which "had not been taken or completed in a legal sense, so as to be susceptible of having applied to it the statutory limit of six months, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure." Smith v. City of Stockton, 73 Cal. 204, 14 Pac. 675. It follows that, even though the bill may have been returned defectively engrossed, the trial judge still retained jurisdictional control over the settlement of the bill, even though the time prescribed for the original presentation of the bill had expired, and accordingly had the power to direct a re-engrossment so as to make the bill conform with verity and brevity by excluding therefrom such matters as were admittedly not necessary to a proper presentation of plaintiff's appeal, and obviously of no avail to the defendant's case upon appeal. Warner v. Thomas, etc., Works, 105 Cal. 409, 38 Pac. 960. Upon plaintiff's application for re-engrossment counsel for defendant was present by agreement, and was heard upon his objection that matters material to him would be eliminated by the re-engrossment as ordered, and the court, being fully advised in the matter, denied this objection. In so doing, its order is conclusive, on the record before us, that the matter stricken out was not material. Hyde v. Boyle, 89 Cal. 590, 26 Pac. 1092; In re Gates, 90 Cal. 257, 27 Pac. 195.

[4] The sale sought to be enforced herein was made pursuant to an order of the probate court which had jurisdiction of the estate of the deceased. Defendant insists, and the trial court held, that the probate court did not have jurisdiction to make the order of sale by reason of a defect in the order to show cause, published as the notice of the hearing of the petition of the executor of the estate for an order authorizing and directing the sale of the real estate involved in the present action. At the time the sale in question was made the Code of Civil Procedure authorized the court to make an order for the sale of real estate comprised in the estate of a decedent in case of necessity to pay debts, family allowance, and the like, or in case it appeared to the satisfaction of the court that it would be for the "advantage, benefit and best interests of the estate and those interested therein." Code Civ. Proc. § 1536, prior to 1919 amendment (St. 1919, p. 1179). Section 1538 of the same Code, repealed in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 1177), was in effect at the time the sale was made, and provided that when it appeared to the court from the petition of the executor or administrator that it was necessary or would be beneficial to sell the whole or some portion of the real estate for the purposes and reasons designated by law, or any of them, the petition must be filed, "and an order thereupon made, directing all persons interested in the estate to appear before the court, at a time and place specified * * * to show cause why an order should not be granted to the executor or administrator for the sale of such estate." (Italics ours.) The order which is now under attack required all persons interested "to show cause why an order should not be granted to said executor to sell so much of the real estate of said deceased at private sale, as shall be necessary." (Italics ours.) Defendant contends that the use of the word "necessary" amounted to a fatal variation from the language required by the statute, and that it was, moreover, positively misleading, inasmuch as the sale was not sought because it was "necessary" to meet debts, expenses, or the like, but rather on the ground that it would be beneficial to the estate, a ground which, it is insisted, was concealed and even negatived by the wording of the order. The argument is ingenious, but without merit. Reading section 1538 of the Code of Civil Procedure as a whole, it is obvious that the words "such estate" are used to designate, and do in fact mean, so much of the real estate of the deceased as the court in the exercise of its sound discretion may consider necessary to be sold, whether to secure cash to pay debts or the like or to secure the most advantageous and beneficial administration of the estate, or the advantage, benefit, and best interest of those interested, and it is expressed aptly and plainly by the language of the order to show cause which defendant criticizes. The suggestion that the word "necessary" as used in the order, should be construed as "necessary to pay debts and expenses," lies at the foundation of this criticism. The word "necessary," as used in the order, fairly and naturally means "necessary for any lawful purpose," and, so construed, it makes the language of the order comply substantially with the requirement of the statute. The validity of the sale cannot therefore be attacked on the ground that the probate court did not acquire jurisdiction to order the sale by reason of any defect in the order to show cause. The view which we have taken of the case makes it unnecessary for us to consider the point raised in the briefs concerning the precise effect upon the validity of subsequent proceedings of a defect in such an order.

[5] The order of sale was valid and within the jurisdiction of the probate court. It is therefore doubtful whether the defendant, having failed to appeal from the order confirming the sale, which fixed his liability as a purchaser, has the right to set up, as a defense to the action for the purchase price, alleged defects in the title which were within his knowledge at the time the order of confirmation was made. Hammond v. Cailleaud, 111 Cal. 206, 220, 43 Pac. 607, 52 Am. St. Rep. 167. However that may be, we are of the opinion that there is no merit in any of these defenses. Defendant contends that the claimed defect in the order to show cause, even if not in fact sufficient to vitiate subsequent proceedings, at least threw a sufficient doubt upon the title to make specific performance impossible. It cannot be fairly said that there was any defect in the order to show cause, which had the effect of throwing any reasonable doubt upon the title. Defendant's chief ground for resisting the specific performance of his contract with the estate is based upon an alleged failure of plaintiff to perform an agreement that defendant should receive a deed and certificate of title showing title in him free from incumbrances. The record shows that the incumbrance complained of existed openly, notoriously, and continuously throughout the entire period covered by the transactions here in question, and consisted of an easement of way for an electric power transmission line consisting of wires carried upon steel towers 60 feet in height and 14 feet square at the base, resting upon solid and permanent foundations, one of which towers was known by defendant to be upon the land in question. A general agreement to convey land "free and clear of all incumbrances" does not refer to visible, physical burdens upon the land, permanent in character, and, in the absence of an express agreement, the vendee is presumed to have contracted to accept the land subject to physical incumbrances of an open and notorious nature. Ferguson v. Edgar, 178 Cal. 17, 171 Pac. 1061; Jaques v. Tomb, 179 Cal. 444, 177 Pac. 280; Sisk v. Caswell, 14 Cal. App. 377, 112 Pac. 185; Brewster on Conveyances, § 203. Therefore, even assuming that this representation to convey the land free and clear of incumbrances was made by plaintiff in his capacity as executor, and not as an individual, and assuming, also, that the defense may be considered in an action brought by the executor for the purchase price after confirmation of the sale, defendant cannot rely upon the representation as a ground for refusal to perform, for there has been no misrepresentation.

[6] Defendant finally insists that he is excused from performance by the circumstance that the property suffered a 10 per cent. depreciation in value by reason of a flood occurring between the time of the confirmation of the sale and the date of the commencement of the action. Bearing in mind that prior to the injury to the property defendant was in equity the owner of the land; that he was unquestionably entitled to the possession of the land under the contract with the estate, and that he had actually gone upon the land with men and teams and done about $1,700 worth of grading, we have no doubt that the risk of loss was upon him.

[7] By virtue of the right conferred by section 1554 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the property might have been resold and the present purchaser held responsible if, on the second sale, enough was not realized to pay costs and the amount of the present bid, but that remedy is not exclusive, and does not prevent a resort by the executor to a suit for specific performance. Crouse v. Peterson, 130 Cal. 169, 62 Pac. 475, 615, 80 Am. St. Rep. 89.

It follows from what has been said that plaintiff is entitled to have the contract specifically enforced. The judgment for plaintiff and cross-defendant upon the cross-complaint is affirmed, and the judgment for defendant upon the complaint is reversed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. In denying the petition for a rehearing we desire to say that, in regard to the claimed depreciation in value by reason of flood, the fact that upon the confirmation of the sale the whole purchase price at once became due and payable, at least upon the original tender and deposit of the deed by the executor, distinguishes the case from the cases relied upon by petitioner.

Rehearing denied.

In re WILSON'S ESTATE. (Sac. 3058.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 8, 1920. Rehearing Denied Nov. 4, 1920.)

1. Wills ⊂⊃440—Instrument must be construed according to intent of testator.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1317, 1318, the paramount rule in the construction of a will is that a will is to be construed according to the intention of the testator as expressed therein, which intention must be given effect as far as possible; statutory rules of interpretation are to be followed in so far as they aid in determining testator's intention, but all are subject to the rule that intention as shown by the will must prevail.

2. Wills ⊂⊃506(2)—"Heirs" defined.

The word "heirs" is a technical term, and in its technical sense means the persons entitled to succeed at a person's death to his estate in case of intestacy by virtue of the statutes relative to succession.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Heirs.]

3. Wills ⊂⊃506(2)—Nieces and nephews of testatrix entitled to her realty on son's death childless.

By her will giving her son all her realty for life, remainder to his living children, and, if he left none, then on his death to be distributed among "my heirs as provided by the laws of the state of California, the same as if I had died intestate," etc., testatrix's nephews and nieces, determined as of the termination of the son's life estate, surviving her son, who died without issue, held to be entitled to all of the realty, except property given absolutely by a codicil to the son, as against the son's surviving wife, it being the intention of testatrix, evident in other provisions, that the word "heirs" be not construed in the strict technical sense.

In Bank.

Appeals from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Ellen M. Wilson, deceased. From decree of final distribution, and from an order settling two final accounts, appeals are taken. Decree and order reversed.

Grove L. Johnson, of Sacramento, and Wm. M. Sims, of San Francisco, for appellant.

White, Miller, Needham & Harber, of Sacramento, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. We have here appeals from a decree of final distribution and from an order settling two final accounts. It is stipulated that if the decree of distribution is affirmed, the order settling the accounts shall likewise be affirmed, and that if the decree of distribution is reversed, the order settling the accounts must likewise be reversed.

The question presented on the appeal from the decree of final distribution is one of the construction to be given to certain provisions of the will of the deceased, in view of certain events that have happened since the death of deceased.

By her will, dated April 30, 1896, which was prepared by "an attorney of recognized standing and ability throughout the state of California," deceased first gave all her personal property to her son, Thaddeus McConnell, "to have and to hold the same absolutely, for his own use and benefit." Then followed the provisions as to her real property, which were, omitting certain words not important here, as follows:

"All the real property * * * I give and devise unto my said son, to have and to hold the same for and during the term of his life; and at his death the same shall go to and be the property of his then living children, * * * it being my intention to devise unto him a life estate in the whole of said realty, with remainder over at his death, to his then living children; and if he leave no issue, then upon his death, all such real property shall be distributed among my heirs, as provided by the laws of the state of California, the same as if I had died intestate.

"If my said son shall die before me, leaving issue, then all my property and estate, of every kind, shall go to such issue, to whom I hereby give, devise and bequeath the same; but if he shall die before me without issue, then I give, devise and bequeath the whole of my property and estate * * * unto my heirs, * * * the same to be distributed among them according to the Californian laws of succession in cases of intestacy."

The son was designated as executor, without bonds.

The first codicil, dated February 14, 1898, and admitted to probate as a part of the will, gave $4,000 and a diamond ring to her niece, Carrie J. Doolittle, and contained the following provision, viz.:

"I also give and bequeath to my beloved son Thaddeus C. McConnell my ranch property known as the Stickney place to be his own property, in fee simple, free from all claims or conditions whatsoever."

On June 2, 1899, she executed a second codicil which merely revoked the legacy of $4,000 to Carrie J. Doolittle, the amount of the same having been given her that day in money, and confirmed and ratified her previously executed will in all other respects.

At the date of the original will Mrs. Wilson was a widow of the age of about 60 years, and Thaddeus C. McConnell, her son by her first husband, was her only child. He was then about 31 years of age and married, but without issue. He had then been married about 4 years. He was possessed of real and personal property, received by him from his father's estate, having taken one half of such estate, while his mother took the other half. Mrs. Wilson's estate consisted entirely of the property derived from her first husband's estate and additional property acquired through her own subsequent investments. At the date of the execution of the will she had several brothers and sisters still living, and numerous nieces and nephews, and the relations between her and her relatives were "very friendly." In the year 1900, Thaddeus C. McConnell "had born to him a son." Mrs. Wilson died on or about April 7, 1907, leaving as her sole heir at law her son, Thaddeus C. McConnell. She left surviving her a brother and numerous nieces and nephews. The son of Thaddeus C. McConnell was accidentally killed in the year 1917, unmarried and without issue. Subsequent to her death and prior to the death of Thaddeus C. McConnell, her brother and one of the nieces, Ellen Flanagan Purchase, died, leaving certain heirs at law. On April 10, 1919, Thaddeus C. McConnell died testate, without living issue, and leaving as his sole heir at law and also his sole devisee and legatee, his widow, Etta M. McConnell.

This being the situation, the 19 nieces and nephews of Mrs. Wilson surviving Thaddeus C. McConnell, claimed to be entitled under the will to all of the real estate left by Mrs. Wilson, except the Stickney property given absolutely by the first codicil to the son. On the other hand, Etta M. McConnell, the surviving wife of Thaddeus C. McConnell, claimed to be entitled to all of the property, including such realty. This claim must, of necessity, be based upon the theory that her husband succeeded to the same under Mrs. Wilson's will, and that it has passed from him to her as his sole heir, legatee, and devisee. As to the personalty and the real property known as the Stickney property, her claim is concededly well based. The only dispute is as to the remaining realty. The superior court sustained the claim of Mrs. McConnell in all respects, and distributed all the property of Mrs. Wilson, including all the real property, to her. The nieces and nephews of Mrs. Wilson appeal from this decree.

[1, 2] The question presented is, of course, as to the intention of the testatrix as disclosed by the language she has used in her will, taking into view in case of any uncertainty arising upon the face of the will, the circumstances under which it was made, exclusive of her oral declarations. The paramount rule in the construction of wills, to which all other rules must yield, is that a will is to be construed according to the intention of the testator as expressed therein, and this intention must be given effect as far as possible. Civ. Code, §§ 1317 and 1318. Statutory rules of interpretation are to be followed in so far as they aid in determining the intention of the testator, but they are all subject to the fundamental rule that the intention as shown by the will must prevail. Respondent's claim is based on the use of the words "my heirs, as provided by the laws of the state of California, the same as if I had died intestate," in designating to whom this real property shall go in the event of the death, after her own death, of her son without living issue. Our statutory rules of interpretation of wills provide that "the words of a will are to be taken in their ordinary and grammatical sense, unless a clear intention to use them in another sense can be collected, and that other can be ascertained" (section 1324, Civ. Code), and that "technical words in a will are to be taken in their technical sense, unless the context clearly indicates a contrary intention, or unless it satisfactorily appears that the will was drawn solely by the testator, and that he was unacquainted with such technical sense." Section 1327, Civ. Code. The word "heirs" is a technical term, and in its "technical sense" one's "heirs" means the persons who would be entitled to succeed at his death to his estate in case of intestacy, by virtue of our statutes relative to succession. See Estate of Watts, 179 Cal. 20, 22, 175 Pac. 415. In this sense of the word the sole "heir" of the deceased was the son, Thaddeus C. McConnell, for at the time of the making of the will and thenceforth to the death of deceased he was entitled under our succession statute to succeed to the whole of her estate in the event of her death without a will. Subdivision 1, section 1386, Civ. Code. It is upon this fact that counsel for respondent base their claim. It is urged that no one can come within the designation "my heirs" other than the son, with the result that the will should be construed substantially as giving the real property absolutely to the son subject only to the contingency of his dying with issue surviving him, in which event it was to go on his death to such issue.

In support of their construction of the will learned counsel for respondent have cited and discussed very many decisions of courts of last resort. It may be said as to all of them that none disputes the paramount rule that the ultimate question is the intention of the testator as expressed in the will, and that technical rules of interpretation must yield to an intention clearly expressed. The real question discussed in all of them is, What did the testator mean in view of the language he has used in his will, in the light afforded by certain rules of interpretation which must prevail where a contrary intent does not clearly appear on the face of the will? Such is the question here involved. We have said:

"Of this class of questions it may be said, with more truth, perhaps, than of any other, that each case depends upon its own peculiar facts, and that precedents have comparatively small value. Except for the establishment of general principles, very little aid can be procured from adjudged cases in the construction of wills." Estate of Henderson, 161 Cal. 353, 357, 119 Pac. 496, 498.

See, also, Rosenberg v. Frank, 58 Cal. 387; Le Breton v. Cook, 107 Cal. 410, 416, 40 Pac. 552.

[3] To our minds, it seems perfectly clear from the will, in the light of those circumstances which we are entitled to consider, that the testatrix could not have intended her son to constitute or be included within the "my heirs" "among whom" the real property was to be distributed upon the death of the son without issue surviving. It is true that it has often been held that there is no legal inconsistency in an heir who is made a life tenant by a will being included among "the heirs" to whom the remainder is given. If there was nothing in the will here involved to show that others than the son were intended by the designation "my heirs" it might well be claimed that the courts must accept the term in its technical meaning as including only those who at the moment of the death of the testatrix, constituted her heirs at law, viz. her son. See Estate of Watts, supra. But the very language upon which respondent must rely, viz., "Then upon his [her son's] death, all such real property shall be distributed among my heirs, as provided by the laws of the state of California, the same as if I had died intestate," is opposed to the theory of any such intention. It is self-evident that while the son, who was in the strict technical sense the sole heir apparent of this widow of 60 years of age, was an heir, he could not be "heirs," nor could the real property be distributed "among" him, the term "distributed among" necessarily referring "to a gift to more than two" heirs. See In re Hildebrant's Estate (Pa.) 110 Atl. 760. It is almost impossible to conceive that the testatrix, knowing, as she must be held to have known, that her son was her sole heir at law, taking the word "heir" in the technical sense, would have used this language, "distributed among my heirs," etc., to indicate a gift to him.

Especially is this true in view of the fact that wherever before or after these words she referred to her son in the will she designated him as "my son, Thaddeus McConnell," or "my said son," or "my said son, Thaddeus McConnell," indicating that in every case where she intended to provide for or refer to him, she thus described him. If she had intended him or his heirs or devisees to take the real property absolutely in the event that he died after her leaving no issue, would she not necessarily have said, in view of the way in which she had theretofore referred to him, that in that event the real property was to be distributed to "my said son" or to "the heirs or devisees of my said son" instead of "shall be distributed among my heirs," etc.?

Furthermore, the intention to limit the interest of the son in the real property to a life estate appears to be most definitely and clearly expressed. Not only did the testatrix say that she gives the property to him "to have and to hold the same for and during the term of his life; and at his death the same shall go to and be the property of his then living children," but she went further and said, "it being my intention to devise unto him a life estate in the whole of said realty, with remainder over at his death, to his then living children," following this with the provision that "if he leave no issue, then upon his death, all such real property shall be distributed among my heirs," etc. It seems clear that in so far as her son was concerned, the provisions specifically made for him were intended to be the sole provisions in his behalf, and that by the term "my heirs" who were to take in default of issue of her son surviving him was meant her next of kin other than her son. This view is strengthened by the provision made in the next paragraph as to those who shall take her property if her son should die before her. If he died leaving issue, the property was to go to such issue, but if he died before her without issue, then she gives all her property "unto my heirs—the same to be distributed among them according to the Californian laws of succession in cases of intestacy," to the entire exclusion of the wife of the son, or any heir, devisee or legatee of the son.

Particular reliance is placed by counsel for respondent on the words following "my heirs," viz. "as provided by the laws of the state of California, the same as if I had died intestate," but we do not see that they strengthen their claim that the son was intended to be included within the term "my heirs." Obviously this language referred simply to the manner of distribution among the persons constituting "my heirs" "among" whom the property was to be distributed. She gives the property to "my heirs" to be distributed among them in the same manner as is provided by law in cases of intestacy. This thought was clearly in mind with regard to the succeeding paragraph, the paragraph dealing with the property in the event that the son died before her, and is perhaps better expressed therein. She there gave the property in a certain contingency "unto my heirs—the same to be distributed among them according to the Californian laws of succession in cases of intestacy." In each the idea is that the property is given to the persons denominated "my heirs," to be apportioned among them in the manner provided by the succession statute in case of intestacy.

As we have practically said, it is clearly manifest on the face of this will, when considered as an entirety, that the testatrix could not have intended her son or any person claiming under her son to be included within the "my heirs," "among whom" in a certain contingency the real property was to be distributed. Considering the will in its entirety, the scheme of the testatrix is perfectly clear to our minds. If her son died before her leaving issue, she desired such issue to have all her property, and if he died before her without issue surviving, she desired her own relatives to have all the property, to the utter exclusion of any person or persons taking solely under the son. If he survived her she desired him to have all her personal property as his own, and a life estate only in her realty, with remainder to any of his children who survived him, but if, surviving her, he died without issue surviving him, she desired the real property to go to her next of kin, other than her son.

The case is one where "the context clearly indicates" (section 1327, Civ. Code) that the word "heirs" was not used in the strict technical sense as designating the person or persons who would have succeeded under our succession statutes to the estate of deceased had she died intestate, but was intended to designate only those who would have been her heirs at law but for her son, either at the time of her death or at the termination of the life estate, by the death of the son.

Whether in view of the language of the will such heirs are to be determined as of the date of the death of the deceased or as of the date of the death of the life tenant is a matter of no great moment to the respondent, who was not entitled to any of the real property in dispute in either event, but we think it clear that the intention was that they should be determined as of the date of the termination of the life estate. Apparently those who appeared to claim the realty as against the respondent in the lower court would have been entitled to the great bulk of the realty in either event, all being "heirs" of the deceased but for the son and his issue, both at the date of the death of deceased, and at the termination of the life estate. If the heirs are to be determined as of the date of the termination of the life estate, as we think is the proper construction of the will, such claimants constitute the whole of the heirs to whom such realty is given, and they are entitled to distribution thereof.

The decree of distribution and the order settling the accounts are reversed.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a rehearing is denied. In view, however, of the application for modification of the opinion filed herein by one Thomas McConnell, claiming to be an "heir" of deceased within the meaning of the will, and in order that he and others similarly related may not be prejudiced by anything said in the opinion, the last paragraph of the opinion is hereby amended to read as follows:

"If the heirs are to be determined as of the date of the termination of the life estate, as we think is the proper construction of the will, in so far as the record before us shows such claimants constitute the whole of the heirs to whom such realty is given."

BRADFORD v. TRAPP et al. (Civ. 3506.)

1. Judgment ⟸501—Binding on other courts when within jurisdiction.

Judgment of a court having jurisdiction is binding on other courts, errors being correctable only from within by motion or appeal.

2. Judgment ⟸719—Conclusive on parties on matters in issue passed on.

Judgment of a court having jurisdiction is, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1908, conclusive on the parties on all issues raised in the pleadings and passed on; so the parties may not litigate the same matter in a new action.

3. Records ⟸18(6, 7) — Service in statutory mode effective.

Service of summons in a McEnerney Act suit in the statutory manner is as effective as personal service.

4. Records ⟸18(10)—Error in decision not a mistake.

Error in the decision of the issue of title, directly before the court in a McEnerney Act suit, is not, in the legal sense, a "mistake" for which the judgment may be impeached.

5. Records ⟸18(10)—Not set aside for forged deed in evidence, equivalent to perjured testimony.

The forged deed in evidence on which plaintiffs in a McEnerney Act suit based title is the equivalent of perjured testimony for which a judgment cannot be set aside.

6. Records ⟸18(10)—Grantor in forged deed is a party bound by proceedings to establish title.

The grantor in a forged deed, which was the basis of the title of plaintiffs in a McEnerney

Act suit against all persons claiming any title in the property, was a party, as though expressly named, and so after the time for appeal bound by the regular judgment for plaintiffs; there having been no mistake and no fraud of plaintiffs for which the judgment can be impeached.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Suit by William Bradford against John G. Trapp and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

George Clark Sargent, Tobin & Tobin, and Geo. A. Clough, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Charles L. Brown and Clarence E. Todd, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KINSELL, Judge pro tem. Defendants prosecute this appeal from a judgment in a suit in equity brought to vacate a judgment obtained by them as plaintiffs in a suit brought pursuant to the McEnerney Act (St. [Ex. Sess.] 1906, p. 78) against all persons.

There is no material dispute as to the facts of the case, which are substantially as follows:

Defendants purchased certain real property on March 4, 1915, and upon paying therefor received a deed wherein one William Bradford was named as grantor, which deed was immediately recorded. They entered into possession of the premises and proceeded to erect a dwelling thereon, and on June 4, 1915, commenced a suit under the McEnerney Act, which resulted in a judgment establishing the fact that they were the sole owners of the premises, which judgment was entered September 25, 1915. The proceedings in such suit are apparently regular, and the judgment on the face of the record appears to be valid. The respondent was not in name made a party defendant in such suit nor was he personally served with summons therein.

In January, 1917, after the McEnerney judgment had become final, respondent Bradford appeared, claiming that the deed to appellants, and on which they based their title and claim in the McEnerney suit, was a forgery. His motion for relief in the McEnerney suit having been denied, the present suit was instituted.

In this suit respondent recovered the judgment from which the appeal is taken. The respondent sought judgment on several counts, but that relied upon, and upon which the judgment of the lower court rests, sets forth that the judgment in the McEnerney suit was granted by mistake in that it was not disclosed to the court that said deed purporting to have been executed by respondent to the appellants was a forgery. There is no element of fraud involved, since it appears affirmatively, and the trial court found, that the appellants did not know their deed to be a forgery, but believed it to be valid. The trial court further found, however, that the deed in dispute was a forgery.

Appellants contend that the judgment in the McEnerney suit is final and conclusive upon the question of title to the property. Stripped of its side issues concerning the admissibility of evidence, the appeal becomes practically a test of the strength of a McEnerney title.

It is our opinion that appellants' contention must be sustained.

[1] It is a doctrine of law too long established to require the citation of authorities that where a court has jurisdiction it has a right to decide every question arising in the cause, and, whether its decision be correct or otherwise, its judgment until reversed is binding on every other court. Errors which it may make must be corrected from within by motion or appeal.

[2] A judgment is conclusive upon all the issues raised in the pleadings and passed upon by the court, and the parties are precluded from litigating the same matter in a new action. Code Civ. Proc. sec. 1908.

[3] The proceedings in appellants' McEnerney suit were regular and the statutory mode and requirements for service of summons were fully complied with. Hence the service of summons by such mode was as effective for all purposes as personal service. Emery v. Kipp, 154 Cal. 83, 97 Pac. 17, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 983, 129 Am. St. Rep. 141, 16 Ann. Cas. 792.

[4] It is true, as respondent contends, that a judgment may be impeached for mistake as well as for fraud, but error by the court in the decision of an issue squarely before it is not, in the legal sense of the word, a mistake. The court in the McEnerney suit had jurisdiction to try and determine all estates in the property. Title was the issue directly before the court. Its mistake, if any, was one in the very matter before it; hence it was intrinsic and not subject to correction after the time for appeal had expired.

[5] The forged deed in evidence was the equivalent of perjured testimony, and it is the settled law of this state that a judgment cannot be set aside because it is predicated upon perjured testimony. There must be an end to litigation. Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 25 Pac. 970, 27 Pac. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159; People v. Mooney, 178 Cal. 525, 174 Pac. 325.

[6] Since the McEnerney suit brought in as defendants all persons claiming any estate in the property in dispute, respondent was in law a party thereto just as though he had been expressly named therein. The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, and the decree operated upon all persons claiming or having any claim to any estate, right, or title in the property in question.

Judgment is therefore reversed, and the trial court is instructed to enter judgment for defendants.

MATHEWS v. MATHEWS. (Civ. 3408.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 6, 1920.)

1. Divorce ⟸243—Interlocutory judgment for permanent alimony enforceable though not carried into final decree.

Provision in an interlocutory judgment of divorce for payment of certain permanent alimony, though subject to modification, need not be expressly carried into the final decree to be enforceable where not modified.

2. Divorce ⟸243—Award of permanent alimony in interlocutory judgment not modified by silence of final decree.

Silence of the final decree of divorce as to alimony is not to be taken as a modification of the provision of the interlocutory judgment for payment of certain permanent alimony, but as an acquiescence in the correctness of the judgment in that respect.

3. Divorce ⟸245(1)—Alimony may be modified.

Under Civ. Code, § 137, the court at all times has power to modify its orders in respect to alimony, at least where they are based on evidence heard rather than on the parties' agreement.

4. Appeal and error ⟸854(2)—Erroneous order as to alimony not sustained on reason not given.

The principle that an order sustaining a demurrer or a motion for a new trial may be upheld on a ground of the demurrer or motion, though an erroneous reason is assigned by the trial court for its action, held not applicable to erroneous order that alimony cannot be collected because the provision of the interlocutory judgment was not carried into the final decree.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Ada E. Mathews against William H. Mathews. From an adverse order, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

H. W. Glensor and Aitken, Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for respondent.

KINSELL, Judge pro tem. Appeal from a special order of the superior court of San Mateo county, granted on motion of defendant for an order vacating the portion of an interlocutory judgment allowing plaintiff alimony.

Plaintiff instituted the action for divorce on grounds of extreme cruelty. Before a trial a written stipulation was entered into between the parties which provided, among other matters, that if the court awarded a decree of divorce to plaintiff, $30 per month might be awarded to plaintiff as permanent alimony. Thereafter an interlocutory judgment was granted to plaintiff which provided that defendant pay plaintiff $30 per month as permanent alimony. This interlocutory judgment was not appealed from nor modified, and, the necessary time having elapsed, final decree of divorce was entered, which decree was silent on the subject of maintenance or alimony.

Shortly after six months from the entry of such final decree defendant moved to modify the interlocutory judgment by vacating the portion thereof which provides for the payment of alimony. Such motion was made upon the grounds that the final decree did not contain any direction as to the payment of alimony, and that the financial circumstances of the parties had so changed as to make the requirement as to payment of alimony unjust. The motion was supported by the affidavit of defendant, alleging changes in the financial situation of the parties, as well as other matters immaterial to our consideration of the case. Plaintiff filed a counter affidavit setting forth the stipulation above referred to, and joining issue with the averments of defendant's affidavit as to the financial status of the parties.

The motion having been submitted, the trial court made the following order:

"Payment of alimony provided in the interlocutory decree herein was not carried into the final decree, and hence alimony herein cannot now be collected."

[1, 2] It is respondent's contention, apparently approved by the trial court, that since the final decree made no reference to the subject of alimony, he is entitled to relief from the payment required by the interlocutory judgment.

With this contention we cannot agree. The failure of the court to carry into its final decree the provisions for alimony provided in the interlocutory judgment does not in or of itself entitle the husband to an order relieving him from the requirements of the interlocutory judgment in that behalf. By section 137, Civil Code, it is provided that when an action for divorce is pending the court may require the husband to pay as alimony any money necessary to enable the wife to support herself and her children. Thus, when the court by its judgment does require the husband to pay alimony, and that judgment is not appealed from or vacated, it stands as the judicial determination of the right of the wife to such alimony, subject always to the retention by the court of jurisdiction to modify its judgment from time to time in that respect.

That the court may modify its orders with respect to alimony there can be no question. It is so provided in Civil Code, § 139, and our courts have so held. See Howell v. Howell, 104 Cal. 45, 37 Pac. 770, 43 Am. St. Rep. 70; Soule v. Soule, 4 Cal. App. 97, 87 Pac. 205.

In Bancroft v. Bancroft, 178 Cal. 367, 173 Pac. 582, our Supreme Court said:

"It is well settled that an interlocutory decree of divorce is only subject to attack in the proceeding in which it is entered upon appeal, or by proceedings under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, within six months after the entry of such decree, and that, after the expiration of the period within which either of these forms of attack may be made, the trial court is without jurisdiction to alter or set aside its interlocutory decree."

That is a correct statement of the law, but is not intended to, nor does it, mean that provisions in such interlocutory decree for payment of alimony may not be modified.

In the instant case the right to alimony was presented and litigated in the action and established by the interlocutory judgment. The trial court would have the right to modify the order in that respect in and by the final decree, as well as before or after entering the same, but it did not do so, nor can it be said that the judgment was modified by the final decree in respect to alimony simply because such decree is silent on that subject. On the contrary, silence at such time must be construed to be acquiescence in the correctness of the previous judgment on that subject.

[3] It is urged by appellant that the alimony provisions of the interlocutory judgment cannot be modified because they were fixed by agreement of the parties. We cannot assume in this case that such provisions were fixed by agreement. The so-called agreement is simply a stipulation as to what the court might do with respect to permanent alimony if at the trial of the cause a divorce were awarded plaintiff. Since at such trial evidence was taken, and the decree makes no reference to the stipulation of the parties concerning alimony, we must assume, in the absence of further showing, that the award of the trial court was based upon the proofs taken on the trial, rather than upon agreement of the parties. Under such circumstances the court at all times has power to modify its orders in respect to alimony. Soule v. Soule, supra. No showing having been made that the requirements of the interlocutory judgment as to payment of alimony were made pursuant to agreement of the parties, it is unnecessary for us to decide whether the court would lose its right to modify an order based solely upon such agreement.

[4] Respondent urges that, because of the fact that his motion sought relief on the further ground that the financial circumstances of the parties had changed, we should uphold the ruling of the lower court. We are cited to numerous authorities holding that, in the event of a ruling by the lower court on a demurrer or motion for new trial, the respondent is not limited to the reason assigned by the trial court for its action, but may urge all the grounds specified in his demurrer or notice of motion. Burke v. Maguire, 154 Cal. 461, 98 Pac. 21; Morgan v. Robinson, 157 Cal. 348, 107 Pac. 695. The soundness of these decisions cannot be questioned, but they are not applicable to the present case.

This appeal is prosecuted from the special order of the trial court above quoted. The proceeding was instituted by defendant's motion. The court did not grant such motion, but made an order which shows by its very terms that it was based upon the proposition that a provision for the payment of alimony in an interlocutory judgment of divorce cannot be enforced unless it is carried into the final decree. Such is not the law.

The trial court's order was erroneously made, and is reversed.

KATSCHINSKI v. KELLER et al.
(Civ. 3485.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 29, 1920.)

1. Trade-marks and trade-names ⊜93(3)—Evidence held not to sustain findings defendants had never done business under name complained of.

In an action to restrain defendants from conducting a shoe store under the name of "Philadelphia Shoe Store," evidence held not to support the trial court's findings adverse to plaintiff that the defendants had never at any time done business, and were not doing business, under such name, and that plaintiff had never demanded of defendants that they desist from using such name.

2. Trade-marks and trade-names ⊜9—Geographical name used fictitiously to indicate ownership may be good.

When a geographical name is not used in a geographical sense, but in a fictitious sense merely to indicate ownership independent of location, as the name "Philadelphia Shoe Store" used by plaintiff doing business in California and seeking to enjoin defendants from using the same name, it may be a good trademark or trade-name.

3. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1122(2)—Clear evidence does not warrant appellate court in making finding.

Though the evidence is clear and undisputed on a given point of fact, the appellate court is not thereby warranted in making a finding thereon, which duty rests solely with the trial court.

4. Trial ⊂⊃397(1)—Admission by counsel on point of fact not so clear as to relieve court from making finding.

In an action to enjoin defendants from using the name "Philadelphia Shoe Store," claimed admission by defendants' counsel during trial that they were doing business under such name, and not under the name of "Philadelphia Shoe Store of Fresno," held not so clear and definite, in view of the record, as to relieve the trial court of making a finding thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action by Bernard Katschinski against John J. Keller and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Norman A. Eisner, of San Francisco, for appellant.

E. A. Williams and C. K. Bonestell, both of Fresno, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff and appellant, doing business under the name and style of "Philadelphia Shoe Company," with its principal place of business in San Francisco, commenced this action to restrain defendants from conducting the same line of business in the city of Fresno under the name of "Philadelphia Shoe Store." Two causes of action were included in the complaint, the first based upon plaintiff's exclusive state ownership of the name by virtue of his continuous use thereof since 1881 and his registration of the trade-name with the secretary of state pursuant to section 3197 of the Political Code, and the second based on the common-law right of protection against unfair trade and competition. Judgment was given in favor of defendants, from which plaintiff has appealed on the ground that the evidence does not support the findings made by the trial court.

The allegations of the first cause of action found to be true by the court are, generally, that in 1881 plaintiff commenced doing business as a dealer in boots and shoes in the state of California, with his principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco, under the name of "Philadelphia Shoe Company," and adopted said name as a trade-name in his said business; that ever since said date he has conducted and is now conducting his said business under said trade-name; that on the 12th day of July, 1900, and before the filing of said trade-name by any other person, plaintiff filed with the secretary of state his claim to said name pursuant to section 3197 of the Political Code; that the name "Philadelphia" as adopted and used by plaintiff in connection with said business was and is a purely arbitrary and fanciful designation for the purpose of identifying and distinguishing the business of plaintiff, and has not been used for the purpose of indicating a particular locality as in any way connected with the business or the place where the business is carried on.

[1] The findings of the trial court as to the first cause of action adverse to plaintiff are that the defendants have never at any time done business, nor are they now doing business, in the name and style of "Philadelphia Shoe Store," and that plaintiff has never demanded of defendants that they desist from using the name "Philadelphia Shoe Store." That these findings are not supported by the evidence is too plain to be questioned, and this apparently is conceded by counsel for respondents, as they have made no attempt in their brief to sustain the findings. At the trial the defendants offered no evidence on any branch of the case. The evidence produced by plaintiff showed conclusively that defendants for a long time prior to the time of the commencement of the action had been doing business in the city of Fresno under the name of "Philadelphia Shoe Store"; that their checks were signed in that manner; that their stationery contained the same designation, and it is argued that their certificate of copartnership under which they were doing business carried the name "Philadelphia Shoe Store." There was not a particle of evidence controverting this showing, and, in fact, the court found in relation to the second cause of action "that defendants are copartners doing business in the city of Fresno, county of Fresno, state of California, under the name and style of Philadelphia Shoe Store." As to the finding with reference to plaintiff's demand of defendants that they desist from using the name "Philadelphia Shoe Store," the only evidence of any nature upon this branch of the case was to the effect that such demand had been made. Furthermore, demand was admitted by defendants' failure to deny the allegations of the complaint relating thereto.

As to the second cause of action, the court found that the defendants were copartners doing business in the city of Fresno under the name and style of "Philadelphia Shoe Store," and followed this immediately with a finding that they were not doing so. The evidence upon which this latter finding is based being the same as that hereinbefore referred to in relation to the first cause of action, the error of the finding is apparent.

Objection is also made to other findings of the trial court relating to the second cause of action, but it will serve no purpose to discuss them here, inasmuch as from what has heretofore been said it is apparent the judgment must be reversed, and it is unlikely that the same errors will again occur.

[2] Respondents rest their case on this appeal upon the argument that the word "Philadelphia," being a geographical name, is one which cannot be exclusively appropriated by plaintiff. The argument is unsound. The allegations of the complaint, the evidence offered at the trial, and the finding of the trial court all show that the word "Philadelphia" was used by both parties as a purely arbitrary and fanciful name for the purpose of distinguishing and identifying the business, and not in any way in a geographical sense. When a geographical name is not used in a geographical sense, but is used in a fictitious sense merely to indicate ownership, independent of location, it may be a good trade-mark or trade-name. Drake Medicine Co. v. Glessner, 68 Ohio St. 337, 67 N. E. 722, 727; Sanders v. Utt, 16 Mo. App. 322, 326.

[3, 4] Appellant insists that this court should direct judgment in his favor because the evidence upon which the adverse findings are based is so clear and undisputed that the findings must be disregarded as nugatory. It is true that as to the finding of failure to make demand the allegations of plaintiff's complaint were admitted by the failure of defendants to deny them, and the adverse finding should be disregarded. But as to the use of the name "Philadelphia Shoe Store" the admissions in the pleadings are not sufficient to relieve the court of a finding upon that issue. The evidence is clear and undisputed, but this does not warrant this court in making a finding thereon. That duty rests solely with the trial court. It is argued that counsel for defendants admitted during the course of the trial that they were doing business under that name, and a portion of the record is quoted in appellant's brief to support that argument. Reference to the record discloses that the admission made by counsel for defendants did not go to the extent claimed by appellant. During the course of the trial plaintiff offered in evidence the certificate of copartnership of defendants as indicating that they were doing business under the name of "Philadelphia Shoe Store." The court asked if it would be admitted, and counsel for defendants answered in the affirmative. It was then stated by plaintiff's counsel:

"They admit now that they are doing business now under the name of Philadelphia Shoe Store."

To which counsel for defendants replied:

"The admission is in the record. We are not making any admission now. Your allegation in the complaint is not denied."

To which counsel for plaintiff replied:

"I understood you did deny it. You allege in your answer that you are not doing business under the name of Philadelphia Shoe Store, but under the name of Philadelphia Shoe Store of Fresno. I am offering this to prove that you are doing business without any appendage to it, but just Philadelphia Shoe Store. If you make an admission to that effect, I don't need to make proof; if it is not, I will prove it. I will offer the certificate."

To which defendants made no objection and stipulated that the certificate be read. It is not made a part of the record, and it is now impossible to determine its contents. Upon this state of the record the court cannot say that the admission was so clear and definite as to relieve the court of making any finding thereon.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

LANE v. PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO.
(Civ. 3545.)

1. Gas ⟸13(6)—In action for discontinuing service a rule of commission, requiring deposit of amount of disputed bill, was admissible.

In a damage action against a gas company for discontinuing service, it was proper to introduce a rule of the Railroad Commission, preventing such companies from discontinuing service for nonpayment of disputed bills on deposit of the amount of the bill.

2. Gas ⟸13(6)—Rule requiring deposit to prevent company cutting off gas held applicable.

A rule of the Railroad Commission, preventing companies from discontinuing gas service for nonpayment of disputed bills for metered service, where consumer deposited amount with Railroad Commission, applies to bill for gas which a defective meter had failed to measure, but which amount had been determined by test.

3. Gas ⟸13(6)—Rule preventing gas companies cutting off service for nonpayment of bills, not void.

A rule of the Railroad Commission, preventing water, gas, and light companies from discontinuing service because of nonpayment of disputed bills, where consumer placed the amount in dispute with the commission for settlement, is not void because of provisions of Public Utilities Act, §§ 13, 73, giving patrons of gas companies a right of action for its illegal acts.

4. Appeal and error ⊂=1064(4)—Reference to order of Railroad Commission as statute in instructions held not prejudicial error.

In an action against a gas company for shutting off service, a slip of the tongue on the part of trial judge, by which he referred to a rule of a railroad commission relating thereto as a statute, could not have prejudiced plaintiff's case before the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Helen V. Lane against the Pacific Gas & Electric Company. Verdict and judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Reisner & Stoney, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Thos. J. Straub, Wm. B. Bosley, and Stanley Moore, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. This is an action for damages for the discontinuance by defendant of the service of gas to plaintiff's premises. The defendant had a verdict from a jury, and from the judgment entered upon it the plaintiff appeals.

[1] The pertinent facts of the case are few; the questions of law arising therefrom simple. A meter was installed by defendant on plaintiff's premises on January 18, 1918, for measuring the gas used by plaintiff. The defendant supplied gas to plaintiff measured through this meter until February 24, 1919. During this period defendant presented bills monthly to plaintiff for the gas consumed as indicated by this meter, and these bills were paid by plaintiff. About December 13, 1918, defendant discovered that the meter did not register correctly, and installed on that date a new meter. This new meter registered more gas than the old meter. Thereupon the defendant estimated a quantity of gas, which it claimed plaintiff had used in excess of that registered by the former meter during the time the latter was in operation, and presented a bill of $26.30 for the same. Plaintiff disputed the bill, and refused to pay it. She was willing to pay for all gas registered by the meters, new and old, but not for this estimated quantity above the readings of the meters. Thereupon defendant demanded by letter that the plaintiff deposit the $26.30 thus claimed with the Railroad Commission, and submit the controversy between the parties to that body for decision. This she refused to do, and defendant thereupon shut off her gas. She then brought this action to recover from the defendant $25,045.50 as damages.

In course of the trial the defendant offered rule 6 of the Railroad Commission in evidence, and it was admitted. The court also gave to the jury the following instruction as to the effect of this rule upon the rights of the parties:

"I instruct the jury that the following rule and regulations on the subject of the disputed bills has been established for the guidance of the defendant and its consumers by the Railroad Commission of the state of California: 'A water, gas, electric or telephone utility may not discontinue service by reason of nonpayment of bills for metered or measured service theretofore delivered, in cases in which there is a dispute as to the amount of the bill. In case of such dispute the consumer shall deposit with the Railroad Commission the amount claimed by the utility to be due, whereupon the Railroad Commission will investigate the facts and communicate its findings to the parties. Failure of the consumer to make such deposit within fifteen days after demand by the utility that such deposit shall be made, shall warrant the utility in discontinuing the service.' And I further instruct you that the defendant and its consumers are bound and controlled by the above regulation of the Railroad Commission. If you believe in this case that there was a dispute between the plaintiff and the defendant as to the correct amount of the bill rendered by the defendant for gas service from June 1, to December 13, 1918, claimed to have been furnished to the plaintiff, and that thereafter the defendant notified the plaintiff to deposit with the Railroad Commission of the state of California the amount claimed by the company to be due, in order that the Railroad Commission might investigate the facts and communicate its findings to the parties, and that the defendant notified the plaintiff that the service would be discontinued if she failed to deposit such amount with the Railroad Commission or pay the same within 15 days after the defendant's notice so to do, and that after receiving said notice the plaintiff failed for said period of 15 days thereafter to either deposit the amount of the disputed bill with the Railroad Commission or to pay the same, or any part thereof, then and under such circumstances the court instructs the jury that the defendant was justified at the end of 15 days in discontinuing the service without further notice."

Upon the admission of the rule in evidence and the above instruction predicated thereon the plaintiff bases her demand for a reversal of the judgment.

Neither the admission of the rule in evidence nor the instruction was erroneous. Pursuing the course laid down by the rules of the Railroad Commission in the matter was a complete defense to this action. This court so held in Hartigan v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 38 Cal. App. 763, 177 Pac. 484. In deciding that case, the facts of which were in most respects similar to this, this court said:

"The court is of the opinion that the petition for the writ is deficient in its failure to state that the petitioner had complied with the rules and regulations formulated by the Railroad Commission under the Public Utilities Act of this state (St. 1911, Ex. Sess., p. 18); the commission being given statutory control of the subject-matter involved in this particular proceeding. For that reason the demurrer to the petition will be sustained."

[2] The plaintiff contends, however, that rule 6 is not applicable to this case because, as it is claimed, it covers only "metered" and "measured" service, and that the gas here charged for was neither metered nor measured. The terms "metered" and "measured" are used in the rule to distinguish service paid for by quantity from that paid for at a flat time rate. The Railroad Commission so decided in its case No. 683. In that decision the Railroad Commission divides all services rendered by public utility companies, such as gas companies, into two kinds or classes only, to wit: (a) Metered service, by which is meant all service for which the consumer pays according to the amount of the commodity used by him; and (b) unmetered service, by which is meant service paid for at a flat rate per month, regardless of the quantity of the commodity actually consumed. This distinction seems to us reasonable, and, interpreted in the light of it rule 6, must be held to include the claim involved in this case.

[3] Nor can we agree with the contention of plaintiff that this rule is void because of the provisions of sections 13 and 73 of the Public Utilities Act. Those sections give patrons of gas companies rights of action for illegal acts committed by the public utility, but in making this rule the commission acted within its authority (Hartigan v. P. G. & E. Co., supra; Pac. Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Eshelman, 116 Cal. 640, 137 Pac. 1119, 50 L. R. A. [N. S.] 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822, Const., art. 12, § 23); and, if the facts were as above recited —which is not disputed—the defendant corporation was acting strictly within its rights when it shut off the plaintiff's gas, after she had refused to comply with its demand that she submit her controversy to the commission. This much may be further said concerning this rule: It was formulated for the convenience and protection mainly of consumers, to prevent the purveyors of gas or water from shutting off the consumers' supply pending the decision of controversies as to their bills. The consumer can under the rule deposit the amount of the company's claim with the commission, and litigate the dispute before it, his supply being in the meantime continued, thus escaping the hardship of having his service cut off—an act of public utility concerns which frequently, from a practical standpoint, deprived the consumer of his remedy by appeal to the tedious processes of the regularly constituted courts in matters where the sums involved were usually trivial.

From all this it appears that the admission of the rule in evidence and the instruction based thereon were proper.

[4] The slip of the tongue on the part of Judge Hunt (for such it appears to have been), by which he referred to this rule as a statute of the state, could not have prejudiced the plaintiff's case before the jury. Whether statute or rule it was binding on them.

The judgment is affirmed.

LEARNED v. PENINSULA RAPID TRANSIT CO. (Civ. 3549.)

(District Court of Appeals, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 30, 1920.)

1. Trial ⟸296(7)—Instruction as to burden of proving negligence of another held not erroneous.

In an action by passenger for injuries, an instruction that the burden of proving the carrier's affirmative defense that the injuries were caused by the negligence of another was on carrier was not erroneous as requiring carrier to prove such negligence by a preponderance of the evidence, where the court also instructed the jury that throughout plaintiff must prove his case by preponderance of the evidence, and that defendant was not liable unless its negligence was either the sole or contributing cause to the accident.

2. Damages ⟸216(7)—Instructions as to future suffering held correct.

Instruction authorizing the jury to consider the pain and suffering which will be a result of the injuries sustained by her restricts recovery to the pain and suffering certain to result from the injuries, which is allowable under Civ. Code, § 3283, and is not objectionable as permitting the jury to speculate as to what suffering might thereafter be endured.

3. New trial ⟸101 — Testimony of unlocated witness not newly discovered.

A witness whose testimony was known to defendant before the trial, but whose location was unknown, so that he could not be produced at the trial, is not newly discovered evidence on which a motion for new trial can be based; defendant's remedy being by motion for continuance to procure the attendance of the witness.

4. New trial ⟸104(2)—Not granted for cumulative testimony.

Newly discovered evidence as to a fact concerning which a number of witnesses for both sides testified is cumulative, and does not require the granting of a new trial.

5. Appeal and error ⟸1004(3)—Verdict for $6,000 reduced to $2,000 held not to be reversed.

In a suit for personal injuries, where the verdict awarding plaintiff $6,000 was reduced by the trial court to $2,000, and there was evidence to support recovery for the latter sum, the appellate court will not reverse the judgment on the ground that it is excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Lillian Learned against the Peninsula Rapid Transit Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. D. Thomson, of Oakland, and Ray Benjamin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Reisner & Honey, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action for damages for injuries sustained by her in a collision between a motorbus of the defendant, upon which she was a passenger, and a street car of the municipal railroad of San Francisco. The jury returned a verdict in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $6,000, for which judgment was entered; but the court, upon defendant's motion for a new trial, ordered that, unless the plaintiff should consent to a reduction of this amount to $2,000, a new trial would be granted. The plaintiff consented to this reduction, whereupon the new trial was denied.

The defendant appeals from the judgment as thus modified, and urges four points upon appeal: (1) That the court's instruction upon the burden of proof was erroneous; (2) that its instruction concerning future suffering was erroneous; (3) that the motion for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence should have been granted; and (4) that the damages were excessive.

The instruction upon the burden of proof of which the defendant complains reads as follows:

"Contributory negligence on the part of a passenger cannot be presumed from the mere fact of an injury, but must be proved. On the other hand, the proof of an injury to a passenger on the bus or vehicle of a common carrier casts upon the common carrier the burden of proving that the injury was occasioned by inevitable casualty or some other cause which human care or foresight could not prevent, or by the contributory negligence of the passenger. In the answer filed by the defendant it has claimed that the injuries, if any, sustained by the plaintiff on the 10th day of September, 1917, referred to in plaintiff's complaint were sustained through the negligence of the operatives of the municipal street car. I charge you that this defense is an affirmative defense, and under the law of this state the burden of proving such defense is upon the defendant; and I instruct you in this connection that if you find from the evidence that the operatives of the municipal street car were negligent, and that the operatives of the motor bus were also negligent, then your verdict must be in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, Peninsula Rapid Transit Company."

[1] The objection which the defendant urges to this instruction is that the jury is therein instructed that the defendant was required to prove by a preponderance of evidence its affirmative defense that the plaintiff's injuries were sustained through the negligence of the employés of the municipal railroad. The instruction does not so declare, as did the instruction in the case of Valente v. Sierra R. R. Co., 151 Cal. 534, 91 Pac. 481, upon which the defendant relies to support its contention in this regard; but, on the contrary, the Supreme Court in that case, while disapproving the instruction therein given, said:

"Instructions declaring that when such an accident is shown the 'burden of showing' want of negligence is on the defendant do not mean, according to the decisions of this state, that the defendant is compelled to show want of negligence by a preponderance of evidence. The term 'burden of showing' or 'burden of proof,' used in that connection, signifies simply the burden of meeting the prima facie case made by the plaintiff."

In that case also the Supreme Court substantially approved an instruction in the form of the one above quoted; but in addition to this the trial court in the instant case gave a number of other instructions at the defendant's request, among which was the following:

"Throughout the plaintiff must prove his case by a preponderance of evidence. In no case is the defendant required to offset the testimony or presumption favoring the plaintiff by a preponderance of testimony. Such burden is at all times upon the plaintiff and the plaintiff alone."

The court also instructed the jury at the request of the defendant as follows:

"Even though the defendant in this case was acting in a negligent manner, nevertheless, if that negligence was not either the sole or a contributing cause to the accident, you should find in favor of the defendant."

We think these instructions, taken together, correctly state the law touching the subject in respect to which they were given.

[2] The next contention of the appellant is that the court's instruction respecting the plaintiff's future suffering as a basis for damages was erroneous. This instruction reads as follows:

"If you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, Lillian Learned, is entitled to a verdict against the defendant, you may assess the amount of damages in a sum not to exceed the amount prayed for in the complaint, and in so doing you have a right to consider the character of the injuries, if any, sustained by the plaintiff; the pain and suffering, if any, endured and which will be endured as a result of said injuries sustained by her, if any; the effect of such injuries, if any, upon the plaintiff; the permanent character of said injuries, if any; what before the injuries complained of was the health and physical condition of plaintiff, her physical ability to maintain herself as compared with her condition afterwards."

The appellant's criticism of this instruction is that it does not instruct the jury in the language of section 3283 of the Civil Code, which provides that "damages may be awarded, in judicial proceeding, for detriment resulting after the commencement thereof, or certain to result in the future," but that the instruction given leaves the jury to conjecture or speculation as to what suffering might thereafter be endured. We do not think the instruction is subject to this criticism. The jury is plainly instructed that it may consider "the pain and suffering, if any, endured and which will be endured as a result of said injuries." This instruction, we think, is in substantial compliance with the terms of the section of the Civil Code above quoted, and that the jury were confined in their admeasurement of damages to such pain and suffering as the plaintiff would, or, in other words, would be certain to, endure as a result of her injuries.

[3] The appellant's next contention is that the trial court should have granted its motion for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. The gravamen of the appellant's complaint under this contention is that certain witnesses to the collision who would have testified in support of its defense that the accident occurred through the negligence of the employees of the municipal railroad were not located by it until after the trial. As to one of these, the witness Dias, the defendant knew what he would have testified to before the trial, and hence his evidence is not to be classed under the head of newly discovered evidence for the purposes of a new trial. If he could not be found by the exercise of due diligence prior to said trial, that would have been a ground for a continuance for which the defendant did not move; but it cannot be made the basis of a motion for a new trial under the head of newly discovered evidence.

[4] As to the other of these witnesses, we are not satisfied as to the defendant's showing of due diligence in seeking out these witnesses prior to the trial already had; but, conceding that such showing was sufficient, the testimony of said witnesses would be merely cumulative upon a matter of fact upon which a number of witnesses for both sides were sworn and testified. A new trial will not as a rule be granted upon a showing of the delayed discovery of evidence of this character. The case of Spear v. United Railroads, 16 Cal. App. 637, 117 Pac. 956, upon which appellant relies in support of this point, does not present, in our opinion, a parallel to the instant case. The trial court was not in error in refusing to grant a new trial on this ground.

[5] The appellant's final contention is that the damages were excessive, and in support of it certain evidence as to the extent of plaintiff's injuries is quoted in its brief. The appellant does not, however, either in said brief or in any supplement thereto, give us the benefit of the entire evidence upon this subject, but from that portion of it which the respondent supplies we are satisfied that the appellant's contention in this regard has no merit. The trial court, upon defendant's motion for a new trial upon this particular ground and with all of the evidence on the subject before it, reduced the verdict from $6,000 to $2,000, and in so doing removed the entire basis of the appellant's claim as to the excessiveness of the original award.

No other errors being urged, the judgment is affirmed.

QUINN v. QUINN. (Civ. 3551.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 1, 1920.)

Divorce ⟸156—Wife's appeal from order refusing to vacate interlocutory decree did not stay entry of final decree.

Plaintiff wife's appeal from order refusing to vacate and set aside interlocutory judgment of divorce on the ground its entry was due to inadvertence, mistake, and excusable neglect on her part, not being an appeal from the interlocutory judgment itself, it did not, under Civ. Code, § 132, stay entry of final decree of divorce in favor of plaintiff wife on motion of defendant husband.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action for divorce by Mary Quinn against J. W. Quinn. From an order denying motion to set aside final decree entered in her favor on defendant's motion, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ben F. Woolner, of Oakland, for respondent.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. This case comes here upon an appeal from an order denying a motion of plaintiff to set aside a final decree of divorce entered in her favor upon motion of the defendant.

Plaintiff began this action for divorce from defendant. The property rights of the parties were settled out of court, and thereupon and on March 30, 1918, the plaintiff amended her complaint by elimating the charge of adultery which had been incorporated therein, and thereafter and in due time and upon the report of a commissioner to whom the case had been referred for the taking of testimony an interlocutory judgment of divorce was entered in plaintiff's favor. A few days before the lapse of six months from the date of the entry of the interlocutory judgment the plaintiff moved to set it aside upon the ground that its entry was due to inadvertence, mistake, and excusable neglect upon her part. She had changed her attorneys before the notice of this motion; and in support thereof she offered the affidavit of one of her new attorneys excusing the delay in making the motion, and her own affidavit, in which she stated in substance that she had been deceived by her former attorney as to the effect of her action for a divorce and of the interlocutory judgment therein; and that she had intended and desired only to institute a proceeding to bring her husband to time in the settlement of their property rights, and to make him give up his vices, including his association with another woman, and to secure his return to his home. The court denied her motion to vacate the interlocutory judgment, and from the order denying the same the plaintiff appealed. When a year had elapsed from the time of the entry of the interlocutory judgment, a final judgment of divorce in favor of plaintiff was entered on motion of the defendant. Thereupon the plaintiff moved to set aside this final judgment upon the ground that the court had no power to make or enter it while her appeal from the order refusing to vacate the interlocutory judgment was pending. Her technical statement of the grounds of her motion is that the entry of the final judgment was the result of mistake and inadvertence.

The appeal rests upon the claim of appellant that the first appeal, namely, that from the order refusing to vacate the interlocutory judgment, stayed the entry of final judgment by reason of the provisions of section 132 of the Civil Code. In that section it is provided that, if an appeal be taken from an interlocutory judgment or a motion for a new trial is made, final judgment shall not be entered until such motion or appeal has been finally disposed of. But the appeal from the order refusing to vacate and set aside the interlocutory judgment upon the ground that its entry was due to inadvertence, mistake, or excusable neglect is not an appeal from the interlocutory judgment itself. By the terms of the statute the entry of final judgment must be postponed only by an appeal from the interlocutory judgment itself or a motion for a new trial, and we have no power to add provisions to the section.

This reasoning, if correct, disposes of the cases cited by appellant, none of which is in point as we read the section upon which appellant relies for a reversal.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

To constitute a contract by correspondence, there must be a proposal squarely assented to, and, where the correspondence indicates that the negotiations are not to be considered closed until investigation should be made or other acts performed, no contract results.

3. Frauds, statute of ⟸118(3)—Correspondence not sufficient to show completed contract, taking it without the statute.

In an action for specific performance of an alleged agreement by trustees to lease land for a five-year term, correspondence indicating that the negotiations were not to be considered closed until the tenant to whom the land was proposed to be sublet was investigated held insufficient to establish a completed contract taking the transaction without the statute of frauds.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Action by J. S. Azevedo against Frank Davidson and Gavin McNab. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

G. P. Hall, of Petaluma (E. J. Dole, of Petaluma, of counsel), for appellant.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco (Herbert W. Clark, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action in specific performance to compel the defendants, as trustees, to execute to him a lease, according to the terms of an alleged verbal contract, claimed to be evidenced by a memorandum in writing. Judgment was entered for the defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Plaintiff, as tenant, was in possession of the premises, the John Davidson ranch in Marin county, under a lease which was to expire on the 1st day of October, 1919. The trustees, Frank Davidson and Gavin McNab, defendants and respondents herein, are trustees of the estate of John Davidson, deceased; one of the properties of the estate being the ranch here involved. Desiring to renew his lease of the premises, plaintiff had a conversation with Alice Davidson, one of the cestui que trusts, who agreed to such renewal for a period of five years, at the annual rental of $1,800. She stated to plaintiff that the defendants would agree to a renewal on such terms. Thereafter the respondent, Frank Davidson, executed a lease of the ranch, running to plaintiff for a period of five years, but this document was never signed or executed by the cotrustee, McNab. The trial court found that McNab never promised to execute a new lease to plaintiff. Inasmuch as all the other facts were found for plaintiff and appellant, the correctness of this finding presents the question to be considered on this appeal.

[1] The contention of the appellant is that the undisputed evidence shows that McNab upon two separate occasions did promise a new lease to the appellant, and that this engagement is evidenced in writing by letters written by McNab to his cotrustee, Davidson, to the officers of the Petaluma National Bank, and to the Petaluma Swiss-American Bank. The evidence on the question of the alleged promise to execute the lease is substantially conflicting. Plaintiff and his nephew, Manuel Ennis, testified as to what took place upon the occasion of two visits to Mr. McNab's office. Mr. McNab also testified as to what occurred upon those visits. The testimony of the latter puts in issue the statements of the other witnesses. On the oral testimony, therefore, this court, following the well-established rule, will not disturb the finding. Levi v. Chesley, 178 Cal. 145, 172 Pac. 607.

[2, 3] Appellant contends in the next place that support of his averment that defendant McNab promised to execute the lease is found in the correspondence referred to, which was sufficient to remove the transaction from the bar of the statute of frauds. The matter of a new lease was first discussed at Mr. McNab's office in May, at which time it was agreed that plaintiff should have his attorney prepare a form of lease, covering his renewal proposition, to be submitted to the trustees. On June 10, at the request of the plaintiff, Mr. Reghetti, cashier of the Petaluma Swiss-American Bank, wrote Mr. McNab as follows:

"We have been requested by Mr. J. S. Azevedo to write and ascertain from you if you are willing to renew his lease, which will expire soon. He states that he had an understanding with Miss Davidson whereby the rent would be increased to $1,800 per year beginning October 1, 1919. Kindly advise if this will be satisfactory to you."

To this letter Mr. McNab replied:

"Replying to your letter of June 10, 1919: Some time ago I wrote to Miss Davidson that I was entirely agreeable to the new lease of Mr. J. S. Azevedo. I suggested that she ask the opinion of Mr. Frank R. Davidson, cotrustee with me, who is at Sebastopol. I have not heard since. I suggest that Mr. Azevedo inquire of Miss Davidson what she has done in the matter, or write to Mr. Frank R. Davidson at Sebastopol."

In July plaintiff and his nephew again visited Mr. McNab's office and had a conversation about the matter. Plaintiff presented a lease drawn by his attorney, which McNab did not sign. He referred plaintiff to his cotrustee, Davidson, with the following letter:

"My dear Frank: Mr. J. C. Azevedo, tenant of the ranch of your father's estate, wishes a new lease, which permits him to assign to any person acceptable to your father's trustees, the purpose of which is that Mr. Azevedo has already sold his cattle and personal property. I explained to him that I had no knowledge of the people to whom he is selling, whether they would be good tenants and entirely responsible or otherwise. This is a matter to be passed upon by you, who are familiar with the standing of the people of the county. While this does not enter directly into the lease itself in the present form, as it is his purpose to sell to these people, it should be considered at this time so that the two transactions may go through together. If you approve of the lease and the transaction, please sign the lease and write me a letter."

Davidson signed the lease, but instead of himself passing upon the standing and responsibility of Azevedo's prospective assignee, Kullberg, referred him to the president of the Petaluma National Bank, Mr. Gwinn, who reported to Mr. McNab that he would "make a satisfactory tenant."

In the meantime negotiations looking to the sale of the ranch by the trustees were under way, and were subsequently consummated. The lease was never signed by McNab or by the plaintiff. The appellant contends that these letters, taken in connection with the lease which was prepared by plaintiff's attorney, and referred to Davidson by McNab, prove an agreement on the part of McNab to execute the lease, which can be specifically enforced. The court below was correct in deciding to the contrary. To constitute a binding contract by correspondence, there must be a proposal squarely assented to. Wristen v. Bowles, 82 Cal. 84, 87, 22 Pac. 1136. In this case the correspondence indicates that the negotiations were not to be considered closed until certain investigations should be made to the satisfaction of the trustees. Consequently a concluded and accepted contract has not been shown. Pacific Rolling Mill Co. v. Railway Co., 90 Cal. 627, 632, 634, 27 Pac. 525; Brown v. San Francisco Savings Union, 134 Cal. 448, 66 Pac. 592.

The judgment is affirmed.

MURRAY v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 3505.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 5. 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 2, 1920.)

1. Carriers ⊂=314(5)—Complaint of passenger sufficient to state cause of action.

A complaint, alleging that plaintiff was a passenger on defendant's car, that after it had stopped to allow passengers to alight plaintiff rose from her seat for the purpose of walking to the end of the car and alighting, and that after she had arisen, defendant negligently, carelessly, and suddenly started the car, causing plaintiff to lose her balance, etc., is sufficient to state a cause of action.

2. Carriers ⊂=320(26)—Negligence in starting car after stopping for passengers to alight held for jury.

In an action by a passenger who lost her balance when a car started, where there was evidence as to the suddenness and jerkiness of the start, the question whether the carrier was negligent in so starting the car was for the jury, and a directed verdict was properly refused, despite carrier's contention that the testimony as to the sudden start was a mere conclusion.

3. Trial ⊂=194(18)—Instructions in passenger's action for injuries held not a charge on the facts.

In a passenger's action, instructions that in order to make out a prima facie case it was sufficient for plaintiff to show she was a passenger, and that the injuries were sustained by reason of her being thrown to the floor of the car by the sudden starting thereof after it had stopped to allow plaintiff to alight therefrom, that contributory negligence cannot be presumed, and that proof of injury to a passenger casts on a common carrier the burden of proving that it was occasioned by unavoidable casualty, etc., were not objectionable as an attempt on the part of the trial court to charge the jury with respect to matters of fact in violation of Const. art. 6, § 9.

4. Carriers ⊂=316(3)—Doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applicable where passenger is injured as result of sudden start.

Where a passenger is injured while in a carrier's vehicle, though the injury is the result of a sudden start of car, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applicable, and the carrier has the burden of showing that the injury was the result of some unavoidable casualty, etc.

5. Trial ⊂=260(1)—Refusal of instructions covered by those given not error.

The refusal of requested instructions covered by those given is not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by Edith M. Murray against the United Railroads of San Francisco. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Abbott, Wm. M. Cannon, and Kingsley Cannon, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff while a passenger on one of the defendant's cars.

[1] The first contention of the appellant is that the trial court erred in overruling the defendant's general demurrer to the plaintiff's amended complaint. The averments of said complaint are, in substance, that on the 4th day of March, 1915, said plaintiff was a passenger upon one of the defendant's cars being run and operated by it in an easterly direction from Sansome street to the Embarcadero in San Francisco; that when said car reached the Embarcadero it was run or operated around the curve or loop in defendant's tracks at that point, and while on said curve or loop was stopped by said defendant for the purpose of enabling passengers to alight therefrom; that after said car had been stopped by said defendant for said purpose the plaintiff arose from her seat within said car for the purpose of walking to the end thereof and alighting therefrom, and that after she had thus arisen and was about to walk toward the end of said car in order to alight therefrom the defendant "negligently and carelessly, and without allowing said plaintiff sufficient time to walk toward the end of said car to alight therefrom, suddenly started said car, and then and there and by reason thereof caused said plaintiff to lose her balance and fall with great force and violence upon the floor of said car," from which she received the injuries complained of. We are of the opinion that these averments sufficiently state a cause of action, and hence that there is no merit in the appellant's first contention, and that its demurrer upon that ground was properly overruled.

[2] The appellant's next contention is that the trial court erred in refusing to grant defendant's request for an instruction directing a verdict in favor of the defendant because of the insufficiency of the evidence to establish negligence. The appellant's argument in support of this contention, after quoting extracts from the testimony of the plaintiff and of her main witness as to the facts respecting the stopping and sudden starting of the defendant's car, proceeds to claim that the evidence thus given consisted merely in conclusions of these two witnesses in regard to the starting of the defendant's car and as to the series of jerks accompanying and immediately following the starting of the car by which the plaintiff was caused to lose her balance and to fall upon the floor of the car. We do not so read this evidence, but, on the contrary, think it relates quite vividly and circumstantially the action of said car by the suddenness and jerkiness and jolting of which the plaintiff was caused to fall. Whether this method of starting a car after it had been stopped for the purpose of enabling passengers to alight, and while passengers were in the act of alighting, was or was not negligence on the part of the defendant was clearly a question for the jury. None of the cases cited by appellant in support of this contention are predicated upon facts as vividly and circumstantially related as are the facts in the instant case. The trial court, therefore, properly denied the defendant's motion for a directed verdict. Renfro v. Fresno City Ry. Co., 2 Cal. App. 317, 84 Pac. 357; Babcock v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 128 Cal. 174, 60 Pac. 780.

[3, 4] The next contention of the appellant is that the trial court erred in instructing the jury that proof of an injury to a passenger caused by the operation of defendant's car cast upon the defendant the burden of proving that the injury was occasioned by inevitable casualty or contributory negligence. The instructions of which the appellant complains are the following:

"In order to make out a prima facie case against defendant, United Railroads of San Francisco, in this action it is sufficient for the plaintiff, Edith M. Murray, to show that at the time she sustained the injuries, if any, of which she complains, she was a passenger upon one of the cars of, and being operated by, the defendant on the Embarcadero in the city and county of San Francisco, and that said injuries, if any, were sustained by her by reason of her being thrown to the floor of said car by the sudden starting of said car by said defendant, United Railroads of San Francisco, after said car had been stopped for the purpose of enabling plaintiff to alight therefrom. The law does not impose upon plaintiff, Edith M. Murray, the duty of showing that at the time of said accident she was free from fault, or did not contribute by her own negligence to the injuries, if any, of which she complains."

"Contributory negligence on the part of a passenger cannot be presumed from the mere fact of injury, but must be proved. On the other hand, the proof of an injury to a passenger on a car of a common carrier, caused by the operation of the car, casts upon the common carrier the burden of proving that the injury was occasioned by inevitable casualty, or some other cause which human care and foresight could not prevent, or by the contributory negligence of the passenger, unless the proof on the part of the passenger tends to show that the injury was occasioned by the contributory negligence of the passenger, or by inevitable casualty, or by some other cause which human care and foresight could not prevent."

The first objection which the appellant urges against the above instructions is that they constitute an attempt on the part of the trial court to charge the jury with respect to matters of fact in violation of the provisions of section 19, article 6, of the state Constitution. We do not think the instructions above quoted are subject to this objection. They differ materially, both in form and substance, from the instructions in the case of Quint v. Dimond, 147 Cal. 707, 82 Pac. 310, upon the criticism of which by the Supreme Court the appellant relies to sustain this point. On the other hand, the foregoing instructions, and particularly the latter portion thereof relating to contributory negligence, are cast in a form which has been quite frequently used in recent cases, and which has been expressly approved by the Supreme Court in the cases of Steele v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 168 Cal. 375, 143 Pac. 718, Wyatt v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 174, 103 Pac. 892, McCurrie v. Southern Pacific Co., 122 Cal. 558, 55 Pac. 324, Housel v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 167 Cal. 245, 139 Pac. 73, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1105, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 665, and, finally, by the Supreme Court in denying the petition for rehearing in the case of Bourguignon v. Peninsula Ry. Co., 181 Pac. 669. In each of the foregoing cases the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to cases where the plaintiff was a passenger of a common carrier has been fully upheld. It is not necessary, therefore, to comment upon the cases cited by the appellant from other jurisdictions relating to the applicability of this rule to the facts of the case at bar.

[5] The next contention of the appellant is that the court erred in refusing to give an instruction requested by it to the effect that the plaintiff could not recover if her fall resulted from the jerking and swaying of the car incident to its ordinary operation. While the instruction in the form requested might well have been given, we think that its subject-matter is fully covered by the other instructions which the court did give, in some instances at the defendant's request, and by which the jury were fully informed that the plaintiff, as a prerequisite to her recovery, was compelled to prove by a preponderance of evidence that her injuries were the direct result of the defendant's negligence in the sudden starting and jerky operation of its car.

As to the other of the defendant's objections to the form and substance of the instructions which were given to the jury, we are of the opinion that the instructions taken as a whole contained a full and fair statement of the law applicable to cases of this character, and that they were not subject to the objections repeatedly directed against them by the appellant, to the effect that they constituted an invasion of the province of the jury through being instructions as to matters of fact.

Having thus disposed of the various contentions urged by the appellant, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: WASTE, P. J.; KINSELL, Judge pro tem.

BAR ASSOCIATION OF SAN FRANCISCO v. CANTRELL. (Civ. 3437.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 5, 1920. Rehearing Denied Nov. 4, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 2, 1920.)

1. Attorney and client ⟸102 — Attorney for executor stands in trust relationship to beneficiary under will.

An attorney for the personal representatives of a decedent charged with the duty of administering the estate stands in the same trust relationship to the beneficiary as the personal representatives, and his misrepresentation that the law of the state required personal representatives to be represented by counsel is fraudulent.

2. Attorney and client ⟸38—Good moral character is condition to continuance of practice of law.

As a good moral character is a condition precedent to admission to the bar, so it is a requisite condition to the rightful continuance in the practice of the profession.

3. Attorney and client ⟸44(2) — Attorney who misappropriates client's money guilty of moral turpitude though he returns it.

An attorney who made misrepresentations to secure fees and improperly applied a client's money to his own use in two different cases is guilty of moral turpitude, regardless of whether he intended to return the funds, and the fact that pending investigation he did so, for it is indispensable that an attorney be trustworthy.

4. Attorney and client ⟸58 — Attorney improperly using client's funds should be suspended though he makes restitution.

Where an attorney not only made misrepresentations but improperly used his client's funds making restitution only during the pendency of an investigation of his conduct, he should at least be suspended from the practice of his profession for the period of one year.

In the matter of the application of the Bar Association of San Francisco for disbarment of Russell W. Cantrell, attorney and counselor at law. Respondent ordered disbarred.

Perry Evans, of San Francisco, for petitioner Bar Association.

Nathan C. Coghlan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. The Bar Association of San Francisco accused Russell W. Cantrell, an attorney and counselor at law, of certain acts in his office as attorney which were alleged to have involved moral turpitude and dishonesty within the scope of subdivision 5 of section 287 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that an attorney and counselor may be removed or suspended "for the commission of any act involving moral turpitude, dishonesty or corruption, whether the same be committed in the course of his relations as an attorney or counselor at law, or otherwise, and whether the same constitute a felony or misdemeanor or not; and in the event that such act shall constitute a felony or misdemeanor, conviction thereof in a criminal proceeding shall not be a condition precedent to disbarment or suspension from practice therefor."

The accusation was in four counts, to one of which a demurrer was sustained. The other three counts may be summarized as follows:

First, that the respondent, who was the attorney for the executor and executrix of the will of Alice Wall, a deceased person, after the admission of the will of the decedent to probate, for the purpose of seeking additional employment and compensation, wrote to one Alice Foley, a beneficiary under the will, then residing in the state of Connecticut, informing her that he was acting as the attorney for the executor and executrix, and further stating, "As I deem it advisable for the quick winding up of the estate to have the parties interested represented by as few attorneys as possible, I write to inquire if you desire me to represent you in this proceeding"; that on receipt of this letter, Alice Foley, through her attorney in Connecticut, wrote the respondent for a copy of the will and for such papers as the respondent might suggest she should sign; that on February 27, 1914, the respondent replied as follows:

"Under our law foreign heirs or beneficiaries under a will must have a local agent to represent them. This appointment may be made either voluntarily or through an order of court."

It is further alleged that these statements were untrue. Both the statements and their untruth are conceded.

Second, that the statements set forth above were made, and that in March or April, 1914, the respondent in fact became the attorney of Alice Foley, and as such attorney and for her, on or about January 24, 1917, he received from the executor and executrix of the will in question the sum of $751.15, in payment of the legacy to her; that the respondent "willfully and fraudulently neglected and failed to pay said sum of money to said Alice Foley," and appropriated it to his own purposes against her will and consent; that the money so alleged to have been embezzled was not paid to Alice Foley until the month of March, 1918, and not until there had been an investigation of the respondent's conduct by the accuser's committee of discipline and grievances. The facts alleged are conceded.

Third, that the respondent as the attorney for the plaintiff in an action in the superior court in San Francisco, entitled Stefano Demartini v. Lewis Packing Company, procured a mandatory injunction requiring the defendant forthwith to remove an encroachment from the property of the plaintiff, which encroachment consisted of a portion of a building, and the judgment awarded the plaintiff in that action $400 damages and costs; that the defendant appealed from the judgment; that thereafter, on or about August 20, 1918, the attorney for the defendant in that action offered to the respondent, as the attorney for Demartini, to satisfy the money part of the judgment and to dismiss the appeal, provided the defendant were granted until March 1, 1919, to remove the encroachment; that Demartini refused to approve this settlement and instructed the respondent not to enter into it, notwithstanding which the respondent entered into a stipulation, the effect of which was to delay the appeal and to stay the mandatory injunction until March 1, 1919, and, coincident therewith, on or about August 24, 1918, the respondent received from the defendant $450 in satisfaction of the money portion of said judgment; that for over six months thereafter the respondent failed to pay the said money to his client, and during said period purposely concealed from his client the fact that the respondent had collected the same, and until his client was informed by the attorney for the defendant in said action that the money had been paid. These facts also are conceded.

On behalf of the respondent in regard to the withholding of the money in the Wall estate from Alice Foley, the following quotation is made from his brief:

"The only explanation offered by the respondent in his defense to this charge was that at the time he received this money he was engaged in extensive litigation, his compensation for his legal services being rendered therein being dependent upon the successful outcome of said litigation; that said litigation was pending at the time he received the said money, and continued for a period of fourteen months; that during this period respondent received no money from his law practice, as his time was exclusively engaged in the said litigation, and he was unable to borrow any money on his contemplated fee in this litigation until on or about the 1st day of March, 1918, when respondent did borrow the sum of $1,350, and thereupon paid to his client the amount due her in full. The respondent appropriated the money received by him, as aforesaid, to his own use for living expenses, during said period, anticipating an early determination of the said litigation, when he could have arranged for the return of the said money so withheld; that during this period the respondent was practically insolvent; that respondent did not at any time conceal from any one the receipt by him of the said money belonging to his said client; that in the month of December, 1917, respondent paid to the said client, through a local attorney, $100 on account of the amount collected by him."

In regard to the Demartini Case the respondent seeks to justify his having failed to obey the instructions of his client by an unsupported statement that he was following the wishes of his client's son. The only explanation of his having retained his client's money for a period of many months is that he thought his client would be angry if he thought the settlement had been made in violation of the instructions he had given the attorney.

[1] Of the misrepresentations made by the respondent to Alice Foley by which he was placed in a position which made possible his misappropriation of her money, no justification was attempted. He was the attorney of the personal representatives charged with the duty of administering the estate of Alice Wall. He stood in the same trust relationship to the beneficiary of her will as the executor and executrix. Bergin v. Haight, 99 Cal. 52, 33 Pac. 760. His misrepresentation concerning the law of this state to his trustee residing in another state was one of fact and fraudulent.

[2-4] In view of the admissions of the respondent no conclusion is possible but that he has been guilty of several acts involving moral turpitude. "As a good moral character is a condition precedent to admission to the bar, so it is a requisite condition for the rightful continuance in the practice of the profession. Ex parte Brounsall, 2 Cowp. 829; Penobscot Bar v. Kimball, 64 Me. 146; Strout v. Proctor, 71 Me. 290; Delano's Case, 58 N. H. 5; In re Davies, 92 Pa. St. 120; Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 280." In re O., 73 Wis. 602, 42 N. W. 221. "It is indispensable that an attorney be trustworthy. And he is not trustworthy if he is capable of improperly applying to his own use his client's money, whether he intends to return it or not." In re Treadwell, 67 Cal. 353–358, 7 Pac. 724, 728. Where attorneys have mingled their client's money with their own and have used it for their own purposes, even though, as in this case, settlements were thereafter made with their clients, particularly pending investigations concerning their acts, courts have repeatedly held that such conduct requires at least suspension of the attorney for a period commensurate with the wrongdoing. In re Dobbs, 173 App. Div. 605, 160 N. Y. Supp. 173; In re Evans, 169 App. Div. 502, 155 N. Y. Supp. 491; In re O., 73 Wis. 602, 42 N. W. 221; In re Eisenberg, 173 App. Div. 598, 160 N. Y. Supp. 143; In re Treadwell, 67 Cal. 353, 7 Pac. 724.

It is ordered that the respondent be suspended from his office as an attorney and counselor at law in the courts of this state and from practice as an attorney and counselor at law in this state for the period of one year from and after the date when this judgment shall become final.

MARR v. WHISTLER. (Civ. 3403.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 27, 1920.)

1. New trial ⟸163(2)—Order granted on all grounds set forth in notice included that of insufficiency of evidence.

Court's order, specifying that new trial was granted on "all of the grounds set forth in the notice, was based on ground of insufficiency of evidence, where that was one of the grounds specified in the notice, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 657, as amended by St. 1919, p. 141, requiring that an order granted upon the ground of insufficiency of evidence should so specify.

2. Negligence ⟸119(6)—Contributory negligence in issue.

While ordinarily contributory negligence is an affirmative defense to be specially pleaded, it became an issue, where plaintiff pleaded certain matters to negative contributory negligence, which allegations were squarely denied by the defendant.

3. New trial ⟸71—Granting, where evidence is conflicting, not an abuse of discretion.

When there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, trial court will not be deemed to have abused its discretion in granting a new trial, when it has determined that the verdict or the finding is against the weight of the evidence; it being the duty of the trial court to grant a new trial if it is not satisfied with the verdict.

4. Appeal and error ⟸933(4)—Refusal to direct verdict would not prevent granting new trial, in view of presumption on appeal.

That at the conclusion of the testimony the court denied instructed verdict for defendant, did not prevent the trial court from granting a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence, since it must be presumed in favor of the order that the court changed its opinion as to the effect of the evidence, and reached a conclusion on the hearing of the motion favorable to defendant.

5. Innkeepers ⟸10—Maintenance of fire escape in violation of ordinance negligence per se.

Maintenance by a hotel of a fire escape with an opening in the platform in violation of a city ordinance was negligence per se.

6. Innkeepers ⟸10—Liability for leaving opening in fire escape.

The presence of an unguarded opening in the platform of a fire escape just outside and practically opposite the doorway of a room in the hotel, in violation of a city ordinance, rendered an innkeeper liable for injuries to a guest, who was injured thereby, unless the guest's own negligence proximately contributed to her injuries.

7. New trial ⟸70—Court did not abuse discretion in granting new trial.

In an action by a hotel guest for personal injuries sustained when she fell through an opening in the platform of a fire escape, held that court did not abuse its discretion in granting defendant a new trial, on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to sustain a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff.

8. Innkeepers ⟸10—Guest using fire escape a trespasser.

A guest in a hotel, stepping out upon the platform of a fire escape with knowledge that it was not used for any purpose except to escape from fire, was a trespasser.

9. New trial ⟸66—Verdict for wrong party one against law.

If the evidence was not sufficient to warrant the conclusion arrived at by the jury that the negligence of defendant was the proximate cause of injury, the verdict should have been in defendant's favor, and may be said to be "against the law."

10. Negligence ⟸122(2), 138(2)—Burden of proving contributory negligence.

An instruction "that the burden of proving the contributory negligence of plaintiff is upon the defendants" is erroneous, the correct rule being that negligence on the part of the plaintiff is a matter of defense, to be proved affirmatively by the defendant, unless it can be shown or inferred from the evidence given in support of plaintiff's case.

11. Innkeepers ⟸10—Instruction in relation to ordinance held proper.

In an action by a guest in a hotel for personal injuries received when she fell through an opening in a fire escape platform, held proper to instruct the jury in relation to an ordinance of the city regulating the construction and maintenance of fire escapes.

12. Appeal and error ⟸1048(6)—Refusal of questions on cross-examination of witness held harmless.

In an action by a hotel guest for injuries sustained when she fell through an opening in the platform of a fire escape, any error of the court in sustaining an objection to questions on cross-examination of plaintiff as to her motive in going upon the fire escape was harmless, where plaintiff's counsel stipulated that her going on the balcony "was not on account of fire."

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by Josephine Marr against H. S. Whistler. From an order granting defendant's motion after judgment for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Everts & Ewing and M. G. Gallaher, all of Fresno, for appellant.

C. K. Bonestell, of Fresno, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. This is an action for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff in falling through an unguarded opening in the platform of the fire escape adjacent to her room, on a building in the city of Fresno, owned by the defendant Rowell, and in which the defendant Whistler, as lessee, conducted a hotel. The action was instituted against both the owner and lessee. They appeared separately by demurrer to the amended complaint, that of the defendant Whistler being overruled; that of the defendant owner, Rowell, was sustained, without leave to amend, and judgment was entered in his favor. The plaintiff, the appellant here, appealed and the judgment was reversed by this court, a hearing in the Supreme Court being denied. Marr v. Rowell, 185 Pac. 1000. In the meantime the action was tried as between plaintiff and the defendant Whistler. The jury rendered a verdict, fixing the plaintiff's damages in the sum of $6,050, for which amount the judgment was entered. Thereafter the defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was granted. This appeal is by the plaintiff from that order.

[1] The motion for a new trial was made upon three grounds specified in the notice, namely: Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; that the verdict was against law; and errors of law occurring at the trial. The order of the court specified that the motion was granted "on all of the grounds set forth in the said defendant's notice of intention to move for a new trial." Section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended by St. 1919, p. 141, provides that "When a new trial is granted upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, the order shall so specify; otherwise, on appeal from such order, it will be presumed that the order was not based upon that ground."

Appellant argues, therefore, that in determining the correctness of the court's ruling in granting a new trial, we are not at liberty to consider the insufficiency of the evidence as one of the grounds appealing to the lower court as a basis of its order. We think there is nothing in the point. The court's order specifies that the new trial was granted on all of the grounds set forth in said defendant's notice of intention, one of which is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. While the form of the order is not to be commended, we think there was such a substantial compliance with the requirement of the Code section as to warrant us in concluding that the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict was one of the grounds upon which the new trial was granted.

It appears from the evidence in this case that at about 9:30 o'clock in the evening of the 6th day of August, 1917, the plaintiff and appellant, Josephine E. Marr, applied to the respondent Whistler for a room in the Kern-Kay Hotel in the city of Fresno, kept by him. He assigned her to room 25, and immediately conducted her to it. This room was at the end of the hallway on the second floor of the hotel. At the opposite side of the room from the door opening into it from the hall there was a doorway giving access to the floor of the lowest balcony of a fire escape. In this doorway was an ordinary swinging wood door, opening into the room, which was open at the time. There was also a screen door opening out, which at the time was closed, but neither locked, barred, nor latched. At about 10 o'clock, it being dark, the appellant swung the screen door open and stepped through the door leading to the fire escape on the outside. She took hold of the iron railing, and immediately fell through an aperture in the platform, falling to the ground, a distance of from 18 to 20 feet, sustaining very severe injuries. The hole through which appellant fell was a rectangular opening, 22 by 24 inches, in the floor of the fire escape, and about 18 inches of the opening was directly in front of the door through which the appellant stepped. The near margin of the opening was about 22 inches from the doorsill. The appellant testified that, looking through the screen door, she saw the railing of the fire escape, and believed that the platform was a balcony for the use of the guests of the hotel. She denied seeing the ladder of the fire escape leading to the floor above. She had previously been a guest at the hotel, was familiar with the fire escape in another part of the building, which was through a window to a platform barred by an iron railing. Her testimony is that she did not know that the door through which she walked led to the fire escape outside of room 25, but thought that the balcony was a perfectly safe place, she having been informed by another woman resident of the hotel that she had used it as a place on which to sit and dry her hair. She had heard room 25 referred to as a "fire escape room" but did not know that the balcony onto which she stepped, through the unprotected door, was a part of the fire escape. Because of the darkness, she testified, she did not see the opening in the platform.

An ordinance of the city of Fresno, in force at the time of the accident, provided that the floor or bottom of the lowest balcony of every fire escape should have no opening or open space therein, of a greater width than one inch. It also provided that where fire escapes could not be so placed as to be accessible from the hall or corridor, and where the only means of reaching the fire escape was through a room, the door of such room should be a sash door, over which should be suspended a light of not less than eight candle power, encased in a red-colored globe, which should be kept continuously lighted from sunset to sunrise of each day, and in addition there should be painted upon the wall, contiguous to this light, or upon a sign suspended not more than 12 inches below it, the words "To the Fire Escape," the letters to be not less than 3 inches in height. While it does not appear that there was any lighted red danger signal, as required by the ordinance, the hallway adjacent to room 25 was shown to be fairly well lighted, and on the cross-examination the appellant admitted that on the night of the accident there was a sign on the wall, within 5 or 6 inches of the right-hand side of the door leading into the room, which bore the legend, "Fire Escape through This Room."

The appellant alleged and testified that there was no sign, or warning of danger in room 25, or at the door opening out onto the fire escape. The respondent Whistler and witness Hart testified that at the time of the accident such a warning was in place. During the trial the jury inspected the premises, and at that time there was a sign with the words "Fire Escape" printed on it in large letters over the door in question. There was also evidence that the fire escape was on the side of room 25 which overlooked an alley; that when the wooden door was opened, and the screen door closed, a person could see the ladder or stairway on the fire escape; it being painted black and being located directly in front of the door. Respondent Whistler testified that when he took appellant to room 25 on the night in question, and turned on the light, Mrs. Marr went over to the door and looked out on the fire escape and said, "I am going to pull the bed over in front of the fire escape door as the air will blow in," and that immediately after the fall, Mrs. Marr said to him:

"Oh, Mr. Whistler, I didn't know the hole in the fire escape was uncovered. Mrs. Robinette [a former occupant of room 25] told me it was covered up."

Appellant denied making either of these statements. Mrs. Robinette testified that, as nearly as she could remember the conversation, she had told Mrs. Marr that room 25 was "a nice cool room, * * * there was a fire escape in there, and we left the door open, and I used to go out there and dry my hair."

[2] In instituting her action the appellant relied on, and pleaded, the carelessness and negligence of the respondent in maintaining the platform of the fire escape with the opening, and the doorway near it, without signs of danger, or warning. But she went further, and pleaded certain matters intended, so she states in her brief, "to negative contributory negligence" on her part. These were that she had no notice of the dangerous condition of the fire escape, could not see its condition from the room, did not know that the platform was part of the fire escape, but believed it was a balcony for the use of guests in the room. These allegations were squarely denied by the defendant, and we do not think the appellant can now escape their effect by arguing that they were unnecessary. While, ordinarily, contributory negligence is an affirmative defense to be specially pleaded, in this case the appellant tendered the issue herself, and it was met by the denials and proof of the respondent. The case was tried on the theory thus presented, evidence was introduced without objection as to its materiality, and the court included in its charge to the jury instructions covering the question of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, and the burden resting on the defendant to prove the same. We are convinced from the entire record that the question of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff must have been uppermost in the consideration of the trial court in granting the motion for a new trial. Otherwise there would be scant reason for such action on its part.

[3] The wide extent of the discretion of the trial court in granting or denying a new trial for insufficiency of the evidence is well-nigh axiomatic. Its action in such matters is conclusive upon the appellate court unless there has been an abuse of discretion. When there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the trial court will not be deemed to have abused its discretion when it has determined that the verdict, or the finding, is against the weight of the evidence, and that there should be a new trial. Gordon v. Roberts, 162 Cal. 506, 509, 123 Pac. 288. It was the duty of the court to grant the new trial in this case if it was not satisfied with the verdict (Curtiss v. Starr, 85 Cal. 376, 377, 24 Pac. 806), and it was not bound by the rule as to conflicting evidence, as is this court (Pollitz v. Wickersham, 150 Cal. 238, 244, 88 Pac. 911; Condee v. Gyger, 126 Cal. 546, 547, 59 Pac. 26).

"Even in cases where there may not appear to be a conflict in the evidence, and where all the proofs seem to be favorable to the one or the other of the parties litigant, the question as to the probative force or evidentiary value of the testimony, in a proceeding on a motion for a new trial based upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, is one whose determination is with the trial court. The rule (elementary and commonly familiar in our system of jurisprudence) is that the plaintiff in a civil action must establish his case by a preponderance of proof, but, although many witnesses may testify directly in favor of his position, and no adversary testimony directly adduced, it is still with the jury, in the first instance, and finally with the trial court, where a new trial is asked on the ground stated, to say whether such testimony, when subjected to the legal tests whereby the probative value of evidence is to be judged, measures up to the requirement of the law as to the degree of proof essential to the support of an issue of fact." Otten v. Spreckels, 24 Cal. App. 251, 257, 141 Pac. 224, 226.

In such cases the presumption is in favor of the order and against the findings, or the verdict. Condee v. Gyger, supra; Hass v. Mutual, etc., Ass'n, 118 Cal. 6, 10, 49 Pac. 1056.

[4] The fact that at the conclusion of the testimony the defendant made, and the court denied, a motion to instruct the jury to bring in a verdict for the defendant, does not change the situation. We must presume in favor of the order granting the new trial that the court changed its opinion as to the effect of the evidence, and reached a conclusion upon the hearing of the motion, favorable to the defendant. Clohan v. Kelso, 183 Pac. 349.

[5-7] In the instant case the maintenance by the defendant of the fire escape in violation of the ordinance of the city of Fresno was negligence per se. The presence of the unguarded opening in the platform, just outside, and practically opposite, the doorway of room 25, resulted in maintaining a dangerous trap. The defendant being thus shown to be negligent, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, unless her own negligence proximately contributed to her injuries. The conflict in the testimony which we have already summarized turns upon that question. It would subserve no useful purpose to restate at length the facts of the case, as they are shown by the record. So far as the sufficiency of the evidence is concerned, we cannot say that any such abuse of the discretion lodged in the trial court appears, as would justify this court in reversing the order granting a new trial.

[8] That the knowledge plaintiff possessed, concerning the fire escape and its surroundings, was a material issue in the case is conceded by the appellant, when she admits in her brief that—

"If the plaintiff in this action had known that the platform was that of a fire escape, and had known or had had reason to believe that it was not used for any purpose except to escape from fire in the building, then to step upon it for any other purpose would have made her a trespasser."

Her concession is borne out by the authorities. McAlpine v. Powell, 70 N. Y. 126, 131, 26 Am. Rep. 555; Mayer v. Laux, 18 Misc. Rep. 671, 673, 43 N. Y. Supp. 743; Kelly v. Smith, 29 App. Div. 346, 349, 51 N. Y. Supp. 413.

[9] The second ground on which the motion for a new trial was granted was "that said verdict was against the law." This is largely corollary of the first, for if the evidence was not sufficient to warrant the conclusion, arrived at by the jury, that the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries, the verdict should have been in his favor.

[10] Certain "errors of law occurring at the trial," which was one of the grounds upon which the motion for a new trial was granted, are pointed out by the respondent. In the instructions given by the trial court, on the question of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, which appear to have been given in keeping with the understanding, and theory, upon which the case was tried, the jury were told "that the burden of proving the contributory negligence of the plaintiff is upon the defendants." The rule, correctly stated, is that negligence on the part of the plaintiff is a matter of defense to be proved affirmatively by the defendant, unless it can be shown or inferred from the evidence given in support of the plaintiff's case. Green v. Southern Pacific Co., 132 Cal. 254, 257, 64 Pac. 255; Robinson v. W. P. R. R. Co., 48 Cal. 409, 426.

[11, 12] It was proper to instruct the jury in relation to the ordinance of the city of Fresno regulating the construction and maintenance of fire escapes. Sheyer v. Lowell, 134 Cal. 357, 359, 66 Pac. 307. During the cross-examination of the appellant she was questioned by counsel for the respondent as to her motive in going upon the fire escape. The court sustained an objection to the testimony. Respondent assigns this as error. In view of the fact that her counsel stipulated that her going on the balcony "was not on account of fire" the manifest purpose respondent had in view was accomplished, and no harm resulted from the ruling.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

49 Cal. App. 489

REMLEY v. REMLEY. (Civ. 3507.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 6, 1920.)

1. Divorce ⊂=249(3, 6)—Homestead ⊂=158—Homestead and community property may be assigned by divorce decree; dissolution of marital status and assignment of homestead destroys its character.

The court has power in a divorce action to make disposition of community property, including the homestead, and on dissolution of the marital status by court decree, and assignment of the homestead therein, its character as such is destroyed.

2. Divorce ⊂=156—Interlocutory judgment not decree of divorce, and does not dissolve marriage.

Interlocutory judgment in divorce action is not a decree of divorce, nor does it dissolve the marriage under Civ. Code, § 131, being merely a declaration that one of the spouses is entitled to divorce, and, under section 132, when one year has expired after its entry, the court may enter final judgment, granting divorce and such other relief as may be necessary to complete disposition of the action.

3. Divorce ⊂=249(1)—Court should not dispose of community property or homestead until final decree.

In view of Civ. Code, §§ 131, 132, 146, 147, the court trying action for divorce should not assign or dispose of the community property or homestead until such time as the marriage is actually dissolved by final judgment granting divorce one year after interlocutory judgment.

4. Divorce ⊂=156 — Interlocutory judgment should remain interlocutory so long as court may refuse final decree.

So long as the court which tried a divorce action may refuse to enter final decree, if intervening conditions justify its refusal, its determination, as evidenced by its interlocutory judgment, should be in the fullest sense interlocutory, without interference with the parties' property rights or otherwise, so that at any time during pendency of the action substantial justice may be done the parties, no matter what the eventuality.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Action for divorce by Lena Remley against John Remley. From an interlocutory decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed, with directions.

Percy S. King and E. L. Webber, both of Napa, for appellant.

E. S. Bell, of Napa, for respondent.

KINSELL, Judge pro tem. Defendant appeals from an interlocutory judgment of divorce in favor of plaintiff, wherein the court declared each party the owner of one-half of certain homestead community property, and awarded plaintiff a monthly allowance for the support of the minor children of the parties, such allowance to constitute a lien upon defendant's interest in such homestead property until paid.

Defendant urges two points for a reversal, viz.: (1) That the corroborating testimony was insufficient to warrant the trial court in finding for respondent; and (2) that the court erred in awarding the real property in the manner that it did in the face of the fact that there was a subsisting homestead on the same, and that the security was unreasonable.

1. The first point is so destitute of merit as hardly to warrant notice. The record discloses abundant corroborative testimony. The evidence is conflicting. The trial court found in favor of the plaintiff. In view of the conflict, this court will not disturb such findings.

2. In support of his second contention, appellant urges that the court's judgment cannot destroy the homestead character of the property assigned; that the homestead can be destroyed by two methods only: (a) By abandonment by the parties as provided in section 1243, Civil Code; or (b) by decree of court in a proceeding instituted for that purpose.

[1] That the court has power in a divorce action to make disposition of the community property, including the homestead, there can be no question (sections 146, 147, Civ. Code), and it has been repeatedly held that upon the dissolution of the marital status by court decree, and the assignment of the homestead therein, its character as such is destroyed. Shoemaker v. Chalfant, 47 Cal. 435; Grupe v. Byers, 73 Cal. 271, 14 Pac. 863; Simpson v. Simpson, 80 Cal. 237, 22 Pac. 167; Lang v. Lang, 190 Pac. 181. Therefore, appellant cannot maintain his contention that a decree of court in a proceeding instituted for that purpose is necessary to destroy a homestead.

It is our opinion, however, that the interlocutory judgment in this action cannot of itself have the effect of nullifying the homestead character of the property.

Section 146, Civil Code, provides:

"In case of the dissolution of the marriage by the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, the community property, and the homestead shall be assigned as follows," etc.

Section 147, Civil Code, provides:

"The court, in rendering a decree of divorce, must make such order for the disposition of the community property, and of the homestead as in this chapter provided," etc. (The italics in each instance are ours.)

[2] The interlocutory judgment in a divorce action is not a decree of divorce nor does it dissolve the marriage. It is merely a declaration that one of the spouses is entitled to a divorce (section 131, Civ. Code), and when one year has expired after the entry of such interlocutory judgment the court may enter the final judgment granting the divorce, and such other relief as may be necessary to complete disposition of the action. Section 132, Civ. Code; Estate of Dargie, 162 Cal. 51, 121 Pac. 320; Olson v. Superior Court, 175 Cal. 250, 165 Pac. 706, 1 A. L. R. 1589.

[3] In view of the provisions of sections 131, 132, 146, and 147, Civil Code, the court should not assign or dispose of the community property or homestead until such time as the marriage is actually dissolved.

Nor is this view in conflict with Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 103 Pac. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107, or John v. Superior Court, 5 Cal. App. 262, 90 Pac. 53. As was pointed out in those cases, the court has power to try and determine the issues between the parties to a divorce action with respect to their property, and this may and should be done at the time of the trial of the issues as to the divorce. It is at this time that the court is required to file its decision and conclusions of law, and its decision must respond to all the issues involved in the action. In such decision the court should determine whether a divorce ought to be granted; it should designate the party entitled thereto, and if property rights are involved it should determine how the property should be disposed of or assigned when such divorce is granted.

It will be noted that in the reporter's syllabus of John v. Superior Court, supra, it is stated that the court had jurisdiction, and it was its duty, under section 131, Civil Code, at the time of granting the interlocutory judgment, to include in such judgment an assignment of the homestead. This is not a correct statement of the law, nor is the statement justified by the court's decision in that case.

In the instant case the character of the homestead property was made an issue, and the trial court at the time of the rendition of its interlocutory judgment properly determined the status of the property and properly determined how such property ought to be assigned, just as it determined that a divorce ought to be granted; but in such interlocutory judgment the trial court should not attempt to destroy the homestead character of the property, nor to make an assignment thereof. At the time of the dissolution of the marriage, and at that time only, the homestead character may be abolished, and the property assigned to the respective parties pursuant to the determination made by the court at the time of the trial.

That this interpretation of the scope of the sections referred to is sound in principle will be readily appreciated, in view of the decision in Olson v. Superior Court, 175 Cal. 250, 165 Pac. 706, 1 A. L. R. 1589, holding that a final decree of divorce may not be entered after reconciliation of the parties within the one-year period following entry of the interlocutory, and that of Bancroft v. Bancroft, 178 Cal. 367, 173 Pac. 582, to the effect that after expiration of the time within which appeal may be taken or proceedings had under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, the trial court is without jurisdiction to alter or set aside its interlocutory judgment.

[4] So long as the court may refuse to enter the final decree, if intervening conditions justify such refusal (Olson v. Superior Court, supra), its determination, as evidenced by its interlocutory judgment, should be in the fullest sense interlocutory, so that at any time during the pendency of the action substantial justice may be done the parties no matter what the eventuality.

It follows, therefore, that the interlocutory judgment in the present case should be held to be, in so far as the property is concerned, merely an adjudication of the character thereof, and a determination as to how it should be ultimately assigned. It would seem that since the property is impressed with a homestead no lien could be created by interlocutory judgment on the interest of either spouse, and therefore the decree in that behalf should be modified by striking therefrom the following:

"* * * And that defendant's one-half interest in the community real property shall be subject to the payment of said allowance for the support of said minor children; and said allowance to be and constitute a lien upon said defendant's one-half interest in said community real property, until paid."

As so modified, the judgment is affirmed. Let the court upon entering its final decree assign the property according to the determination expressed in its interlocutory judgment, and at that time (Civ. Code, § 140) it may require such reasonable security as it may deem proper for payment of maintenance.

SIMMONDS v. BELL. (Civ. 2052.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 6, 1920.)

Appeal and error ⇐1010(1)—Finding of trial court supported by evidence affirmed.

Where a tenant's appeal presents the simple proposition of the amount due for rent, and the record contains evidence to support the findings of the trial court, the judgment will be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by W. S. Simmonds against B. L. Bell. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles B. Harris and Ralph H. Lewis, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

J. W. S. Butler and B. F. Van Dyke, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Plaintiff executed and delivered to defendant a lease which by its terms expired on November 20, 1916. The lease contained the following covenant:

"The lessees have the privilege of renewing this lease at its expiration on November 20, 1916, for five additional years at a monthly rental to be agreed upon by the lessor and lessees, and if they cannot agree on a monthly rental, they shall submit to an arbitration board of three or more persons, and their decision shall fix the monthly rental."

It is admitted that the lessee, Bell, remained in possession of the premises until February 20, 1919, when he vacated the same. On November 20, 1916, the lessee was in arrears for two months' rent to the amount of $180. No written notice of intention to exercise the option for renewal of the lease was ever given, and the evidence is in conflict as to whether there was an oral notice to that effect. No board of arbitration was ever selected; no award was ever made, the amount of rent for the new term was never agreed upon, and no new lease was ever prepared or executed. The complaint contained three counts. The first was for an injunction against the continuance of certain acts claimed to constitute a nuisance, for damages therefor, and for possession of said premises. The second was for rental and water rates from November 20, 1919, to October 5, 1918, and the third for damages for strip and waste in the sum of $150. It was stipulated at the trial that the plaintiff need not file a supplemental complaint or new action for such rents as he might claim for the period between the filing of the complaint and the vacation of the premises by defendant, which occurred before said trial, but that such matter might be considered by the court as though properly pleaded and denied.

The court found that the lease was terminated on November 20, 1916, and thereafter the defendant remained in possession by consent of plaintiff at the rental of $90 per month. There is evidence to support this finding, and the computation made by the court as to the amount due plaintiff for said possession is not subject to criticism. The court also allowed plaintiff $150 for strip and waste, as alleged in the complaint, and it is not disputed by appellant that there is sufficient evidence to sustain that contention. As against said allowance the court permitted an offset in behalf of defendant to the extent of $984.50. It is not claimed by appellant that the record demands the allowance of a larger counterclaim. In short, the case is one involving no novel principle of law, but presenting the simple proposition of the amount due for rent, the record containing evidence to support the findings of the court.

Some questions are discussed by counsel for appellant that have no application to the facts as revealed by the record, and we, therefore, pass them by without specific consideration. We may remark in conclusion that the contentions of appellant are conclusively answered in the brief of respondent, to which no reply has been made, apparently for the reason that no satisfactory reply can be made.

We are satisfied that the appeal is without merit, and the judgment is affirmed.

MAGINNIS v. HURLBUTT. (Civ. 3515.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 5, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 2, 1920.)

1. Public lands ⇐61(14) — Lands between meander line of lake and low-water mark cannot be granted as swamp lands.

Where lands lying between the meander line of uplands granted by the United States and the edge of a lake at low-water mark were not swamp and overflowed land within the Swamp Land Act of 1850 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4958–4960), they could not be granted by the state under California act of March 24, 1893, known as the Lake Location Act, and a purported grant by the state was not validated by Pol. Code, § 3493s, but such land passed to the patentee of the uplands.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1011(1) — Finding on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

A finding by the trial court on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed; there being sufficient evidence to support it.

3. Quieting title ⇐29—Where no adverse title was acquired, delay does not amount to laches.

Where defendant's predecessor did not succeed in establishing title to land by adverse possession, and for many years before suit there was no regular occupancy by defendant's predecessor, etc., plaintiff, who had title, was under no duty to commence an action to quiet title against occasional occupants, and so a later action to quiet title was not barred by laches.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by J. H. Maginnis (L. J. Shuman, substitute) against Emeline W. Hurlbutt. From a judgment quieting plaintiff's title, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 34 Cal. App. 504, 168 Pac. 368.

H. B. Churchill, of Lakeport, and Lovett K. Fraser, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action to quiet title.

The lands embraced in said action lie along the shore of Clear Lake between the meander line of the lands granted by the United States government to the predecessors of the plaintiff, in the patent on which the latter relies, and the edge of Clear Lake at low-water mark. The defendant, in her pleadings and proofs in the trial court and in her briefs upon this appeal, relies: First, upon a certificate of purchase to said strip of land issued by the state of California to her predecessor; second, upon adverse possession of said strip of land by H. B. Guernsey, one of the defendant's predecessors in the possession of said premises; and, third, upon the plaintiff's laches in the institution of the present action.

[1] As to the first of these contentions it was resolved by the trial court against the defendant upon evidence which sufficiently tended to show that the lands in question were not swamp and overflowed land within the meaning of that term as used in the act of Congress of September 28, 1850, commonly known as the Swamp Land Act, and hence that the attempted grant of said lands under the act of the state of California approved March 24, 1893, and commonly known as the Lake Location Act (St. 1893, p. 341), conveyed no title to the defendant's original predecessor claiming under said grant. Churchill v. Kingsbury, 178 Cal. 554, 174 Pac. 329. In that case also the claim of the defendant that grants of the character of that under which she claims were validated by section 3493s of the Political Code is disposed of adversely to her contention.

[2] The appellant's second contention is that she has become entitled to said lands by adverse possession. With respect to this contention the evidence is conflicting. The trial court, in its opinion in the decision of said cause, reviews this evidence, and arrives at the conclusion that the defendant failed at the trial to establish the right of her predecessor, Guernsey, to the ownership of said lands by adverse possession. We have examined the record with reference to this subject, and are of the opinion that the conclusion of the trial court in this regard must be sustained.

[3] The final contention of the appellant is that the plaintiff was guilty of laches in delaying the institution of this suit during a period of some 16 years after the alleged adverse holding of the defendant's predecessor, Guernsey, during which time the successors of Guernsey down to the defendant herein was dealing with this land. The evidence in the case, however, shows that said Guernsey did not succeed in establishing his title to said land by adverse possession, but that subsequent to the year 1903 there was no regular occupancy of said land either by said Guernsey or by his successors down to the defendant herein, and hence that the plaintiff, having title to said land under the terms of his patent to the uplands adjacent to the same, had laid upon him no duty of commencing an action to quiet title against persons whose occasional occupancy of the premises, or whose payment of taxes thereon, would not have sufficed to create during said period a title by adverse possession. It is not contended that the respondent did any act which could be construed into an estoppel, and, this being so, his mere delay in the institution of an action to quiet his title against occasional occupants of this portion of his lands cannot be held to constitute such laches as would bar his right of recovery in the instant case.

This disposes of the several points made by the appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

HINRICHSEN v. IMPERIAL WATER CO. NO. 1. et al. (Civ. 3341.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 23, 1920.)

1. Corporations ⟸123(14)—Pledgor by specifying method of sale on default waives compliance with statutory method.

Where trust deed conveyed land and also corporate stock, and provided for sale thereof by trustee on default in payment of note in the manner described in the trust deed, the trustee, as a condition to sale of the stock, was not required to give the notice required on sale of pledged personal property by Civ. Code, § 3005, and Code Civ. Proc. § 692, but was merely required to proceed in the manner specified in the deed, since the grantor, by specifying the notice to be given, waived compliance with the statutory method.

2. Corporations ⟸123(14)—Pledgor held to have ratified sale estopping him from questioning its validity.

Pledgor of stock who directed trustee who had sold stock on default in payment of note secured to pay out of the purchase money received from the sale several sums of money, exhausting proceeds over and above sum owing to holder, is estopped to question validity of sale for insufficiency of notice.

3. Corporations ⟸133 — In suit to compel transfer of stock bought at trustee's sale, held purchaser might show ratification of sale.

In action by purchaser of stock at trustee's sale to compel transfer of stock on books of corporation, where pledgor joined as a defendant, in answer and also in cross-complaint alleged ownership of stock, and where plaintiff in answer to cross-complaint denied such allegation, plaintiff could show that such defendant ratified the sale, and was therefore estopped to question its validity, being entitled under such pleadings to introduce any evidence showing that the title and right of possession was vested in himself.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Irl E. Hinrichsen against the Imperial Water Company No. 1, L. F. Farnsworth, and others, in which last-named defendant filed cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. R. Simon, of El Centro, for appellant.

Hickcox & Crenshaw and Frederick J. Trude, all of El Centro, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff to compel the transfer to him, on the books of defendant corporation, of 160 shares of its capital stock. The defendant Farnsworth filed with his answer a cross-complaint, alleging that the plaintiff converted the stock to his use, to Farnsworth's damage in the sum of $4,800. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, and Farnsworth appeals therefrom.

On the 1st day of June, 1910, L. F. Farnsworth and R. H. Benton executed to A. A. Cox their note in the sum of $12,600, due on or before January 1, 1916, secured by a trust deed of that date conveying to the trustee certain described real property in the county of Imperial together with said 160 shares of capital stock of Imperial Water Company No. 1. It was provided therein that upon default in payment of the debt the trustee "shall sell the above-granted premises, or such part thereof as in his discretion he shall find it necessary to sell," in the manner described in the deed, namely, by first publishing notice of the time and place of such sale, with a description of the property to be sold, at least once a week for four weeks in some newspaper published in said county of Imperial. On May 29, 1918, Cox transferred to Hinrichsen said promissory note, together with the security. Default having been made in the payment of the note, the trustee, on request of Hinrichsen, advertised the property in the manner described in the trust deed for sale on the 16th day of July, 1918. At that time the trustee offered for sale to the highest bidder all of the property described in the deed, including said 160 shares of capital stock. At the time of execution of the trust deed Farnsworth and Benton had caused the water stock to be issued to Cox, pledgee of Farnsworth and Benton, and had delivered said water stock to Cox without the indorsement of said pledgors. At the time appointed for the sale, and when the property was offered for sale, both Farnsworth and one Wallace Merchant were present. This occurred pursuant to an agreement in writing theretofore made between the two men last named which referred to the proposed sale of land and water stock, and wherein Merchant agreed to bid for the property the sum of $30,000, and further agreements were made with respect to the terms on which Merchant should hold the title if Merchant became purchaser at such sale. Merchant did bid the sum of $30,000, but the property was sold to Hinrichsen by reason of the fact that Hinrichsen bid the higher sum of $30,350. After the sale and on the same day the defendant Farnsworth directed the trustee to pay out of the purchase money received from the sale several sums of money, and said sums were by virtue of such order paid out by the trustee, thereby exhausting the entire proceeds of the sale over and above the sum of approximately $20,000 owing to Hinrichsen.

Notwithstanding the facts above stated, appellant Farnsworth claims that the sale of the water stock was void because the only notice of sale given by the trustee did not include a notice given by posting written notice of the time and place of sale in three public places in the township or city where the same was to be made; in other words, that the notice of sale was not the kind of notice required to be given upon sale of personal property under execution, as provided by Civil Code, § 3005, and section 692 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that, the indebtedness to Hinrichsen having been satisfied by virtue of the sale (which is admitted to have been valid with respect to the real property described in the trust deed), the shares of stock became the property of Farnsworth, free from any claim of Hinrichsen.

[1] It is true that the trust deed did not in terms and by special or separate reference to the shares of stock provide for the manner of sale thereof, but it did grant and convey the land and the shares of stock to the trustee, authorized the trustee to pay all taxes, assessments, and liens "upon said premises," and "all assessments against said shares of capital stock which may in their judgment affect said real or personal property or these trusts," and provided that in case of default in payment when due of any of the indebtedness covered by the instrument, the trustee, on application of the creditor, "shall sell the above-granted premises, or such part thereof as in his discretion he shall find it necessary to sell in order to accomplish the object of these trusts," and that such sale should be made in the manner described in the trust deed. We are of the opinion that this instrument, taken as a whole and considered in the light of the purposes for which it was made, intended that the manner of sale and the notice of sale set forth in the trust deed should apply to the shares of stock as well as to the land described in the deed. So construed, the terms of the deed as agreed to by Farnsworth in executing the same constituted a waiver of compliance with the statutory method of sale of pledged personal property. This being so, the sale carried to the purchaser full right and title to the shares of stock, and the plaintiff is entitled to have the same transferred to him on the books of the corporation. It is conceded that Hinrichsen presented the certificate of stock to the secretary of the water company, together with the trustee's deed, and duly made demand for such transfer, which was refused.

[2, 3] We further agree with the suggestion made by respondent that if by reason of the claimed failure to give notice as required by the statute in case of sales of pledged property the sale was not legally made, nevertheless appellant by his acts, which we have briefly described, ratified the sale and should not now be heard to question its validity. To meet this contention of the respondent, appellant insists that ratification of the sale cannot be claimed against him, because such ratification was not pleaded by respondent in his answer to the cross-complaint, and because at the time of such alleged ratification Farnsworth did not know of the material facts relative to the sale; that is to say, did not know what the law was with regard to the sale of pledged property, or what steps a pledgee must take in order legally to sell pledged property, or that the statutory notices had not been posted. Under the circumstances of this case, we think that such pleading on the part of the plaintiff was not necessary. Defendant Farnsworth answered, apart from his cross-complaint, affirmatively alleging that he was the owner of the water stock and entitled to possession of the certificate therefor. In his cross-complaint he again alleged that he was then and there the owner of said certificate and shares of stock, which allegation was denied by the answer to cross-complaint. This was sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to introduce any evidence showing that the title and right of possession of the property at the time in question was vested in himself. Summerville v. Stockton Milling Co., 142 Cal. 529, 548, 76 Pac. 243.

There is no evidence that the sale of the land alone would have brought a sum sufficient to have paid the indebtedness to Hinrichsen, even if we exclude from consideration the fact that a large additional sum paid out by the trustee to Hinrichsen as purchaser was in effect paid over to Farnsworth after the sale, and on his order, to his other creditors. Nevertheless, without tendering to the plaintiff any sum whatever, he seeks to have returned to him a valuable part of the property which was included in the trustee's sale. The injustice of appellant's claim is clear on the face of the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

HUMPHREY v. UNITED STATES MACARONI CO. (Civ. 3346.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 28, 1920.)

1. Master and servant ⊂=329—Pleadings held not to raise issue of ownership of automobile or employment of driver.

In an action against an automobile owner for injuries, in which the complaint alleged that the automobile was owned by defendant and was driven by defendant's employé, an answer admitting that defendant had a person in its employ whose duties were to drive, but denying that the automobile was driven by the driver thereof, or any employé of the defendant, negligently or unlawfully, held not to raise issue of defendant's ownership or employment of driver.

2. Municipal corporations ⊂⊃592(1)—Ordinance held not inconsistent with Motor Vehicle Act.

Ordinance requiring driver of vehicle to drive on right-hand side of street as near right-hand curb as possible held not inconsistent with Motor Vehicle Act, § 20, subd. (a), requiring driver, wherever practical, to drive on right-hand side of highway; the ordinance not requiring travel on right-hand side of street when the conditions are such that it is not practical.

3. Municipal corporations ⊂⊃592(1)—Motor Vehicle Act prevails over inconsistent ordinance.

Motor Vehicle Act, § 22, prescribing rate of speed, prevails over inconsistent ordinance, the ordinance in such case being void.

4. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1051(1)—Admission of void ordinance held harmless.

In action for injury sustained when struck by defendant's automobile, admission in evidence of void ordinance prescribing rate of speed held not prejudicial to defendant, where the evidence proved that automobile driver at time of accident was violating the Motor Vehicle Act.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Henry S. Humphrey against the United States Macaroni Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant appeals from a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $5,635 on account of alleged negligence of the defendant in the operation of its automobile at the intersection of Lyons and Ramirez streets in the city of Los Angeles on the 3d day of October, 1918.

Appellant contends that the findings are not sustained by the evidence, in this, that there is no evidence showing that defendant owned the automobile or that the person driving it was in defendant's employ or was acting in any way for the defendant. The complaint alleged that—

"While plaintiff was walking carefully along on the sidewalk of the northerly side of Lyons street, at or near the intersection of Ramirez street, which are public streets in the city of Los Angeles, state of California, the aforesaid automobile of the defendant herein, while being driven and propelled by the aforesaid driver and employé of said defendant herein, was so negligently and unlawfully operated that it overturned upon and over plaintiff and violently struck and threw down plaintiff herein while he was on the said sidewalk at or near the aforesaid intersection, and injured him as hereinafter set out."

The answer on that subject is as follows:

"Admits that on or about October 3, 1918, defendant herein had a person in its employ whose duties were to drive an automobile for the defendant, but denies that on October 3, 1918, while plaintiff was walking carefully along or on the sidewalk of the northerly side of Lyons street, at or near the intersection of Ramirez street, in the city of Los Angeles, the automobile of the defendant was driven or propelled by the driver thereof, or any employé of the defendant, negligently or unlawfully, or that the same was so negligently or unlawfully operated that it overturned upon or over plaintiff, or violently struck or threw down plaintiff while he was on the sidewalk, or at or near the aforesaid intersection, or that plaintiff was thereby injured."

[1] This answer in effect admits that defendant's automobile was being driven by defendant's employé and as such employé at the time and place indicated. The only denial is that the driving of the automobile by defendant's employé was negligent or unlawful, or so negligent or unlawful that the automobile was overturned upon the plaintiff, to his injury, etc. On the issues thus limited, it was not necessary for the plaintiff to introduce evidence to prove that the defendant owned the automobile or that the driver was in the defendant's employ.

Appellant next contends that the court erred in admitting in evidence certain sections of an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles, thereby overruling defendant's objection that the provisions of the ordinance are different from the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act on the same subject, and that the state law controls. Section 6 of the ordinance provides that—

"The driver of any vehicle, upon meeting any other vehicle at any place upon any street shall turn to the right, and, on all occasions shall travel on the right-hand side of such street, and as near the right-hand curb thereof as possible," with exceptions which need not be discussed.

The Motor Vehicle Act (section 20, subd. [a], Stats. of 1917, p. 400) requires that the driver of a vehicle on a public highway "wherever practicable shall travel on the right-hand side of such highway." Appellant contends that the language of the ordinance requiring vehicles to travel on the right-hand side of the street is absolute in terms, whereas the Motor Vehicle Act only requires such travel on the right-hand side of the street wherever practicable.

[2] It would be absurd to construe the ordinance as requiring such travel on the right-hand side of the street when the conditions are such that it is not practicable. There is no difference in effect between the terms of the ordinance and of the statute with regard to this rule.

[3, 4] Section 80 of the ordinance provides that—

"Any person who shall ride, drive or propel or who shall cause or permit to be ridden driven or propelled, any vehicle at a rate of speed greater than twenty (20) miles per hour and not greater than thirty (30) miles per hour along or upon any street in the city of Los Angeles," outside of certain described territory, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

The Motor Vehicle Act (section 22 [a], Stats. 1917, p. 404) provides, among other things:

"That no person shall operate or drive a motor vehicle or other vehicle on any public highway at a greater rate of speed than fifteen miles an hour * * * in approaching or traversing an intersecting highway, or crossing or intersection of highways, or in approaching or going around corners or curves in the highway, when in any of the foregoing cases the operator's or chauffeur's view of the road * * * is obstructed."

At the time and place in question in this case the defendant's automobile was traveling in a southerly direction on Lyons street and approaching Ramirez street. The evidence tends to prove that the automobile was traveling in the middle of the street at a rate of speed in excess of 20 miles per hour; that the operator's view of the road—that is to say, of Ramirez street—so far as travel from the west on that street was concerned, was obstructed by a two-story building located at the northwest corner of the two streets. At the intersection the automobile made a sharp turn to the left, and turned over. We concede that the Motor Vehicle Act on the subject prevails over the ordinance, and that the provisions of the ordinance are invalid. Ex parte Daniels, decision by the Supreme Court, rendered September 10, 1920, 192 Pac. 442. It appears by the evidence to which we have referred that the court was justified in its finding of negligence on the part of the defendant under the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act by reason of the same facts which would have made the driver's conduct negligent under the provisions of the ordinance, if the ordinance had been in force. This being so, the admission of the ordinance in evidence, though erroneous, was not prejudicial to the defendant. In the case next to be cited appellant contended that the court erred in admitting in evidence an ordinance of the city of Long Beach containing certain regulations concerning the method of driving a vehicle in a public street. The court found facts showing that the conduct in question violated not only the provisions of the ordinance, but those of the statute. Thereupon the Supreme Court said:

"In view of this finding it is not necessary to consider whether the * * * section 8 above referred to was superseded by the Motor Vehicle Act. It is to be noted that the court not only found that at the time of the accident the defendant was violating the said city ordinance, but also that he was violating the Motor Vehicle Act itself, in that 'he did not keep to the right of the center of the street intersection of said Third street and Atlantic avenue.' For this reason the admission of the ordinance, even if erroneous, would not be prejudicial." Pemberton v. Arny, 182 Pac. 964, 967.

The last point presented by appellant is that the damages awarded in this case are excessive. The evidence, which we will not take space to review, shows very serious injuries received by the plaintiff. The amount of the award is not great enough to raise any presumption that it was based on prejudice or passion, rather than sober judgment, and we are not able to say that it is grossly disproportionate to any reasonable limit of compensation warranted by the facts.

The judgment is affirmed.

49 Cal. App. 429

ROTHWELL et al. v. VAUGHN. (Civ. 3458.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 30, 1920.)

1. Partnership ⟸242(5)—Finding sale of interest in partnership business took place on date of option held unsupported.

A finding by the trial court that a sale by defendant to plaintiff of his interest in a partnership business took place on a date different from that alleged in the complaint is unsupported by the evidence, where it appears that what was executed on the date found was merely an agreement or option to sell, and that the transfer, which was part of the same transaction, occurred on a subsequent date alleged in the complaint.

2. Partnership ⟸242(5)—Finding that partners, suing on a covenant of a predecessor in business had ceased to do business under name stated in contract not sustained.

In an action by partners, who had succeeded to defendant's interest in a business, on defendant's covenant to restrain from engaging in the same business, evidence held insufficient to sustain the trial court's finding that plaintiffs had ceased to do business under the firm name stated in the contract and had engaged in business under another name.

3. Partnership ⟸279—Remaining partner can enforce covenant with firm after dissolution.

After a partnership with which defendant had covenanted not to engage in business for a limited time was dissolved, under Civ. Code, § 2450, by the sale of one partner's interest, but the remaining partner and the purchaser of the interest remained in business as partners, the remaining partner could enforce the covenant against defendant.

⟸For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

4. Injunction ⊂⊃128—Finding no solicitation of former customers held contrary to evidence.

In a suit to restrain the violation of defendant's covenant not to engage in business within a specified time, evidence by defendant himself that he had given former customers his card after engaging in the new business and sent them circulars, that several had seen his advertisement, and had come to his place of business, held to show that a finding by the trial court that defendant had not solicited former customers was contrary to the evidence.

5. Good will ⊂⊃6(4) — Covenant to refrain from business held not terminated.

Evidence that defendant, who had been employed by plaintiffs and covenanted not to engage in a competing business, requested release from his employment to engage in business in another city, whereupon the contract of employment was canceled, under Civ. Code, §§ 1698, 1699, by tearing off the signatures, but the contract containing the covenant was expressly reserved by plaintiffs, does not support the trial court's finding that the parties released each other of all covenants and obligations between themselves.

6. Partnership ⊂⊃64—Failure to file certificate as to fictitious firm name does not bar recovery on contract in partners' individual names.

Under Civ. Code, § 2468, prohibiting action on a contract under a fictitious or partnership name when a required certificate has not been filed, the failure to file the certificate does not prevent enforcement of a covenant by defendant not to engage in the business, made in the names of the partners' individual, and not in their fictitious firm, name.

7. Good will ⊂⊃6(4)—Mutual rescission of portion of contract is not breach, which terminates obligation.

Even if a contract for the employment of defendant by plaintiffs was a part of the agreement by which defendant sold his business to plaintiffs and agreed not to engage in competing business, a mutual rescission of the contract for employment at defendant's request was not a breach of the entire contract, which terminates his obligation to refrain from engaging in the business.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Chester L. Rothwell and another against Leon E. Vaughn to restrain defendant from practicing optometry in violation of his covenant not to do so. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

L. B. Stanton, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Irvin C. Louis and R. M. Blodget, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to restrain defendant from practicing the business or profession of optometry in the city of Los Angeles, in violation of a covenant of the defendant contained in the bill of sale of his interest in a certain partnership known as the Cahn-Vaughn Optical Company. On September 12, 1917, Henry Cahn entered into an agreement to sell his three-fourths interest in said partnership business to the plaintiff Rothwell and covenanted to refrain from engaging in such business in the city of Los Angeles for a period of five years thereafter. It was also agreed that the defendant Vaughn, who owned a one-quarter interest in the business, should be continued as a partner with the purchaser. During the period of the option to sell contained in this agreement negotiations were had with defendant Vaughn, whereby he agreed to sell his one-quarter interest in said business to plaintiff Rothwell and one John F. Rothwell for the sum of $1,371.48. On the 25th of October, 1917, Cahn executed and delivered his bill of sale for his three-quarter interest in the business, and on the same day defendant executed and delivered his bill of sale for his one-quarter interest in the business to the two Rothwells. In this bill of sale defendant covenanted with the purchasers that he would not enter into the business of optometry, except for the Rothwell Optical Company, in the city and in the county of Los Angeles for a period of five years thereafter. When the defendant entered the Cahn-Vaughn Optical Company, he transferred to the partnership a large number of prescriptions, together with the good will of his business, which he had theretofore been conducting in the city of Los Angeles. He continued actively in the business of the Cahn-Vaughn Optical Company, so that at the time of the transfers in October, 1917, the company had upwards of 4,000 prescriptions of patrons on its files, all of which were included in the two bills of sale. On the same day that the transfers were made the two Rothwells made a contract with defendant, whereby they agreed to employ him as an optometrist up to the 1st of September, 1918, at $40 per week. He continued in their employ up to the 1st day of April, 1918, when John F. Rothwell sold his interest in the business to the plaintiff Von Breton, and the plaintiff Rothwell purchased an undivided one-half interest in the business of Von Breton. These two continued to operate the business at two separate places in the city of Los Angeles—one at 718 Broadway, the original location of the partnership business; the other at 404 South Broadway, the location of the business formerly owned by Von Breton. At this time the defendant was detailed to the store at 404 South Broadway, without any change in the manner of his employment, and continued to be so employed there up to the 30th of April, 1918, when, upon his own request, he was paid in full for his services, together with one month's pay in advance, and his employment ceased. Upon the last day, according to his own testimony, defendant approached the plaintiff Rothwell and asked to be relieved of his contract of employment, stating that he had an opportunity to engage in the same business in the city of Modesto and also at Oxnard. Acting upon this request, the plaintiff Rothwell canceled the contract of employment, by tearing the signatures off both copies of the document. At the same time he informed defendant that he intended to retain the bill of sale containing the covenant which is the basis of this action, and carefully placed that document in his safe. Some suggestion was made by plaintiff Rothwell that defendant might obtain employment in the city of Pasadena, or in the city of Long Beach; but nothing was said regarding his engaging in business in the city of Los Angeles, and no suggestion was made by either party that the covenant contained in the bill of sale be waived or canceled.

Immediately thereafter, and on the 6th day of May, 1918, defendant entered into the business of optometry in his own name in the city of Los Angeles, advertised the fact in the Los Angeles papers, and circularized former patrons of the Cahn-Vaughn Optical Company to give him their business. The evidence shows conclusively that defendant was very successful in his new enterprise, and obtained several of the former customers of the Cahn-Vaughn Optical Company, as well as those of the plaintiffs. The appeal is based upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings. Appellants attack substantially all the findings made by the trial court, but consideration need be given to those only wherein the most glaring error appears, as it is not likely that the other errors complained of will occur upon a new trial of the case.

[1] Finding 2, to the effect that Cahn sold his interest in the Cahn-Vaughn Optical Company to the Rothwells on the 25th of September, 1917, rather than on the 25th of October, 1917, as alleged in the complaint, is not supported by the evidence. The instrument dated September 12, 1917, was merely an agreement or option to sell. The transfer did not take place until October 25, 1917, the same day upon which defendant sold his interest in the concern to the Rothwells, and without doubt the two transfers constituted one transaction—that is, the sale of the entire partnership interest to the Rothwells.

[2] Finding 4, which implies the dissolution of the Rothwell Optical Company and the formation of a new partnership, known as the Von Breton-Rothwell Optical Company, has no support in the evidence. The partnership of John F. Rothwell and Chester L. Rothwell was dissolved by operation of law through the sale of the former's interest. Section 2450, Civ. Code. But as to the dissolution of the Rothwell Optical Company—that is to say, the discontinuance of the firm name—the only evidence in the record is that of Chester Rothwell. When asked when the Rothwell Optical Company was dissolved he answered:

"It has never been dissolved; no. He [John F. Rothwell] simply sold his interest to Von Breton, and Von Breton, simply took it up where he dropped it."

[3] There is no evidence that the parties continued to do business under the name of Von Breton-Rothwell Optical Company, or that a partnership of that name was ever formed; and, if they did so, it would be wholly immaterial to the issues of the case. The respondent had covenanted with the two Rothwells that he would not engage in the same business in Los Angeles for his own benefit, or for the benefit of any person or firm other than the Rothwell Optical Company. If this firm was dissolved, then respondent was not entitled to engage in the business in Los Angeles for any one. Though the sale of the John Rothwell interest may not have conveyed the right to respondent's personal services under the employment contract, it certainly conveyed his rights under the covenant. In any event, Chester Rothwell, as one of the parties beneficially interested in the covenant, was entitled to enforce its obligation. He continued to pay respondent's salary after the sale to Von Breton, and did nothing to indicate an intention to waive the obligation of the covenant.

[4] Finding 5, to the effect that it is not true that respondent has solicited or is soliciting the former patrons or customers of appellants, as successors of the said Cahn-Vaughn Optical Company, is in direct conflict with the evidence of the respondent. When asked, "Did you do any business with the old customers of the Cahn-Vaughn Optical Company?" he answered:

"If such they be, I met different ones I had met at different places, and gave them a card, and sent them—some came in through the notice in the change of my address I put in the paper—I guess in probably three months I think a couple of dozen."

Again:

"When you went over to this place, you sent out a circular letter to a number of them? A. Yes, sir; I went through the telephone book, and any place I could get names, and sent out about 400."

[5] Finding 8, to the effect that on or about the 1st of April, 1918, the Rothwell Optical Company and the respondent settled between themselves all claims or demands of any nature existing between them, and then and there each released the other from any and all claims, demands, obligations, covenants, and conditions, is not supported by the evidence. In the first place, it is undisputed that respondent continued in the employ of the appellant Rothwell until the 30th of April, 1918, and that no transaction of any kind was had between them on the 1st of April. The evidence as to what occurred on the 30th of April is confined to the testimony of Chester L. Rothwell and respondent, and is without substantial conflict. It is to the effect that on that date respondent came to Rothwell's office, in response to a suggestion made by respondent over the telephone that he desired to terminate his employment, and that he planned to enter into business either in the city of Modesto or Oxnard. Upon his own request Rothwell canceled the contract of employment, by tearing off the signatures to both the original contract which he had in his possession and the copy which was presented to him for that purpose by respondent. No suggestion was made by respondent at that or any other time that the covenant contained in the bill of sale should be waived or canceled. In fact, according to his own testimony he did not request a release from the covenant, and did not at any time suggest to Rothwell that he contemplated or might desire to enter into the business of an optometrist in the city of Los Angeles. He did testify that he handed his copy of the covenant to Rothwell with his employment contract, but that Rothwell returned it to him after canceling the employment contract, and told him to keep it, as he intended to keep the original in his files. Respondent also testified that he did not at that time contemplate going in business for himself in Los Angeles and made no suggestion to Rothwell that he might do so.

Section 1698 of the Civil Code provides that—

"A contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing, or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise."

But section 1699 of the same Code provides that—

"The destruction or cancellation of a written contract, or of the signature of the parties liable thereon, with intent to extinguish the obligation thereof, extinguishes it as to all the parties consenting to the act."

The latter method was adopted as to the contract of employment. Rothwell expressly stated that he intended to preserve the bill of sale with the covenant, and at no time expressed any intention to extinguish the obligation thereof in writing or otherwise. It must be held, therefore, that the covenant was still in full force and effect.

[6] As to finding 9, to the effect that the Rothwell Optical Company ceased to engage in business on the 1st of April, 1918, the evidence is plainly to the contrary, as has heretofore been pointed out. That portion of the finding which relates to the employment of respondent by Von Breton on March 1st finds no support in the evidence. That portion of this finding and of the one following relating to the failure of the parties to file with the county clerk of Los Angeles county a certificate of copartnership in accordance with section 2468, Civil Code, is supported by the evidence and the admissions of counsel, but is wholly unrelated to any of the issues of the case. The covenant contained in the bill of sale was made in the name of Chester L. Rothwell and John F. Rothwell as individuals "doing business under the firm name of Rothwell Optical Company." Respondent covenanted with these individuals that he would not for a period of five years thereafter engage in the business or profession of manufacturing optician or optometry for his own individual benefit, or for the benefit of any person, firm, or corporation other than said Rothwell Optical Company. The inhibitions of section 2468 run to the maintenance of an action upon or on account of "any contract or contracts made, or transactions had, under such fictitious name, or in their partnership name." As this contract was not made in the fictitious or partnership name, but was made in the individual names of the parties, it is clear that the section does not prohibit the parties maintaining an action of this nature. Spreckels v. Grace Darling Hosp. Ass'n, 28 Cal. App. 646, 648, 153 Pac. 718.

[7] In the argument, wholly inconsistent with their theory of the case in relation to this plea of abatement, counsel for respondent now insist that, inasmuch as the contract of employment was for personal services wherein respondent engaged himself in the employ of the two Rothwells, the sale by John F. Rothwell of his interest in the business to Von Breton ipso facto breached the contract. It is then argued that, as the contract of employment was made at the same time as the covenant, they constituted one entire agreement and the breach of the former relieved respondent from the obligation of the latter. But, assuming that the two contracts created one agreement, it does not follow that they were not severable. Respondent accepted payment of his salary until June 1, 1918. His contract of employment had but 3 months to run. The covenant ran for 4½ years. The parties could very well agree to cancel the employment contract without affecting the obligation of the covenant. Thus, if the alleged breach of April 1st was waived by respondent accepting salary in accordance with the employment contract for 2 months thereafter, he could not assign the breach as an excuse for his repudiation of the covenant. His testimony is all to the effect that the employment was terminated solely upon his request as he felt he would do better for himself outside of Los Angeles. There was no suggestion that appellant Rothwell had breached his contract until after the litigation arose.

For these reasons the judgment must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

FLY v. CLINE, Sheriff of Los Angeles County, et al. (Civ. 3214.)

1. Judgment ⟸779(2)—Mortgages ⟸594(5)—Judgment lien held not to attach to land conveyed by judgment debtor before rendition of judgment.

Judgment lien did not attach to land conveyed by judgment debtor prior to rendition of judgment so as to give judgment creditor right of redemption against mortgage foreclosure sale purchaser under Code Civ. Proc. § 701, subd. 2, where record owner at time of rendition of judgment was not a party to the action and was an innocent purchaser in good faith, even though judgment debtor had conveyed land for purpose of defrauding creditors.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⟸242 — Purchaser for value presumed prima facie an innocent purchaser in good faith.

A purchaser for value is presumed prima facie to be innocent purchaser in good faith.

3. Fraudulent conveyances ⟸172(1)—Valid between parties.

A conveyance in fraud of creditors, though declared by statute to be void as to creditors, is valid as between the parties.

4. Fraudulent conveyances ⟸203—Bona fide purchaser from fraudulent grantee takes title purged of fraud.

A bona fide purchaser from the fraudulent grantee takes the title even against the creditors of the fraudulent grantor, purged of the anterior fraud that affected the title.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⟸239(4)—Innocent purchaser from grantee named in deed, intended as mortgage, gets good title.

Where a conveyance intended as security is absolute on its face, and the land is subsequently conveyed to an innocent third person, who pays the purchase money or renders a valuable consideration without notice of the true character of the conveyance, he gets good title under Civ. Code, §§ 2925, 2950, which cannot be disturbed by any claim that the original transaction was a mortgage, and not an absolute conveyance.

6. Judgment ⟸711—Mechanic's lien foreclosure decree not res adjudicata as to record owner not made party to action.

Mechanic's lien foreclosure decree in action to which record owner of land was not made a party was not res adjudicata in subsequent action between the lien claimant and such owner of record for her successors in title.

7. Contracts ⟸25—Agreement held merely an agreement to execute building contract.

Owner's agreement "to give" contractor a contract to construct apartment house "to have about 54 apartments of two and three rooms each and the cost not to exceed $45,000," with no definite agreement as to number of apartments or price to be paid, held not to empower contractor to do any work on premises; the agreement not being a building contract, but merely an agreement to execute a building contract.

8. Contracts ⟸25—When agreement to execute future contract is valid.

Where the minds of the parties have met respecting the terms and conditions of the more formal writing that is to be executed by them, and the agreed terms of the contract thereafter to be executed are certain and in all respects definitely understood and agreed upon in advance either orally or by informal writing, there is an obligatory contract dating from the making of the earlier agreement, but, unless the agreement to execute the future contract is definite and certain upon all the subjects to be embraced, so that nothing is left for future negotiation, it is nugatory.

9. Mechanics' liens ⟸132(13) — Contractor doing preliminary work not entitled to file claim within 60 days after completion of main contract.

Contractor who did work preparatory to erection of building, such as grading, clearing of lot, removing of trees, etc., under an agreement with owner claimed by him to be a building contract, was not entitled, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, to 60 days after completion of construction of building by other contractor under another contract in which to file claim, but was required to file claim within statutory period after completion of work he himself performed.

10. Mechanics' liens ⟸132(11)—Time for filing claim not extended by existence of another and distinct contract unperformed.

Where labor or materials are furnished under separate building contracts, even though such contracts are between the same persons and relate to the same building or employment, the contracts cannot be tacked together so as to enlarge the time for filing lien for what was done or furnished under either, but claim of lien must be filed for what was done or furnished under each contract within statutory period of its completion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Consolidated actions by Milton A. Fly against John C. Cline, as Sheriff of Los Angeles County, Cal., and others. From judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Lewis, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Several actions in the superior court were consolidated and tried as one. The trial resulted in a judgment adverse to Milton A. Fly, the appellant. The controversy presents the question as to whether appellant had the right to redeem the property, a lot in the city of Los Angeles, from a redemption previously made by the Hammond Lumber Company.

The facts necessary to an understandng of the questions presented by the appeal are these:

On February 26, 1913, Della Ingerson, the then owner of the premises. mortgaged the property to the Security Trust & Savings Bank to secure her promissory note for $2,500. Desiring to erect an apartment house on the premises, Mrs. Ingerson, on April 28, 1913, entered into the following written agreement with appellant:

"Los Angeles, Cal., April 28th, 1913. Memorandum of agreement made and entered into by and between Mrs. Della Ingerson, party of the first part, and Milton A. Fly, party of the second part, both of Los Angeles, California. The party of the first part agrees to give to the party of the second part a contract for the construction of one brick apartment house to be located at 230 South Beaudry avenue, fourth lot north of Third street, east side of Beaudry avenue, Los Angeles, California, being lot 15, block 8 of the Woolen Mill tract. Said apartment house to have about 54 apartments of two and three rooms each and the cost not to exceed $45,000. The party of the first part hereby authorizes the party of the second part to order blueprint plans and specifications for the party of the first part, and also to arrange for a building loan at 5½ per cent. or 6 per cent., the lot to be clear of incumbrance. This agreement signed in duplicate this 28th day of April, 1913. Mrs. Della Ingerson. Milton A. Fly."

About three months later plans for an apartment house, to cost about $65,000, were prepared by an architect.

On November 6, 1913, Mrs. Ingerson executed a second mortgage on the property to Watson B. Burt, as mortgagee, to secure her promissory note, of even date, for $45,000. This mortgage, hereafter referred to as the Burt mortgage, was recorded November 27, 1913, and later was assigned to the Hammond Lumber Company.

On December 29, 1913, Mrs. Ingerson entered into a building contract with the Dutro-Wren Construction Company, as contractor, for the construction of an apartment house upon the premises. By this contract, which was a formal written building contract, the contractor, the Dutro-Wren Construction Company, agreed to construct on the lot, pursuant to the previously prepared plans, a three-story, class C, brick apartment house, and Mrs. Ingerson agreed to pay therefor the sum of $65,000. Fly was not a party to nor mentioned in this building contract. Work under this contract was commenced by the Dutro-Wren Construction Company about January 19, 1914, and was continued by the contractor until October 13, 1914, on which day work on the apartment house ceased, and was not resumed until more than 30 days thereafter.

On March 2, 1914, Mrs. Ingerson executed a grant deed to the premises to her attorney, George H. Woodruff. This deed to Woodruff was recorded in the office of the county recorder on the day of its execution. On December 9, 1914, Woodruff and wife executed to Ada Webster, the daughter of Mrs. Ingerson, a quitclaim deed to the premises. This deed was recorded December 10, 1914. One of the claims made by appellant is that Mrs. Ingerson's deed to Woodruff and the latter's deed to Mrs. Webster were made to hinder, delay, and defraud Mrs. Ingerson's creditors; or, if not made for that purpose, then that the deed to Woodruff was given as security, to secure any indebtedness that thereafter might become due him from his client, Mrs. Ingerson, and that therefore it was but a mortgage.

On February 24, 1916, Mrs. Webster, who, on the face of the records in the county recorder's office, was the then absolute owner of the property, conveyed it, for a valuable consideration, to W. H. Elliott, by grant deed recorded February 25, 1916; and Elliott and wife, for a valuable consideration, by a grant deed bearing date February 25, 1916, conveyed the property to the Hammond Lumber Company, which corporation now claims to be the owner of the premises.

On December 5, 1914, Fly, claiming that he had performed work in the construction of the apartment house under his memorandum agreement with Mrs. Ingerson of date April 28, 1913, a copy of which is set forth supra, filed in the office of the county recorder a mechanic's lien claim for $4,414.38. On December 29, 1914, he commenced an action in the superior court to foreclose his alleged mechanic's lien. He made Mrs. Ingerson and her immediate grantee, Woodruff, parties defendant; but Mrs. Webster, though then appearing of record as the sole owner, was not made a party to the action. Because Mrs. Webster was not made a party to Fly's action to foreclose his alleged mechanic's lien, the decree in that action is not res adjudicata as to her or as to either of her successors in title—Elliott and the Hammond Lumber Company. On February 1, 1917, a foreclosure decree was entered in that action, whereby the court declared that Fly had a mechanic's lien on the property for $4,414.38, and decreed that the lien be enforced by sale of the premises.

On June 1, 1915, the Security Trust & Savings Bank, the holder of the first mortgage—the mortgage for $2,500—commenced a foreclosure action in the superior court, making parties defendant Mrs. Ingerson, the Dutro-Wren Construction Company, the Hammond Lumber Company, Ada Webster, and a number of mechanic's lien claimants. This foreclosure suit resulted in a decree whereby it was adjudged, among other things, that $3,068.75 was due the plaintiff in that action, the Security Trust & Savings Bank, on the $2,500 mortgage that Mrs. Ingerson had executed to it February 26, 1913; that $45,000, with interest, was due the Hammond Lumber Company on the Burt mortgage that had been assigned to it; that the premises be sold; and that the proceeds of the sale, after payment of sheriff's fees, etc., be applied, first to the payment of the amount due the Security Trust & Savings Bank on the mortgage held by it, and then, if there should be any surplus, to the payment of the Hammond Lumber Company's claim for $45,000, and interest, due on the Burt mortgage. By this decree the court made no attempt to pass upon the validity of Fly's claim of lien. That is a matter that was not passed upon or determined.

On March 22, 1916, at the sheriff's sale under the foreclosure decree in the action thus brought by the Security Trust & Savings Bank to foreclose the mortgage held by it, the property was sold by the sheriff to the judgment creditor, the Security Trust & Savings Bank, for $3,195.19, which, after paying the sheriff's fees and the amount due the judgment creditor, left no surplus whatever. Thereupon a certificate of sale was executed and delivered to the purchaser.

The next day, March 23, 1916, the Hammond Lumber Company, by whom the $45,000 mortgage was held, and who, in the foreclosure action that had been brought by the Security Trust & Savings Bank to foreclose its $2,500 mortgage, had been adjudged to be the holder of the $45,000 mortgage, claiming the rights of a redemptioner, paid the purchaser at the sheriff's sale, the Security Trust & Savings Bank, the amount that it had paid the sheriff for the property, $3,195.19, with interest thereon at 1 per cent. per month. At the same time the Hammond Lumber Company gave the sheriff written notice of redemption, accompanied by a copy of the docket of the judgment in the mortgage foreclosure action wherein the court had adjudged the Hammond Lumber Company to be the holder of the $45,000 mortgage. The Hammond Lumber Company also presented to the sheriff an affidavit showing the amount that it claimed to be due to it on the "judgment lien" which it claims was created by the docketing of the decree in the mortgage foreclosure action. On March 24, 1916, the sheriff executed and delivered to the Hammond Lumber Company a certificate of redemption. Thereafter, on the expiration of a year, the sheriff executed a sheriff's deed to the Hammond Lumber Company, and, as we have said, that corporation now claims to be the absolute owner of the property.

In addition to the action that he had commenced on December 29, 1914, to foreclose his alleged mechanic's lien, Fly, on February 16, 1916, brought an action of debt against Mrs. Ingerson to recover for work and labor that he claims to have performed in the construction of the apartment house under the written memorandum agreement that he and Mrs. Ingerson had entered into on April 28, 1913. The sole party defendant in that action was Mrs. Ingerson, who did not appear, and on March 3, 1916, a default judgment was entered against her by the clerk for $4,414.38.

On May 22, 1916, Fly, claiming that the Hammond Lumber Company's redemption was fatally defective in certain particulars which we have not deemed it necessary to mention, and that, by reason of such defects, that company had not acquired any right as a "redemptioner," but that its sole right was that of an equitable assignee of such right to the property as the Security Trust & Savings Bank had acquired as the original purchaser at the sheriff's sale, undertook to redeem the property by tendering to the sheriff, for the Hammond Lumber Company, the amount that the latter had paid the Security Trust & Savings Bank, viz. $3,325.67, with interest thereon at 2 per cent. per month, and no more. This attempted redemption by Fly was based on the mechanic's lien that he claimed to have acquired by the filing of his mechanic's lien claim in the county recorder's office on December 5, 1914, and also on the judgment lien that he claimed to have acquired by the docketing of the personal judgment against Mrs. Ingerson in the action of debt that he had brought against her. The sheriff, treating the Hammond Lumber Company as one who had become a "redemptioner," with all the statutory rights of a redemptioner, refused to receive the tendered sum of $3,325.67, with interest thereon at 2 per cent. per month, on the ground that it was not acompanied by the amount due on the Burt mortgage held by the Hammond Lumber Company, namely, $45,000 and interest thereon.

On March 21, 1917, a judgment, purporting to be a judgment foreclosing appellant's alleged mechanic's lien, having been entered on February 1, 1917, and docketed February 19, 1917, appellant again attempted to redeem the property by again tendering to the sheriff, for the Hammond Lumber Company, the amount which the latter had paid the original purchaser at the sheriff's sale. Fly based this second attempted redemption on his alleged mechanic's lien and on the decree foreclosing the same, docketed February 19, 1917. Again the sheriff refused Fly's tender of payment. This refusal was on the same ground as before, namely, that the amount tendered should have included the sum due the Hammond Lumber Company on the Burt mortgage.

From these facts various propositions are advanced and argued. "The whole contention in this court," says appellant in his closing brief, "is relegated to the question of the sufficiency of the tenders of redemption made to the sheriff by appellant, Milton A. Fly, and respondent Hammond Lumber Company, and their respective rights as such redemptioners."

Under the view we take of the case, it will not be necessary to consider appellant's claim that the Hammond Lumber Company did not acquire the rights of a "redemptioner," and that it is only an equitable assignee of the rights acquired by the Security Trust & Savings Bank as the original purchaser at the sheriff's sale. This is so for the reason that, as we view the case, appellant himself never became vested with the rights of a redemptioner. And if, as we hold, appellant's attempted redemptions were without authority of law and abortive, then, for that reason alone, the judgment must be affirmed.

For the purpose of this appeal, we shall assume that the possessor of a mechanic's lien has the same right to redeem as has the holder of a mortgage lien, although the language of subdivision 2 of section 701 of the Code of Civil Procedure would seem to confine the right of redemption to "a creditor having a lien by judgment or mortgage." This assumption that the possessor of a mechanic's lien may exercise the right of redemption finds some support in the fact that subdivision 1 of section 705 makes reference to a redemption upon "a mortgage or other lien." If we assume, for the purposes of this appeal only, that the possessor of a mechanic's lien is entitled under our Code to redeem property that has been sold at sheriff's sale, then, in order to entitle appellant to invoke the rights possessed by a redemptioner, it must appear that he had either: (1) A lien by judgment; or (2) a mechanic's lien. No other form of lien is claimed by him. In our opinion, appellant never acquired either of such liens.

[1] Appellant did not acquire a judgment lien. The personal judgment against Mrs. Ingerson, entered March 3, 1916, in favor of appellant, in the action of debt that he had commenced against her on February 16, 1916, did not create a judgment lien on the property in controversy, for the reason that, when that judgment was docketed, March 9, 1916, the title to the property was not in Mrs. Ingerson, the judgment debtor and sole party defendant in that action, but was in the Hammond Lumber Company under its deed from Elliott and wife, of date February 25, 1916. The decree that was entered in the suit that Fly brought to foreclose his alleged mechanic's lien was not entered until February 1, 1917, long after the Hammond Lumber Company had become the record owner under its deed from Elliott, who, it will be remembered, deraigned title from Mrs. Webster, who, in her turn, was the grantee of Woodruff, to whom Mrs. Ingerson, the original owner, had conveyed the property by deed dated March 2, 1914. At the time when Fly brought his action to foreclose his alleged mechanic's lien, December 29, 1914, the record title stood in Mrs. Webster, under the deed to her from Woodruff and wife, dated December 9, 1914, and recorded December 10, 1914. Mrs. Webster, though appearing of record as the owner of the property at the time when appellant brought his action to foreclose his alleged mechanic's lien, was not made a party to that action. Therefore neither she nor either of her successors in title is bound by that decree. Unless, therefore, it can successfully be claimed that at the date of the docketing of one at least of these two judgments in favor of Fly Mrs. Ingerson was the owner of the property, or at least had an interest therein to which a judment lien could attach, there can be no basis for any claim that appellant ever possessed a redemptioner's status as a creditor having a lien by judgment.

To support his claim that at the times when he sought to redeem the property from the sheriff's sale Mrs. Ingerson was the true owner of the property, and that therefore he had a judgment lien when he thus sought to effect a redemption, appellant contends that the deed from Mrs. Ingerson to Woodruff, and likewise the deed from Woodruff and wife to Mrs. Webster, were made to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of Mrs. Ingerson, or that, if those deeds were not made for that purpose, then the deed to Woodruff was made as security for such indebtedness, if any, as might become due to him from Mrs. Ingerson during such time as he might act as her attorney, and that therefore the deed to Woodruff was but a mortgage. Neither of these contentions, if borne out by the evidence, could aid appellant; for the respondent Hammond Lumber Company, and its immediate grantor, W. H. Elliott, were both innocent purchasers. As to each of these grantees, therefore, the title, as it appeared of record at the dates of the respective deeds to them, must be treated, in so far as their rights are concerned, as the true title to the property; that is, as to the Hammond Lumber Company and its immediate grantors, W. H. Elliott and wife, the record chain of title must be taken as correct, and, as to each of them, Mrs. Webster must be regarded as the only true legal and equitable owner from the date of Woodruff's deed to her, December 9, 1914, down to the date of her conveyance to Elliott, February 24, 1916. This is so because the Hammond Lumber Company and W. H. Elliott were purchasers for value without notice. It appears from the evidence that both Elliott and the Hammond Lumber Company gave a valuable consideration for the property.

[2] A purchaser for value is presumed prima facie to be an innocent purchaser in good faith. Williams v. Borgwardt, 119 Cal. 80, 51 Pac. 15; Morrow v. Graves, 77 Cal. 218, 19 Pac. 489. There is nothing in the evidence to rebut this presumption.

[3, 4] If it be true that, as claimed by appellant, the deed from Mrs. Ingerson to Woodruff and the deed from Woodruff and wife to Mrs. Webster were made to hinder, delay and defraud Mrs. Ingerson's creditors, each deed, though void as to such creditors, was good as between the parties thereto; and Elliott and the Hammond Lumber Company, as innocent purchasers for value, took the title discharged of any fraud with which it may have been infected. It is the settled doctrine that a conveyance in fraud of creditors, although declared by statute to be void as to them, is, nevertheless, valid as between the parties; and a bona fide purchaser from the fraudulent grantee takes the title, even against the creditors of the fraudulent grantor, purged of the anterior fraud that had affected the title. Paige v. O'Neil, 12 Cal. 484; Morrow v. Graves, supra; Williams v. Borgwardt, supra; Denike v. Santa Clara etc. Soc., 9 Cal. App. 229, 232, 98 Pac. 687.

[5] If, as claimed by appellant, the deed to Woodruff, though absolute in form, was intended as a mortgage given to secure a possible future indebtedness from Mrs. Ingerson to Woodruff, the result will be the same as if the deed were, in fact, what on its face it purported to be—an absolute conveyance. For the rule is that, where a conveyance intended as security is absolute on its face, and the land is subsequently conveyed to an innocent third person, who pays the purchase money, or renders a valuable consideration, without notice of the true character of the conveyance, his title cannot be disturbed by any claim that the original transaction was a mortgage, and not an absolute conveyance. Such purchaser is protected by the provisions of sections 2925 and 2950 of the Civil Code, and becomes the real owner of the property. Pico v. Gallardo, 52 Cal. 206; Carpenter v. Lewis, 119 Cal. 18, 50 Pac. 925.

For these reasons we conclude that, at the time when the clerk docketed the personal judgment against Mrs. Ingerson in Fly's action of debt against her, and likewise at the time when the decree purporting to foreclose Fly's mechanic's lien was docketed, the title to the property was not in the judgment debtor, Mrs. Ingerson, or, at any rate, so far as the rights of respondent Hammond Lumber Company are concerned, the title cannot be regarded as being in the judgment debtor at those times, nor at any time since then, but must be taken to have been vested at each of those times in the person in whom it appeared on the face of the recorded chain of title. We think it clear, therefore, that appellant never had the status of a redemptioner having a lien by judgment.

[6] Appellant was not entitled to redeem as the possessor of a mechanic's lien. The only judgment to which our attention has been called that purports to establish appellant's status as a mechanic's lien claimant is that given and made in the action brought by him to foreclose his alleged lien. The then record owner of the title was Mrs. Webster, who, as we have seen, must be regarded as the true owner at that time, in so far as the respondent Hammond Lumber Company's rights are affected. She was not made a party to appellant's action to foreclose his alleged mechanic's lien. The foreclosure decree in that action is therefore not res adjudicata in any action between appellant and Mrs. Webster, or between appellant and Mrs. Webster's successor in title, the Hammond Lumber Company. For this reason the court below, if the evidence adduced before it warranted, was justified in finding, as it did, that appellant never had a mechanic's lien, anything in the decree in the action that appellant had brought to foreclose his alleged mechanic's lien to the contrary notwithstanding.

[7] The finding that appellant never acquired a lien under the Mechanic's Lien Law is amply supported by the evidence. Appellant testified that the only contract he ever had with the owner, Mrs. Ingerson, to do any work on the building was the written memorandum agreement of April 28, 1913, a copy of which is set forth supra; and this was the only contract of employment relied upon by appellant in the claim of lien that he filed in the recorder's office. By this memorandum agreement of April 28, 1913, Mrs. Ingerson did not employ appellant to do any work on the proposed apartment house or to furnish any material whatever. Its language, so far as pertinent, is:

"The party of the first part [Mrs. Ingerson] agrees to give the party of the second part [appellant] a contract for the construction of one brick apartment house. * * * Said apartment house to have about 54 apartments of two and three rooms each, and the cost not to exceed $45,000."

This agreement was not a contract by appellant to construct the apartment house for which plans were subsequently drawn and which later was erected upon the premises; nor was it a contract on the part of the then owner, Mrs. Ingerson, employing appellant to construct a definite and certain structure.

It was nothing more than an agreement on the part of Mrs. Ingerson to thereafter enter into and execute a building contract with appellant. To employ the language of the instrument itself, it was an agreement on Mrs. Ingerson's part "to give" to appellant a contract for the construction of a brick apartment house. It was not a building contract; only an agreement to execute a building contract.

[8] But, says appellant, an agreement to make and execute a certain written contract, the terms of which are mutually understood and agreed upon, is in all respects as valid and obligatory as would be the contract which it was agreed should be executed. The vice of appellant's contention is that the principle invoked by him, though unquestionably sound, is not applicable here, for the reason that the memorandum agreement of April 28, 1913, is fatally uncertain respecting the terms and conditions of the proposed building contract, particularly as to the structural details of the proposed apartment house. It may be conceded that, where the minds of the parties have met respecting the terms and conditions of the more formal writing that is to be executed by them, and the agreed terms of the contract thereafter to be executed are certain and in all respects definitely understood and agreed upon in advance, either orally or by informal writing, there is in such case an obligatory contract dating from the making of the earlier agreement. 13 C. J. p. 290 et seq. But it also is elementary law that, unless the agreement to execute the future contract be definite and certain upon all the subjects to be embraced, so that nothing is left for future negotiation, it is nugatory. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Gorman, 79 Kan. 643, 100 Pac. 647, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 637. In the instant case the memorandum agreement of April 28, 1913, is fatally indefinite and uncertain as to essential structural particulars and likewise as to the price to be paid for the erection of the building. At the date of its execution, April 28, 1913, no plans or specifications had been prepared. The agreement does not state whether the proposed apartment house shall be a structure of one story or of many stories. It does not state how many separate apartments the proposed apartment house shall contain. The language of the instrument is: "Said apartment house to have about 54 apartments of two and three rooms each." How many of the apartments were to consist of two and how many of three rooms is a matter that the parties left undetermined, and therefore a subject for future negotiation. Nor was there any definite meeting of minds as to the contract price of the proposed building. The only agreement respecting the cost of the structure was that "the cost [is] not to exceed $45,000." But whether the cost was to be $45,000 or less, and, if less, how much less, was left in nubibus. As a matter of fact, the building that the owner finally determined to erect, and for which plans subsequently were drawn, was a structure that it was estimated would cost $65,000. This alone might suffice to show that when appellant and Mrs. Ingerson made their memorandum agreement of April 28, 1913, their minds had not met as to the exact size and character of the apartment house that was to be built. Clearly this agreement of April 28, 1913, considered as a construction contract, was fatally uncertain, and no right as a building contractor could possibly vest thereby in appellant. It cannot be construed as an agreement by the owner employing appellant to do any work on her premises or on the apartment house that she contemplated building, but for which no definite plans had as yet matured.

[9, 10] Moreover, if appellant was ever entitled to a lien for any amount whatever, his claim of lien was not filed for record within the time provided by statute. It is not claimed that he furnished any material on the building; and there is ample evidence to support the court's finding that he never performed any labor or bestowed any skill or other necessary services contributing to the construction of the apartment house after the contract for its erection was made by the owner with the Dutro-Wren Construction Company. O. W. Dutro, who testified that he had complete supervision of the construction of the apartment house under the contract that the Dutro-Wren Construction Company had made with Mrs. Ingerson, and that he was on the work at all times after its commencement, testified that he never saw appellant do any work on the building or in any wise superintend its construction. This testimony was corroborated by that of a number of other witnesses. Appellant's reply to this is that the evidence shows that he did some work in connection with the grading of the lot and the removal of the trees—work which he says was of the nature of necessary preparatory work performed prior to the execution of the contract with the Dutro-Wren Construction Company for the erection of the apartment house. Even so, appellant must fail in his claim that he acquired a mechanic's lien, for he did not file his claim of lien for record until long after the expiration of 60 days from the completion of such preparatory work. It may be conceded that, if preparatory work of the nature of that which appellant claims to have performed be included in the building contract, the claim of lien may be filed for record, under subdivision 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it stood at the time this work was completed, within 60 days after the completion of the building contract, if filed by the original contractor, or within 30 days after such completion, if filed by a subcontractor, materialman, or laborer. But here the preparatory work of grading and clearing the lot, etc., was not included in the contract that the owner made with the contractor for the erection of the apartment house—the contract with the Dutro-Wren Construction Company. The work of grading and clearing the lot, removing the trees, etc., had been wholly completed, under a contract made with one Hicks, some time before the owner made her contract with the Dutro-Wren Construction Company. Whatever the contract with Hicks for this preparatory work may have been, the work thereunder was performed under a contract entirely separate from and independent of the contract that subsequently was made with the Dutro-Wren Construction Company. Where labor or materials are furnished under separate building contracts, even though such contracts are between the same persons and relate to the same building or employment, the contracts cannot be tacked together so as to enlarge the time for filing a lien for what was done or furnished under either. The claim of lien must be filed for what was done or furnished under each contract, within the statutory period after its completion.

For the reasons already given, it must be held that the memorandum agreement of April 28, 1913, because of its uncertainty and incompleteness as to almost all essential structural matters, as well as the cost of construction, cannot be regarded as a contract employing appellant to do any work of any kind upon an apartment house the plan of which then lay in the womb of the future. The preparatory work that appellant claims to have done was not provided for by the contract that Mrs. Ingerson made with the Dutro-Wren Construction Company. It was done under a separate and distinct contract—a contract that was fully completed on November 5, 1913, on which day, according to appellant's testimony, the work of grading the lot, removing the trees, etc., was finished. When, therefore, the contract for such preparatory work was completed, all the laborers who performed any labor thereunder should have filed their lien claims not later than 30 days after its completion, i. e., within 30 days after November 5, 1913; and the original contractor should have filed his lien claim within 60 days thereafter. Appellant did not file his claim of lien in the recorder's office until December 5, 1914—13 months after the completion of the contract for the work that he designates as necessary preparatory work.

For the foregoing reasons, we are satisfied that, when appellant attempted to redeem the property, and, for that purpose, tendered to the sheriff the amount that the respondent Hammond Lumber Company had paid to the original purchaser at the sheriff's sale, with interest thereon at 2 per cent. per month, he had neither a judgment lien nor a mechanic's lien, and therefore was not a "redemptioner," and consequently not entitled to redeem the property, regardless of whether the Hammond Lumber Company had acquired its interest as a redemptioner or only as an equitable assignee of the Security Trust & Savings Bank.

Judgment affirmed.

In re CHANQUET'S ESTATE. (S. F. 9403.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 15, 1920.)

1. Wills ⊂⊃820(1)—Testator intended that debts, etc., should be charged on half of community property subject to his disposition.

Testator's intention as shown by his will held to have been that the disbursements specified in subdivision 13, providing for his wife a life estate in the residue after payment of debts, costs of last illness and burial, cost of administration, etc., should be charged solely upon the half of the community property subject to his testamentary disposition under Civ. Code, § 1402, the other half going to the widow free from any deduction on account of any such charges, it being the court's duty, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1560, to give effect to such intention apparent on the face of the will, testator's half of the community property being sufficient.

2. Husband and wife ⊂⊃276(3)—Community property in absence of contrary intent equally subject to debts.

In the absence of expression of contrary intent, the entire community property of testator and his wife would be equally subject to debts, the family allowance, and expenses of administration, under Civ. Code, §§ 1359, 1402.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Valentin Chanquet. From decree ordering distribution, the widow appeals. Decree reversed, and matter remanded.

Charles A. Christin, of San Francisco (Hutchinson, Van Fleet & Christin, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Max W. Koenig and Herbert D. Wise, both of Oakland, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an appeal by Sophie Chanquet, the widow of deceased, from the decree of distribution made in the matter of his estate.

The sole question presented is whether the superior court erred in charging debts, expenses of administration, expenses of last illness, etc., paid by the executor of the will, and certain legacies, against the estate generally (exclusive of certain specific bequests), including the widow's share in the community property, rather than against the husband's one-half of the community property only.

By his will deceased first gave to certain brothers his interest in the saloon and liquor store business carried on by him and them in Oakland and San Francisco, declaring the same to be his separate property. He then gave a monthly allowance of $30 to his mother for her life, and four general legacies aggregating $1,450. (The mother died before distribution.) Then followed the subdivision numbered "Thirteenth," in which he stated that, there being some question as to what portion of the property other than the saloon property, was community property, he thereby declared that all of his property, except his saloon property interest, is community property, and proceeded as follows:

"And it is my will that my wife shall take her half of said community property (but not including my said partnership interests in the said saloon and liquor stores * * *) in lieu of all other interest in and to my property and estate, other than as I hereinafter provided for her, to wit:

"I hereby give, bequeath, and devise unto my said wife, Sophie Chanquet, the use and enjoyment of a life estate in and to all residuum of my property and estate (my half of the community property), after paying and discharging all my debts, the cost of my last illness and burial, the cost of administration of my estate, the payment of the specific legacies and bequests hereinbefore provided for, to be hers to enjoy and possess during the period of her natural life, and upon her death I hereby give, bequeath and devise residuum of my said estate, share and share alike, unto" certain brothers and sisters.

The executor had received in cash $30,689.47, constituting community assets, from which he had disbursed for debts, expenses of administration, last sickness, funeral expenses, etc., $10,889.63, leaving a balance in cash for distribution of $19,799.84. The superior court concluded that out of this general balance the legacies, aggregating $1,450, should be paid, leaving $18,349.84 in cash for distribution, together with other personal property and the real property on hand, one half to go to the widow as her share of the community property, and the other half to the brothers and sisters of deceased, "subject to the use and enjoyment of a life estate therein and thereto to Sophie Chanquet," the widow.

The widow's claim here is that only a small part of the amount of expenditures by the executor and the legacies, aggregating $12,339.63, viz. $1,468.92, should have been deducted from the total community assets, and that the remainder, $10,870.71, for expenditures specified in the thirteenth subdivision, should have been deducted only from the husband's half of the community property, given to the brothers and sisters subject to a life estate in her. The result would be that she would receive absolutely as her one-half of the residue of money on hand $14,610.27, instead of $9,174.92, while the balance of cash for distribution to the brothers and sisters subject to a life estate in her would be only $3,739.56, instead of $9,174.92.

Appellant's claim is based on the language of subdivision 13 of the will as indicating the intention of the testator that the disbursements specified therein should be charged solely upon the one half of the community property which was subject to his testamentary disposition (Civ. Code, § 1402), the part which for convenience we may here designate as the husband's half of the community property, and that the other half should go to the widow free from any deduction on account of any of such charges. Of course, if such intention is apparent on the face of the will, it should be given effect, the husband's half being fully sufficient to pay the same and leave a balance. Code Civ. Proc. § 1560.

[1] We are of opinion that appellant's claim as to the intention of the testator, as shown by the provision of his will, is well based. After making it clear that he desires his wife to take absolutely her half of the community property, he proceeds to deal with what he calls "all residuum of my property and estate," declaring such residuum to be "my half of the community property," and it is a life estate in this "residuum" that he gives, bequeaths, and devises to his wife "after paying and discharging all my debts, the cost of my last illness and burial, the cost of administration of my estate, the payment of the specific legacies and bequests hereinbefore provided for," with remainder over to his brothers and sisters. The words "after paying and discharging all my debts," etc., are such, located as they are, as to indicate, when taken in connection with what he had previously said about the wife's half of the community property, that it was the intention that such payment was to be made from the residuum with which he was then dealing. A most potent consideration in this behalf is to be found in the fact that included in the payments therein provided for are the legacies and bequests to others, which it cannot fairly be assumed were intended by the testator to be imposed in whole or in part upon the wife's half of the community property, over which the husband had no power of testamentary disposition, especially in view of the fact that the intention that the wife shall have her half of the community property is clearly and emphatically expressed. As to the legacies and bequests the intention must have been that the payments were to be made from his half of the community property. The provision for the payment of these legacies and bequests is the same as the provisions for the other specified payments, i. e., all such payments, including those of legacies and bequests, were to be made from the same source. This intended source, we think, must be held to be the "residuum" with which he was then dealing, viz. his half of the community property.

[2] Of course, it is true that, in the absence of expression of contrary intent, the entire community property would be equally subject to "debts, the family allowance and expenses of administration." Civ. Code, §§ 1402 and 1359. It is only as to the matters specified in subdivision 13 that any different intention is here expressed. We say this in view of the suggestion in respondent's brief that certain items of disbursement for family allowance and federal income tax are not included in the specifications of subdivision 13 of the will. This matter has not been argued in the briefs, and may properly be left for adjustment in the superior court when the matter of distribution is again taken up.

The decree of distribution is reversed, and the matter remanded for proceedings not inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

HART v. FORGEUS. (S. F. 9252.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 17, 1920.)

1. Pleading ⟸335 — Demurrer to complaint with accompanying papers regarded as filed when improperly withheld by clerk.

Where demurrer to the complaint, demand for change of venue, affidavit of merits, and notice of motion to be heard on stated date were sent to the county clerk with a check sufficient for filing fee but not sufficient for calendar fee, the papers, save possibly the notice of motion, would be regarded as filed, though withheld by the clerk for failure to send the calendar fee.

2. Appeal and error ⟸912—Appellate court presumes trial court refusing change of venue found lack of due diligence.

Where the order denying change of venue was general, not indicating any particular ground, the appellate court presumes the trial court found against the use of due diligence in the making of the motion.

3. Venue ⟸61—Application for change held not prosecuted with diligence.

Where defendant, on March 26, sent to the clerk, without calendar fee, notice of motion to be made April 4, for change of venue to county of his residence, and received notice prior to April 4 that it could not be heard on that motion, but did nothing until June 12 when he paid the calendar fee, and on June 16 gave notice that the motion would be made June 20, there was no abuse of discretion in refusing the change, as such motion must be prosecuted with diligence.

4. Venue ⟸66—Affidavit of merits with demand for change should show full and fair disclosure by defendant.

Defendant's affidavit of merits with application for change of venue must show that the statement of the facts of the case to his counsel was full and fair, but an objection that a defendant's affidavit was not sufficient in alleging that "he has stated all of the facts" appears to be without merit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. R. Robinson, Judge.

Action by Fred B. Hart against J. W. Forgeus. From an order refusing change of venue, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Altman & Goldman and C. H. Sooy, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

John J. Allen and Fred B. Hart, both of Oakland, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an appeal by defendant from an order of the superior court refusing to change the place of trial of the action from the superior court of Alameda county to that of Santa Cruz county.

The action is one for the recovery of money. It was commenced in Alameda county on February 28, 1919, and on March 11 defendant, who was a resident of Santa Cruz county, was personally served in the city and county of San Francisco. On March 26, 1919, defendant's attorneys, whose offices were in San Francisco, sent by mail to the county clerk of Alameda county, having first served the same, a demurrer to the complaint, a demand in writing that the trial be had in the proper county, and an affidavit of merits, etc., together with a notice of motion to be made April 4, 1919, for change of place of trial. These papers were accompanied by a check for $3, which was sufficient in amount to entitle them to be filed, but did not include a calendar fee of $2. The papers were received by the clerk on March 27, 1919, and he filed the demurrer, but failed to file the other papers because of the failure of the defendant to forward the claimed fee of $2 for placing the motion on the calendar, retaining such papers in his custody. He forthwith transmitted to defendant's attorneys his receipt for $3, and advised them in writing that there was a fee of $2 due for placing motion for change of venue on the calendar. The motion was not placed on the calendar for April 4, 1919, and was not called. Nothing further was done in the matter until June 12, 1919, when defendant paid the calendar fee, and the papers were then marked filed and the matter was put on the motion calendar for June 20, 1919. On or about June 16, 1919, defendant's attorneys notified plaintiff's attorneys that the motion would be on the calendar on June 20, 1919. It was brought on for hearing on the last-named day, and on August 8, 1919, was denied; the order of denial being general and not indicating the particular ground or grounds on which the court based its conclusion.

[1] We think the papers in the matter of the change of place of trial, with the possible exception of the notice of motion, should be regarded as having been filed when received by the clerk, for, accompanied by the requisite fee for such filing, it was his official duty to then file them. The only objections to the granting of the motion that appear to us to present any debatable question are: First, that the moving party did not act with due diligence in making his motion; and, second, that the affidavit of merits was defective.

[2, 3] Regardless of any conclusion we might reach upon the second of these objections, we are of the opinion that the order of the superior court must be sustained upon the first. In accord with the well-settled rule, we must assume in support of the order that the superior court concluded that defendant did not act with due diligence in making his motion and that the motion should be denied for that reason. We cannot say that there was any abuse of discretion on the part of the superior court in so disposing of the matter. Nothing whatever was done by defendant in the matter of bringing his application by motion to the attention of the court between the time when he was fully advised that it would not be heard upon his first notice, some time prior to April 4, 1919, and June 12, 1919, when he paid the calendar fee, following this June 16, 1919, with his notice that the motion would be made June 20, 1919. No explanation whatever of the delay was attempted. Under these circumstances, the matter appears to be controlled by what has been said in former decisions of this court. "It has always been held that such motions, being dilatory, must be prosecuted with diligence" (Cook v. Pendergast, 61 Cal. 72, 79), and a defendant may not safely rest upon his affidavit of merits and demand filed at the time he answers or demurs. He is bound, at the peril of being held to have waived his right in the matter of change of place of trial, to proceed diligently in the matter of bringing this application to the attention of the court. In Smith v. Pelton Water Wheel Co., 151 Cal. 399, 90 Pac. 932, 1135, this court, after quoting from Cook v. Pendergast, supra, as above set forth, said:

"The rule is uniform that an application for a change of venue on this ground should be made at the earliest opportunity [citing cases]. And if it is made afterwards the applicant must 'explain any seeming lack of diligence on his part.'"

In Smith v. Pelton Water Wheel Co., supra, it was held that while upon the facts the court might have, in its discretion, granted the motion, it "had the power in its discretion to refuse it because of the lack of diligence displayed by the defendant in prosecuting it," and that it must be presumed, "in view of the decision of the lower court, that it was of the opinion that the right had been lost by laches and that it denied the motion upon that ground." In Pascoe v. Baker, 158 Cal. 232, 110 Pac. 815, the rule of diligence was again recognized. The delay there, as here, was for a few days over two months, and the trial court granted the motion. This court said the matter of undue delay was for the trial court upon the facts of the particular case, and that it could not be held there was an abuse of discretion in holding that there had not been a lack of diligence. In this case the trial court held the other way; but, as in that case, we do not see how we may fairly hold that there was any abuse of the discretion committed to the trial court. Clearly defendant did not move as promptly as he could have done, and, as we have already said, there was no explanation whatever of the delay in bringing the matter to the attention of the trial court.

[4] This case was ordered heard in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District because of our doubt of the correctness of the opinion with regard to the question of the sufficiency of the affidavit of merits. The affidavit was held fatally defective in that it failed to state that the defendant had "fully and fairly stated the facts of the case" to his counsel. It did say that "he has stated all of the facts in the above-entitled action to" one of his attorneys, naming him. While we have said that such an affidavit "must show that the defendant has fully and fairly stated the facts of the case to his counsel" (Nickerson v. California Raisin Co., 61 Cal. 268), this was said with reference to an affidavit which stated that defendant "has fully and fairly stated the said defendant's defense in this action," etc., instead of the facts in the case. Of course, the statement by a defendant of the facts of the case to his counsel, as he understands those facts to be, should be full and fair; but it seems to us that when he says that "he has stated all of the facts" of the case to his counsel, he necessarily implies a full and fair statement according to his conception of the case. This objection appears to us to be wanting in substantial merit. But for the reason previously discussed, the order must be affirmed.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

BAKER v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al. (L. A. 5377.)

(Supreme Court of California Nov. 19, 1920. Rehearing Denied Dec. 16, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸1051(1)—Admission of evidence of fact, amply shown by other evidence, harmless.

Any error in admission of evidence to show a train was engaged in interstate commerce was harmless; the fact being amply shown by other evidence.

2. Commerce ⟸27(4)—Train carrying mail held engaged in "interstate commerce."

Relative to injury of a locomotive fireman being within the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657–8665), the train on which he was working at the time was engaged in interstate commerce, because it was carrying mail coming from and destined to points outside the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Interstate Commerce.]

3. Master and servant ⟸278(18) — Evidence held not to show negligence of locomotive engineer as to fireman within federal act.

Evidence in action under the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657–8665), by locomotive fireman for injury from jumping from train prior to collision of engine with trailer of stalled truck, held to show no negligence of engineer in releasing air brakes 1,000 feet from crossing, after coming around curve, whereby brakes could not be effectively used in time to prevent collision.

4. Damages ⟸173(2)—That injured railroad fireman was in line of promotion may be shown.

Testimony that the injured fireman was in line of promotion with only one person ahead of him, to be engineer at an increased salary, is proper with reference to reasonable future expectations.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Walter C. Baker against the Southern Pacific Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Reversed.

Henry T. Gage and W. I. Gilbert, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. P. Johnson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

H. T. Morrow, of Los Angeles, for defendant Atlas Mixed Mortar Co.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by the defendant, Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, from a judgment for $10,000 against said defendant and in favor of the plaintiff, Walter C. Baker, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained as the result of the negligence of an engineer of said defendant in operating a steam locomotive.

It appears that on September 9, 1915, the respondent Baker was in the employ of appellant as a fireman. On that day the respondent was discharging his duties as such fireman on a passenger train running between Shorb, Los Angeles county, and the city of Los Angeles. About one mile east of Eastlake Park there was a grade crossing where the tracks intersected a wagon road. Just prior to the arrival of the train at this crossing a motortruck, with a trailer in tow loaded with empty cans, had crossed the railroad. The truck became temporarily "stalled" immediately after crossing and stopped, thus leaving the trailer standing on the tracks. The truck driver thereupon descended and examined his machine, but before he could repair the trouble and move on, he heard the whistle of the approaching train and started up the track in that direction to try to stop it. Silas M. Collins, the engineer, testified that about 2,500 feet from the crossing the train swung into a curve, and that the trailer could not be seen from the locomotive until the engine finished rounding the curve, 700 feet from the crossing. At any rate, as the train entered upon this curve the engineer applied his air brakes, and later released them on coming into the straight-line track, as he testified, about 900 feet from the crossing. This release temporarily reduced the air pressure to a point where several seconds were required in order to recharge the tanks before enough air would be available quickly to stop the train. The engineer further testified that he first saw the trailer about 700 feet away, and did not at that time notice it was "standing still"; that about 500 or 600 feet from the crossing he saw the truck driver "standing right near the trailer, waving his hands in a violent manner"; and that he immediately "made an emergency application of the brakes as well as I could under the circumstances," but that, realizing the brakes, due to the reduced air pressure could not stop the train before the locomotive would strike the trailer, and thinking—as also did respondent, according to his testimony—that the cans on the trailer contained "something explosive and highly inflammable," he and the respondent jumped from the engine, which resulted in the injuries to respondent for which he now seeks damages.

The Atlas Mixed Mortar Company, a corporation, the owner of the truck and trailer, was made a party defendant to this action, but the verdict of the jury was in favor of this defendant, and the respondent has not appealed from that portion of the judgment.

[1, 2] 1. The respondent seeks to recover under the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657–8665), and alleges in his complaint that at the time of the accident "he was employed by defendant * * * on an interstate commerce train." In this connection appellant now assigns error to the admission, over appellant's objection, of respondent's testimony that on previous occasions, while he was working on this train, he had noticed that it carried interstate freight, and of the testimony of Robert W. Coleman and I. B. Gotfredson, conductors of the train, as to the interstate or intrastate character of the passenger traffic which it customarily carried. With regard to the testimony of the two last-named witnesses, it may be observed that it was very indefinite, and that the substance of their answers to the questions propounded by respondent's counsel as to whether or not they had ever taken up any interstate tickets on this train was that they could not remember. But, assuming that, as appellant claims, all this testimony was "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and did not tend to prove or disprove the issue as to interstate commerce on the day of the accident," we cannot see how its admission prejudiced appellant. From the verdict it must be implied that the jury found the train upon which respondent was working at the time of the accident was engaged in interstate commerce. This finding is amply supported by the testimony of Frank E. Page, who was employed as a railway postal clerk on the train, that it was carrying registered letters coming from and destined to points outside of the state. Zenz v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 176 Cal. 304, 168 Pac. 364, L. R. A. 1913D, 423, citing Lynch v. B. & M. R. R. Co., 227 Mass. 123, 116 N. E. 401, L. R. A. 1918D, 419.

[3] 2. We shall next consider appellant's contention that the jury was not warranted "in concluding that the engineer was guilty of negligence." In order that the circumstances under which respondent was injured may clearly appear, it will be proper briefly to describe the scene of the accident. The train was running from Shorb, a station about seven miles east of Los Angeles, into that city. There was a "down grade" of about two miles of track from Shorb to the crossing where the accident occurred. In summarizing the evidence we shall, for convenience, use the letter A to indicate the crossing where the trailer was stalled, B the place at which the train entered upon the curve, east of the crossing, C the point at which the engineer released the air, and D the point at which he applied the emergency brakes.

The respondent testified that it was about 600 feet from B to C, 400 or 500 feet from C to D, and 600 feet from D to A; that from C to A there were "no trees or houses or anything to obstruct the view in the right of way, nor close enough to the right of way to obstruct the view. There are trees on the outside of the right of way, but that does not obstruct the view. The line of vision from C to A does not come enough outside of the right of way to reach any trees." He further stated that the engineer had a clear view from C to A, but that he himself, because of the curve in the tracks and his position on the opposite side of the locomotive from the engineer, could not see the crossing from C; that the speed of the train at B was about 45 miles, and at C 30 to 35 miles per hour; that "B was at least a mile inside * * * of the Los Angeles yards"; that if the air had not been released at C it would have been possible to bring the train to a full stop within 300 or 400 feet, but that, the air having been released at C, the pressure was thereby so decreased that after the brakes were set at D "the train would run probably 600 or 700 feet before coming to a stop"; that the equipment and appliances on the engine were "in perfect working order"; that when the engineer released the air at C "it would take about a couple of minutes to recharge so that he would have more air," but that at the speed at which the train was moving at C it would travel thence to A in about 10 seconds; that he had nothing to do with regulating the speed of the train; that after the engineer had released the air "there was nothing that he could have done to avoid the accident up at A that he did not do"; that he did not know whether the engineer actually saw the stalled trailer before applying the "emergency"; that when he himself saw the trailer he thought the cans contained dynamite or giant powder and also "figured there might be a derailment"; that he did not see the truck driver waving his hands until he was just leaving the engine, when it was too late to get back; that before he left the locomotive the engineer reversed the engine; and that if the latter had not released the air at C, "where he could have seen the obstruction, he could have brought the train to a stop before reaching A." On cross-examination he testified that, if the truck had not been "stalled" at the crossing, it would have been proper to release the air at C.

Richard W. Kelly, an engineer, testified that if the emergency brakes were applied to a train composed of a locomotive and six cars traveling at a speed of 45 miles an hour on a level track, the train would run 750 feet before coming to a stop; that "the more cars you have the quicker the stop"; that "under practical conditions" if an engineer brought his train, of a locomotive and three cars, to a stop within 750 feet, he would think it "a very fair stop"; and that a train of an engine and three cars "going at 35 miles an hour under these circumstances wouldn't go over 650 feet" after an emergency application of the brakes.

W. H. Whalen, superintendent of appellant's Los Angeles division, testified that the point A was "within the yard limits as outlined by the limit board," although "not the actual operating yard."

Joe Esposito, the truck driver, stated that when he first saw the train it was about 700 or 800 feet away, "and I say that at that time the whole engine was not in view, just a part of it."

J. F. Garrett, who had just crossed the railroad tracks at A when the accident occurred, testified that he saw the train about 850 or 900 feet away, going about 20 miles an hour.

Charles T. Phelps, train baggageman, testified that he "heard the air go on at D at the distance of from 400 to 600 feet from the scene of the collision."

The engineer stated that his speed limit at B was 50 miles per hour; that the release of the air left the engine "for a period of time without an emergency feed"; that it was approximately 2,500 feet from B to A, 900 feet from C to A, and 600 feet from D to A; that he could not have seen the trailer until he was within 700 feet of the crossing; and that "I did not apply my emergency immediately upon seeing the trailer across the tracks because I did not know but it was moving, when I first saw it. Going around the curve you get a kind of vision of things, things are changing in relation to one another, changing positions, you know, so when I first saw it, I didn't know they were stalled there * * * because I was going around a curve." He further stated that at C the train was moving at about 20 miles an hour; that at no point between Shorb and Los Angeles was he traveling 45 miles an hour; that from C he could not see either the truck or the trailer "on account of the curve and the trees outside of the right of way"; that between C and D he did not have time to recharge the air or get "the braking power back to full capacity"; that about 40 feet from the crossing there was "a block-signal pole," the upper half of which he could see as he approached it, about 1,000 feet from A; that if at C he had received the signal "Stop," he could have stopped before reaching A; that he did not remember whether, at the time he first saw the signal pole, the crossing was visible; that "the trailer was a pretty high rig * * * so that the upper half of the trailer was about 10½ feet above the roadway"; that if the brakes had not been released at C he could have made a further application of the air already in the brake cylinders and stopped the train before reaching A; and, as to the various distances between the points indicated, that his estimates were "just a matter of guess, and they might be 150 or 200 feet either way." The evidence showed that it was his duty, under ordinary circumstances, to apply the air brakes at the point where he did apply them and to release the air as he did.

Gotfredson testified that for some time prior to the accident he had been sitting in the smoking car, one car removed from the engine and tender; that he was looking out of the window in the direction in which the train was moving; that as soon as he saw the trailer on the tracks he "reached up and caught the emergency, but he [the engineer] had already used all the air then. We were about 1,000 feet from the track at that time, maybe a little bit more * * * while we was rounding the curve. * * * The truck and trailer was plain so I could see it." On cross-examination he stated when he first saw the trailer the train was moving at about 25 miles an hour, and that after the air was released at C the engineer could not have stopped the train before reaching A.

Is there sufficient evidence to support the implied finding that the engineer was guilty of negligence in releasing the air at C? Under the rule of conflict we shall assume, as established, that the distance between C and A was 1,000 feet; that the speed of the train at C was 35 miles per hour; that the trees along the right of way did not obstruct "the line of vision" between C and A; that the trailer was visible from C; that, as respondent testified, the train could have been stopped within 300 or 400 feet (although another witness for respondent fixed it at 750 feet); and that if the air had not been released at C the train could have been stopped before reaching A.

But, as tending to negative negligence on the part of the engineer, is his testimony that, due to the angle at which the train, in rounding the curve, was approaching the crossing, several seconds elapsed after he first saw the trailer before he could realize that it was not going to proceed on its way and clear the tracks, and that after applying the emergency, "I had put all the mechanical parts of the engine into application to stop the train that I could put into action, and there was nothing else that I could do to stop the train that I had not done." This testimony was not controverted. In fact the respondent, as already shown, stated that after the air was released at C nothing was left undone by the engineer to avert the accident; that if the truck had not been stalled at A it would have been proper to release the air at C; that from his side of the engine at C he could not see the trailer, and that he saw it for the first time from D; and that "on a curve an engine rocks a great deal, and you can't distinguish things like you can standing still, on account of the motion of the engine." Moreover, as indicated above, under ordinary circumstances, the setting of the brakes at B and the release of the air at C were proper; indeed, it would have been the duty of the engineer, in the absence of some special circumstance which required him to act differently, to release the air on completing the curve.

The position of respondent is that the proximate cause of the injury was the release of the air by the engineer at C. Appellant contends, on the other hand, "that there was no testimony offered which would tend to show there were any acts of negligence on the part of the defendant * * * which contributed directly and proximately to the injury."

It is conceded in appellant's brief that the respondent, in jumping from the locomotive, "had the right to act upon the appearance of danger"; no claim is made that the injuries received by respondent were due to contributory negligence.

"The question of negligence is a question of fact for the jury, and the determination of the jury upon such question of fact will be deemed conclusive upon appeal, where there is any substantial evidence to support it." Imperial V. & M. Co. v. So. Pac. Co., 15 Cal. App. 385, 114 Pac. 1003.

It is clear from the facts assumed to be true that the trailer could have been seen before the engineer released the air, and that if he had appreciated the danger of a collision the accident could have been averted. On the other hand, it cannot be questioned that, due to the motion of the engine and the angle at which the train was approaching the crossing, it would have been difficult to realize that the trailer was stalled. As has been noted, respondent concedes that after the air was released the engineer did all that could be done to stop the train. And in measuring the conduct of the engineer it must be kept in mind "that a railroad track is in and of itself a sign of danger, and that one approaching such track with intent to cross it is bound to exercise his faculties of sight and hearing in order to ascertain whether a train is approaching." Loftus v. Pac. Elec. Ry., 166 Cal. 464, 467, 137 Pac. 34, 35. This the engineer had a right to assume in the operation of the train, and upon this theory the natural assumption would be that the trailer was moving. In this connection the fact that the trailer was 1,000 feet away should not be overlooked. As we have said, respondent's testimony is that up to the time the air was released he could not, from his side of the engine, see the trailer, and there is no suggestion that the engineer actually saw it or had any intimation that there was any obstruction on the track before he released the air. We do not think it can be said that the engineer should have realized that the trailer was stalled at the time he released the air. The engine had not yet completed the curve, and, viewing the entire situation at that distance, a reasonable conclusion would be, assuming the engineer saw the trailer, that it would be out of the way before the train reached the crossing. In any event, there was before the jury no substantial evidence upon which it could be found that the engineer acted negligently in releasing the air. Any finding to the contrary must necessarily rest upon conjecture.

[4] 3. In view of this conclusion it will not be necessary to discuss appellant's contentions "that upon the undisputed testimony the respondent assumed the risk, if any there was, in the speed of the train at this particular point," and that the amount of the verdict constituted excessive damages. It will be proper, however, to consider appellant's assignment of error in the admission of respondent's testimony that firemen were usually promoted to be engineers at an increased salary, that he was twice "out for promotion," that there was only one man ahead of him on the seniority list, and that this man and the man under him on the list had been promoted since the accident. The claim is that this testimony was "too remote." The complaint laid the foundation for special damage on this account. Galveston, etc., Ry. Co. v. Ford (Tex. Civ. App.) 46 S. W. 77, was a case where the dependents of a deceased fireman sued to recover damages for his death alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant railway company and its employés. With regard to the testimony of a witness that the decedent "was in the line of promotion to the position of locomotive engineer," the court said:

> "This was proper testimony in reference to his reasonable future expectations, which the authorities agree are a proper element of damages in this class of cases."

It needs no argument to bring the facts of this case within the rule thus announced. Appellant's contention cannot be sustained.

The judgment is reversed.

In re ROBERTSON'S ESTATE. (S. F. 9377.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 15, 1920.)

Wills ⇐624 — Gifts of residue held not contingent.

Under a will giving testator's personal property and income from the rent of a ranch for three years to his wife if she survived him, otherwise all testator's property to be distributed as provided in the next section, which section gave the residue of the estate to the children, the distribution of the residue was not conditional on the testator's surviving his wife, but was an absolute gift, and the provision containing the condition related only to the property previously given to the wife.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thomas C. Denny, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of John Robertson, deceased. From the decree of final distribution, the widow of deceased, Grace Robertson, appeals in so far as that decree distributed to the children the real property of deceased. Decree affirmed.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

J. R. Leppo and Kellogg & Kyle, both of Santa Rosa, W. H. Early, of Petaluma, and G. Scott, of Santa Ana, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an appeal by Grace Robertson, the widow of deceased, from the decree of final distribution given in the estate, in so far as it distributes to the children of deceased all of the real property of the deceased, subject only to a provision in her favor for the rents of one parcel thereof for a period of three years. Her claim in this behalf is based upon the theory that as to the realty deceased died intestate, and that she, as surviving wife, has succeeded to an interest therein. All of the property was separate property of the husband.

The will of deceased, in so far as is material to the controversy, is as follows:

"First. I hereby will, devise and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Grace Robertson, all personal property, including any money in banks that I may possess at the time of my death, and in addition thereto, I direct that my ranch be rented for three successive years after my death and she paid at the rate of $500.00 per year from said rental for a period of three successive years, provided, however, if agreeable to all parties, my sons and daughters may make other provisions for said payments, this to be in case she survive me; in case she does not survive me I then desire all my property to be distributed as in the next section herein.

"Second. I hereby will, devise and bequeath all of the rest and residue of my property in the following manner, to wit:

"First. To my son John Robertson, Jr., the sum of $1,000, and thereafter all the rest and residue of my property be the same real, personal or mixed and wheresoever situated share and share alike to my sons and daughters" [naming them].

"I make no bequest to the children of my wife by her former marriage. * * *"

The wife having survived the deceased, the superior court distributed all personal property to her and also gave her the rents of the ranch for a period of three years, and distributed the residue as provided in the second subdivision of the will. The claim of the surviving wife, to the effect that deceased died intestate as to the residue, is based on the theory that by reason of the sentence, "In case she does not survive me then I desire all my property to be distributed as in the next section herein," contained in the subdivision denominated "First," the disposing provisions of the subdivision denominated "Second" were to have effect only in the event that the wife predeceased her husband, with the result that, as she survived deceased, there was no disposition of the residue, and consequently intestacy in regard thereto.

It seems to us that this claim is entirely destitute of merit. The intention of the testator as expressed in the will is so clear as to not present a debatable question. He desired his wife to have, if she survived him, the personal property and rents of the ranch for three years, as specified in the subdivision denominated "First," and in that event he desired "all the rest and residue" to go to his sons and daughters as specified in the subdivision denominated "Second." By the latter subdivision he says, "I hereby will, devise and bequeath all of the rest and residue of my property in the following manner, to wit," an absolute disposition of the "rest and residue" remaining after the prior disposition to the wife. If the wife did not survive him, he desired the portion of the estate given to her to go in the same manner as the "rest and residue" was to go if she survived him, and it was to accomplish this and to prevent intestacy as to the portion given to the wife, that he inserted at the end of subdivision "First" the words, "In case she does not survive me then I desire all my property to be distributed as in the next section herein." This was manifestly a provision designed to have effect only in the event of the wife's dying before him, a simple statement that if she did not survive him, he desired "all" his property to go in the same manner "as" the "rest and residue" was to go if she survived him. In view of the fact that she did survive him, the will is to be construed entirely without regard to this provision.

The record shows that an appeal was also taken from the decree by the executors of the will, but the same has not been prosecuted, and no brief has been filed thereon.

The appeal taken by the executors is dismissed. On the appeal by the widow the decree of distribution is affirmed.

MICHELIN TIRE CO. v. BENTEL et al.

SAME v. BENTEL.

(L. A. 5050, 5051.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 16, 1920.)

1. Principal and surety ⇐99—Change in contract releases sureties.

Under the express provisions of Civ. Code, §§ 2840, 2819, 2844, sureties may insist upon the exact terms of their contract, and any change therein without their consent releases them from liability.

2. Attachment ⇐337—Amending complaint to state new cause of action releases undertaking to pay judgment on original complaint.

Sureties on an undertaking to release attachment, agreeing to pay any judgment secured by plaintiff, were released from their undertaking where the complaint was later amended, without their consent, to state a new cause of action on assigned claims, which plaintiff did not own when the undertaking was executed.

3. Principal and surety ⇐128(1)—Change in contract with surety's consent does not release him.

A surety is not exonerated from liability by a change in the contract between the principal and creditor which is made with his consent.

4. Attachment ⊂337—Surety's consent to amendment of complaint not agreement to be liable for debt set up in amended complaint.

A stipulation of a surety on undertaking to release attachment, permitting plaintiff to prosecute a claim thereafter assigned to it in the original action without prejudice to any rights which the defendants may have against plaintiff, etc., was not a consent that the sureties' agreement should be altered so as to cover the new debt set up in the amended complaint.

5. Attachment ⊂251—Order discharging attachment conclusive on undertaking given to secure its release.

Where plaintiff attached property and amended its complaint to declare upon causes of action subsequently assigned to it, an order, discharging the attachment because defendants were not indebted to plaintiff at time alleged in attachment affidavit, is an adjudication that the stipulation permitting amendment of complaint did not renew the attachment, and plaintiff cannot assert to contrary when attempting to enforce an undertaking given to secure attachment's release.

6. Guaranty ⊂53(1)—Release by changing cause of action.

An instrument, guaranteeing payment of any judgment that may be obtained, is released where the complaint is subsequently amended to declare upon an assigned cause of action not owned by plaintiff at the time the guaranty was executed.

Appeals from Superior Court of Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Two actions by the Michelin Tire Company against George R. Bentel, James V. Baldwin, and A. J. W. Keating, and against George R. Bentel. Judgment for defendants in both actions, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ward Chapman and L. M. Chapman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. C. Millsap, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The above-entitled actions were tried together upon the same evidence. The judgment in each case was for the defendants and the plaintiff has appealed therefrom. They are presented upon the same transcript. Case No. 5050 is upon an undertaking to release an attachment. Case No. 5051 is upon the individual guaranty of Bentel covering the same claim. We will consider them in numerical order.

L. A. No. 5050.

This is an action upon an undertaking executed by the defendants under the following circumstances: On January 17, 1912, the plaintiff, Michelin Tire Company, a California corporation, began an action to recover money against Coleman & Bentel Company, a corporation, in the superior court. A writ of attachment was duly issued therein. By virtue thereof the sheriff, on or before January 25, 1912, levied upon personal property belonging to Coleman & Bentel Company, and took it into his custody. It was then agreed between the parties that if the undertaking sued on herein were executed, together with a certain bond of George R. Bentel, the plaintiff would release the property from the levy, and would not have the writ levied on any other property. Thereupon the undertaking was executed. Therein the said Baldwin Keating, and Bentel undertook and promised that "in case the plaintiff recovers judgment in said action, defendant will pay to plaintiff the amount of the judgment to be recovered in said action, or that in default thereof, the said sureties will, on demand, pay to plaintiff the amount of said judgment so recovered," not exceeding $15,000, the amount of the undertaking. In consideration thereof the property was released, and no further levy was made under the writ.

The theory of the defense is that the undertaking of the sureties was for the payment of any judgment that might be rendered in the action pending at the time it was executed; that afterward, and without their consent, an amended complaint was filed, which set forth a new and different cause of action; that the cause then proceeded upon said new cause of action; that the judgment recovered was upon said new cause of action and not upon the cause of action averred in the original complaint. Upon this the claim is that, as the contract they made as sureties was thereby altered, they are exonerated. Civ. Code, §§ 2840, 2819, 2844.

For the better understanding of the question raised it is necessary to state at some length the facts preceding the attachment suit, together with the pleadings and judgment therein.

Two corporations were in existence, both named "Michelin Tire Company," one, plaintiff herein, organized under the laws of California, the other organized under the laws of New Jersey. The California corporation was formed by the stockholders of the New Jersey company for the purpose of acting as agent for the latter company in carrying on and facilitating its California business. The New Jersey corporation was a manufacturer of automobile tires and accessories in New Jersey. It had appointed Coleman & Bentel Company its agent in Los Angeles to sell its goods at that place, under a contract whereby the agent agreed to make to the principal monthly remittances of the amounts received for goods of the principal sold by the agent. From time to time goods were shipped by the New Jersey corporation to Coleman & Bentel Company, some directly to it, and some through the medium of the California Michelin Tire Company as its agent, all to be sold in its behalf by said Coleman & Bentel Company. From these sales a debt amounting to a sum over $20,000 accrued from Coleman & Bentel Company to said New Jersey Corporation. The attachment suit was begun by the California corporation on January 17, 1912, as above stated. The complaint then filed alleged that defendant Coleman & Bentel Company had entered into a contract with the said Michelin Tire Company of California whereby said tire company agreed to supply said defendant with automobile tires and accessories to be sold by the said defendant as the exclusive agent of said plaintiff, the title to said tires to remain in the plaintiff until sold and paid for, and that said defendant should remit to plaintiff each month the amount due to said plaintiff under said agency on account of such sales, and that under said contract there existed a mutual, open, and current account between the plaintiff and defendant upon which there had become due to the plaintiff from said defendant the sum of $22,366.19, which remained unpaid and for which judgment was demanded in favor of said plaintiff against said defendant. Bentel was also a party to said suit, and with respect to him it alleged that he was the holder of 25,000 shares of stock of said Coleman & Bentel Company, and by reason thereof was liable for a certain portion of said indebtedness, for which judgment was asked against him. It was the action upon this complaint that was pending at the time the undertaking herein sued on was executed, and, of course, it was to this action that the undertaking referred, and it was the judgment in this action which the sureties therein undertook and promised to pay.

In truth and in fact the Michelin Tire Company of California had not made any contract with or sold or consigned any goods to Coleman & Bentel Company, the latter had not sold any goods for or on behalf of the former, and was in no wise indebted to it in any sum whatever. The Coleman & Bentel Company had, however, sold tires as agent for the Michelin Tire Company of New Jersey, and had become and was indebted to it therefor as before stated. Some time between the execution of this undertaking and the 2d day of April, 1912, it was discovered by the plaintiff, or its attorneys, that a mistake had been made, and that the goods sold by the Coleman & Bentel Company were wholly for the account of and under a contract with the Michelin Tire Company of New Jersey, and that said company was the real creditor to whom said debt was due and with whom the account had accrued. On April 2, 1912, the Michelin Tire Company of New Jersey transferred and assigned to the Michelin Tire Company of California all of its claims as aforesaid against said Coleman & Bentel Company.

An answer to the original complaint was filed in March, 1912, taking issue on the material allegations of the said complaint. These issues never came to trial. They were disposed of in the following manner: In May, 1912, after the aforesaid assignment by the New Jersey corporation to the plaintiff, the attorneys of the plaintiff informed the defendants' attorneys that plaintiff had no cause of action against said defendants at the time the action was begun, and that it could not recover in the action. No lawful course was then open to the plaintiff, except to dismiss the action and begin a new action on the claim assigned to it by the New Jersey corporation. Apparently for the purpose of avoiding such dismissal, a stipulation was then made between the parties. It recited that said plaintiff held no claim against said defendant when the action was begun, but that it had, on April 2, 1912, acquired by assignment the claim of the New Jersey corporation against defendants, and that by reason of these facts it would be necessary to dismiss the action, unless the defendants would permit the plaintiff to file an amended complaint and would waive the objection that said plaintiff was not the owner of the claim, or any claim, against defendants at the time the action was begun. Following this recital was an agreement declaring that the plaintiff was not the owner of the claim sued on at the time the action was begun, and that defendants were not, nor was either of them, indebted to plaintiff at that time in any sum whatever; that on April 2, 1912, the plaintiff acquired by assignment the claim of the New Jersey corporation against the defendants, and was then the owner thereof, and further agreeing that the plaintiff might file an amended complaint upon the aforesaid assigned claim of the New Jersey corporation, and that the objection that the plaintiff was not the owner of the claim at the time of the commencement of the action "shall be for the purposes of the further prosecution of this action waived, in consideration of, and subject to the conditions" expressed in the stipulation, and that no objection to the prosecution of the action would be made by the defendants on the ground that plaintiff was not the owner of the claim when the action was begun. It further declared that the plaintiff waived all costs accrued up to that time. The conditions referred to were that if the defendants, or either of them, desired to sue the plaintiff for damages on account of the beginning of the action, or any proceedings theretofore taken therein, the facts declared in the stipulation should be admitted as true in such action, and that with respect to such action the action then pending should be treated as having been dismissed at the date of the stipulation, and that the consent of the defendants to the further prosecution of the claim as then held by assignment should be without prejudice to any rights of the defendants, or either of them, against said plaintiff.

Thereupon the plaintiff filed an amended complaint, wherein it alleged the accrual of the indebtedness from the defendant Coleman & Bentel Company to the New Jersey corporation for goods sold under the agency above mentioned; its assignment on April 2, 1912, to the plaintiff; its nonpayment, together with the holding by Bentel of a certain portion of the stock in the defendant corporation; and his liability as such stockholder. Judgment was asked against the defendant for the full amount of the claim, and against Bentel for his proportion thereof. In the meantime, however, about $2,000 had been paid on the New Jersey corporation claim, and the amount of the judgment asked was less than in the former complaint by reason of such payment. Upon the trial of the action judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff for the amount found due to the New Jersey corporation and assigned to the plaintiff, as above stated.

It has been frequently stated in our decisions, and it applies to all contracts of suretyship. First Cong. Ch. v. Lowrey, 175 Cal. 126, 165 Pac. 440; Bridge v. Conn., etc., Co., 167 Cal. 782, 141 Pac. 375; Cadenasso v. Antonelle, 127 Cal. 386, 59 Pac. 765; Tally v. Parsons, 131 Cal. 518, 63 Pac. 833; Glenn Co. v. Jones, 146 Cal. 520, 80 Pac. 695, 2 Ann. Cas. 764. It applies to undertakings to release attachments. 6 Cor. Jur. 347. In Cassidy v. Saline Co. Bank, 7 Ind. T. 567, 104 S. W. 838, the court, in discussing this question, said:

"The surety upon a bond given by the defendant to dissolve an attachment takes his obligation with reference to the cause as it then stands; and, should the plaintiff afterward so change his pleadings as to make virtually a new action, how can it be said that the surety would have obligated himself under such new order of things? He may have been satisfied that the plaintiff could not recover in the action, and may therefore have been willing to give the defendant present relief by signing as his bondsman, though he would not have signed had the suit been well grounded"—citing Waples on Attachment, § 774, and Shinn on Attachment, § 306.

Accordingly it was held that an amendment of the complaint changing it from an action by a partnership on account, to which an answer had been filed denying the liability and the partnership, to an action upon a judgment rendered in another state upon the same account, which, of course, cut off the defenses previously pleaded, changed the conditions of the surety's contract, and having been made without his consent, released him from liability. In Quillen v. Arnold, 12 Nev. 244, it was said, per Beatty, J., that although the power to allow amendments "may be and is very liberally exercised, and very properly so, as between the parties to the action in furtherance of justice, it cannot be exercised with the effect of changing the rights and liabilities of third parties." The decision was that an action upon a complaint by John Donahue and Miles Quillen to recover a debt due them on account for goods sold by them as partners, was changed by an amendment alleging a debt due to Miles Quillen as surviving partner of a firm composed of Edward Donahue and Miles Quillen, and also a debt due to Quillen for goods sold by him after the death of the partner, although the goods and sales referred to in the original complaint were the same as those mentioned in the amended complaint, and consequently, that the sureties on a bond to release an attachment given prior to the amendment were released from liability thereon by such amendment without their consent. Similar rulings will be found in Prince v. Clark, 127 Mass. 600; Freeman v. Creech, 112 Mass. 180; Bean v. Parker, 17 Mass. 603; Andre v. Fitzhugh, 18 Mich. 100; Fullerton v. Campbell, 25 Pa. 345; Fish v. Barbour, 43 Mich. 26, 4 N. W. 502; and Mathews Consolidated Slate Co. v. Sweeney, 219 Mass. 285, 106 N. E. 975.

[2] Applying this principle to the present case, there can be no doubt that the defendants Baldwin and Keating are released from liability on the undertaking. It is conceded that they did not consent to the amendment of the complaint. They were bound only to pay any judgment that could be rendered in the action upon the complaint as it stood when they executed the undertaking. To that action the defendants therein had a perfect defense; that is, that Coleman & Bentel Company had not made the contract with the Michelin Tire Company of California which was alleged in that complaint, and were not indebted to said plaintiff. The sureties on the undertaking were then entitled to the full benefit of that defense, and if no amendment had been made there would have been no judgment for them to pay. This condition of the case was a part of the contract. By the change in the cause of action this defense was taken away, if plaintiff's contention were correct. The plaintiff could not have recovered on the cause of action set up in the amended complaint in an action begun on January 17, 1912, for at that time it was not the owner of the claim. The undertaking they executed did not refer to or embrace that cause of action, and they cannot be held liable for a judgment rendered upon it. The judgment in their favor was correct.

[3] A different question is presented with respect to the liability of the defendant Ben-

tel. He was a party to the action in which the attachment was issued and judgment was asked therein against him on account of his liability as a stockholder. He joined with the other defendant in the answer filed in March, 1912, and they were both represented by the same attorney. The stipulation above mentioned, agreeing to the continuation of the action upon the amended complaint and waiving the objection that the plaintiff was not the owner thereof when the action was begun, was signed by the attorney for both defendants, including Bentel. Consequently it cannot be claimed that he did not consent to the change in the cause of action. A surety is not exonerated from liability by a change in the contract between the principal and the creditor which is made with his consent. It follows that Bentel was not discharged from liability on the undertaking by reason of such change in the cause of action, if his consent to such amendment can be construed to be an agreement that his previous undertaking should apply to the new action thus authorized.

[4] We do not think the stipulation signed by his attorney can be so construed. The undertaking he signed, as we have said, was, in effect, an agreement that upon the defendants' default in so doing he would pay the judgment that might be rendered in the original action on the cause of action stated in the original complaint. It did not bind him to pay a judgment rendered on any other cause of action substituted afterwards for the cause of action sued on. His consent as a party to continue the action upon the newly alleged cause of action is not equivalent to an agreement by him that his original undertaking covering the old debt should be altered so as to cover the different debt set up in the amended complaint. He might have been quite willing that such amendment should be made, knowing that his contract of suretyship did not cover it, and that it would terminate his liability on the undertaking. There is evidence indicating that this fact was known to him. In order to make him liable on the original undertaking, for a judgment on the new cause of action, his consent must have been given under such circumstances, or must have been couched in such terms, as to manifest his intent that the original undertaking should stand as security for the newly alleged debt; it must be the equivalent of a new contract by him as surety for such new debt; it must be in effect a consent to the alteration of his contract as surety to conform to the new conditions. In every case in which a surety has been held responsible on a contract which had been altered with his consent after its execution by him, such an agreement, changing his contract of suretyship, has been either expressed or implied in the argument leading to the conclusion that he was not exonerated. His attorney in the action was authorized to maintain his defense thereto and do such things in his behalf as were proper or necessary for that purpose. To that extent he would be bound by the agreements of the attorney regarding the conduct of the action. But there is no evidence to show that he was employed or authorized by Bentel to make a new undertaking concerning the attachment or to alter or extend the old undertaking and continue it in force for the security of the new debt. It is therefore at least doubtful if the stipulation could have been allowed to have such effect if it had expressed such intention.

It does not purport to have that effect. Its import is to the contrary. One of the conditions stated in the stipulation was that the consent to the prosecution by the plaintiff of the newly acquired claim in the old action should be "without prejudice to any rights which the defendants, or either of them, may have" against said plaintiff. This plainly refers to and includes other rights than that of making a defense against the new claim, for that right they would have had without the condition. It therefore included and reserved the right of Bentel, in any suit upon the undertaking for the release of the attachment, to claim in defense thereto that he was not liable thereon for any judgment rendered in the further prosecution of the main action, for that it covered only the cause of action originally alleged, and which would be, in effect, abandoned by the amendment to the complaint to which he was consenting. Consequently, it did not alter the undertaking so as to make it apply to the new cause of action.

[5] That it cannot be so construed was, in effect, adjudged by the court during the subsequent proceedings in that action. In December, 1913, after the amendment of the complaint, the defendants therein moved to discharge the attachment for the release of which said undertaking had been given, on the ground that the affidavit given by the plaintiff to procure the attachment, in so far as it alleged that the defendants were then indebted to plaintiff, or that said defendants had made any contract with the plaintiff, was false, and that in fact no such contract had ever been made, and no such indebtedness then existed as alleged in said affidavit, and that said defendants were not at that time indebted to the plaintiff in any sum whatever. The motion came on for hearing in January, 1914, upon affidavits showing the making of the undertaking, the amendment of the complaint, and other facts relating thereto, and thereupon the court granted the motion and made an order discharging the attachment. This order was not appealed from, and it has become final. It was, in effect, an adjudication that the amendment of the complaint and the stipulation made consenting to it did not operate to renew the attachment or keep the undertaking alive for the security of the new cause of action. The plaintiff is bound by this adjudication, and cannot be permitted now to assert the contrary. Bash v. Howald [Okl.] 157 Pac. 1156; Freeman on Judgments, § 323; Commissioners v. McIntosh, 30 Kan. 234, 1 Pac. 572; Boylan v. Bock, 60 Wash. 423, 111 Pac. 454; Lake v. Bonynge, 161 Cal. 129, 18 Pac. 535.

For these reasons we conclude that the court below was correct in rendering judgment in favor of the defendant Bentel.

The judgment in case No. 5050 is affirmed.

L. A. No. 5051.

[6] This action is upon a guaranty given by the defendant Bentel for the purpose of obtaining the release of the attachment hereinbefore mentioned. It was given simultaneously with and in the same action as the undertaking sued on in appeal No. 5050. At the time the attachment was issued a levy was made, not only on the property of Coleman & Bentel Company, but also upon several parcels of real property belonging to Bentel. The guaranty signed by Bentel alone was made in pursuance of the same negotiations for the release of the attachment which led to the execution of the undertaking. Bentel's agreement recited that the defendants were desirous of substituting for the attachments a bond for the release thereof, and that plaintiff had agreed to accept such bond on condition that Bentel "shall personally guarantee the payment of any judgment that may be obtained in this action on the account sued upon, and personally guarantee the payment of whatever amount is actually due the plaintiff from the defendant Coleman & Bentel Company." The agreement then followed, stating that, in consideration of the release of the attachment and the surrender of certain uncollected accounts previously pledged to the plaintiff, the said Bentel "does hereby guarantee the payment of any judgment that may be obtained in this action against the defendants, or either of them, and personally promises to pay whatever amount is found to be due to the plaintiff from the defendants."

It will be seen that the language of this instrument, executed as it was on January 25, 1917, eight days after the beginning of the action and prior to any amendment of the complaint therein, necessarily referred solely to the cause of action set forth in the complaint as it then stood. It therefore contains no promise to pay any judgment rendered upon some other and different cause of action. Bentel had a right to insist that the case should stand at it then was, in which event, since, as we have shown, the plaintiff then had no cause of action against the defendants, or either of them, and could not recover any judgment against either of them, Bentel would never have become liable to the plaintiff upon his guaranty for any sum whatever. The subsequent amendment of the complaint in pursuance of the stipulation to which we have already referred expressly reserved any right which Bentel had against the plaintiff. This, as we have said with reference to his obligation upon the undertaking, included his right to defend any action upon this guaranty on the ground that it did not cover or make him liable for any judgment that might be rendered in the newly alleged cause of action set up in the amended complaint in pursuance of the consent given in the stipulation upon the conditions therein stated. For reasons similar to those set forth with respect to the undertaking, the conclusion necessarily follows that Bentel was not liable upon this guaranty for the judgment subsequently rendered in the new action to which the guaranty did not relate.

The judgment in case No. 5051 is affirmed.

RUDNECK et al. v. SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA METAL & RUBBER CO.
(L. A. 6029.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 12, 1920. Rehearing Denied Dec. 9, 1920.)

1. Sales ⟸69—Contract held one for certain pile of iron refuse.

A contract of sale as expressed in letters held one for a certain pile of iron borings and turnings, and not for a quantity of unidentified borings and turnings.

2. Appeal and error ⟸1051(4)—Admission of evidence to show contract to be what in terms it clearly was is harmless.

Admission of evidence to show a contract to be what by its terms it clearly was, one for a certain pile of iron, is harmless.

3. Sales ⟸54—Contract, being in clear terms, circumstance is immaterial on construction.

There being no doubt as to what a contract really was as expressed in writing, namely one for sale of a certain pile of iron refuse, the circumstance that several of the carloads, shipped to and without objection paid for by, the buyer, were from another source, is immaterial on the question of what the contract was.

4. Sales ⟸36—Inspection bars defense of mistake as to material bought.

Where the purchaser of a certain pile of material before the purchase examined it and was fully informed as to its nature, he cannot claim mistake as to the nature of the material

5. Partnership ⟸216(2)—Issue of publication of certificate of partnership in case of fictitious name held raised by pleadings.

The issue of plaintiffs, partners doing business under a fictitious name, as shown by the complaint counting on a partnership contract, having published a certificate of partnership, as required by Civ. Code, § 2468, to entitle them to maintain an action on such a contract, is in the case, without a plea of abatement; the complaint alleging compliance with the Code requirement, and the answer denying such allegation.

6. Appeal and error ⟹1010(2)—Finding without evidence for party having burden of proof not sustained.

A finding on an issue in plaintiff's favor without evidence can be upheld only if they did not have the burden of proving the affirmative of the issue.

7. Partnership ⟹217(1)—Burden of proof on partners using assumed name, who allege publication of certificate.

Plaintiffs, partners doing business under a fictitious name and suing on a partnership contract, have the burden of proving publication of a certificate of partnership, alleged in complaint and denied by the answer, and necessary under Civ. Code, § 2468, for maintenance of such action.

8. Appeal and error ⟹1178(6)—New trial ordered on a single issue; others being properly determined.

All the issues other than whether plaintiffs, partners doing business under a fictitious name, published a certificate of partnership, having been properly determined, the reversal will be for a new trial on that issue alone.

9. Partnership ⟹64—Failure of partners using fictitious name to publish certificate of partnership only matter of abatement.

That publication by partners, doing business under a fictitious assumed name, of a certificate of partnership, as required by Civ. Code, § 2468, as a condition to right to maintain action on partnership contract, has not been made is only a matter of abatement.

10. Partnership ⟹64—Publishing certificate of partnership in case of fictitious name seasonable if before trial of issue.

It is enough for partners doing business under a fictitious name to make the publication of a certificate of partnership, required by Civ. Code, § 2468, as a condition of maintaining an action on a partnership, at any time before trial of the issue of such publication, though not only after the commencement of the action, but after the making of the issue.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by M. Rudneck and another, partners transacting business under the name of the Western Junk Company, against the Southern California Metal & Rubber Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed for new trial on a single issue.

Hollzer & Greenberg, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Alfred Siemon and W. W. Kaye, both of Bakersfield, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against it for the purchase price of certain materials found to have been delivered to it under a contract of purchase from the plaintiffs and for which it failed to pay. That a contract was made, that certain materials were delivered under it, and that the defendant refused to pay therefor are admitted. The substantial defense was that the materials delivered were not of the character called for by the contract. The facts are:

The plaintiffs are engaged in the junk business in Kern county, and were the owners of a pile of machine shop refuse at the town of Taft. The pile, to some extent at least, was made up of "borings and turnings," borings being the metal sawdust, so to speak, made in drilling into a metal, in this case iron or steel, and turnings being the metal shavings made in turning a metal upon a lathe. The defendant desired iron refuse for the purpose of supplying it to copper or other smelters, which apparently use it in reducing their ores. For this purpose the defendant inspected the plaintiff's pile of refuse, and, according to the testimony on behalf of the plaintiffs, which was accepted by the court, agreed to buy it. The agreement was confirmed by an exchange of letters reading as follows:

"Dec. 4, 1917.

"Western Junk Company, Bakersfield, Calif.—Gentlemen: As per agreement made with your Mr. Morris Rudnick, you have sold us say 150 to 200 tons, more or less, of borings and turnings at $8.50 ton, f. o. b. Taft, railroad weights to govern.

"Same to be loaded in gondolas not less than 30-ton minimum. Shipping instructions to be furnished by us.

"Kindly confirm the same by letter.

"Please try and load as clean a stock as you can.

"Yours very truly,

"So. Cal. Metal & Rubber Co.,

"MT/SO By M. Tannenbaum."

"Dec. 5, 1917.

"Southern Cal. Metal & Rubber Co., Los Angeles, Cal.—Gentlemen: Your letter recd. asking us to give conformation as per agreement which we have regarding 150 to 200 tons of borings and turnings, more or less. I would be glad to do it but as you seen the pile, possibly we may not be able to get it all out, but as far as I am concerned you get every pound that is their. I start to load a car from Bakersfield Sat. morning and would like to know if it is possible for me to put in this car auto fenders and bicycle frames and other material like that in car with borings. Regards to tin cans and other stuff like that from dumps I should judge I can get several hundred tons, but before going farther would like to know what I'll get for it F. O. B. Taft or Bakersfield, and how it is to be packed, let me know by return mail. Kindly send shipping instructions at once as I start to load Sat. morning.

"Very truly yours,

"Western Junk Co.

"By M. Rudneck, per Mch."

Following the making of the arrangement, the plaintiffs loaded nine cars, pursuant to shipping instructions from the defendant, and of these three were received and paid for without objection then or thereafter as to the character of their contents, and no claim is made on either side with reference to them. Their only bearing on the case arises from the fact that at least two, if not all three, were not loaded with material from the pile in question, and that this would seem to support to some extent the contention of the defendant that its contract was not to purchase a specified thing, the pile, but to purchase articles or materials by description, as "borings and turnings." The remaining six cars were actually loaded from the pile, and on arriving at their destinations were rejected, the defendant claiming that they were not "borings and turnings," but chiefly slag and sand. The trial court found that this claim was not true, and also that the defendant prior to purchasing had inspected the pile and knew the real nature of the material in it, and in effect that the rejected material was just what the defendant expected to get when it made the contract. These findings go to the essential merits of the case, and upon them the trial court gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

[1-3] The first point made on appeal by the defendant is that the two letters exchanged between the parties constitute a written contract, that the contract as expressed in them is for "borings and turnings," and not for a specific thing, the pile of material at Taft, and that the evidence of the plaintiffs that the latter was the subject-matter of the contract was evidence varying the terms of a written contract, and should not have been admitted, and should not be considered, although admitted. We need not consider whether or not the two letters constituted a written memorial of the arrangement between the parties such as would, under the so-called parol evidence rule, preclude the introduction or consideration of evidence of further additional terms. A sufficient answer to defendant's contention is that the contract, even as expressed in the letters, is not one for a quantity of unidentified borings and turnings as appellant claims, but for a certain pile of borings and turnings. The two letters are to be read together, and the plaintiffs' letter in reply to the defendant's refers to the pile, and states in effect that the plaintiffs' obligation is limited to as much of it as they can get out, but the defendant is to have all they can get. This is a clear specification of the pile as the subject of the sale. The evidence to which the defendant objected was evidence merely to the same effect, and, whether properly admissible or not, could not have affected the result. This conclusion is not affected by the fact already adverted to, that two or possibly three cars were loaded with material not from the pile. This fact would be of decided importance if there were any doubt as to what the contract as expressed in the letters really was. But there can be none, and, this being so, the fact mentioned is immaterial.

[4] The contract, then, was one for a certain pile of "borings and turnings." The court found that the rejected material came from the pile, and it is not contended that this finding is not supported by the evidence. It would not, however, necessarily follow that the defendant was bound to accept and pay for the material. The description of the pile as one of borings and turnings would indicate pretty strongly what the parties, or at least the defendant, believed the nature of the pile to be, and if it did so believe and it turned out that its real nature was not that, there was a substantial mistake such as would vitiate the contract and justify the defendant in refusing to accept deliveries under it. On the other hand, if it appeared, in spite of the description given the pile, that the defendant at the time it contracted to purchase it knew what its real nature was, then there was no mistake, the material delivered was just that which the defendant when it made the contract believed it was purchasing, and there was no justification for the defendant refusing to accept it. Under these circumstances, it would make no difference how the pile was described, whether as one of borings and turnings or of something else. The description is material only as showing a mistake, and it would appear that in spite of the incorrectness of the description there was no real mistake.

It follows, then, that since the material rejected came from the pile sold, the defendant can justify its rejection only on the ground of a mistake as to the nature of the pile. Such mistake is negatived by two findings of the court. The first is that—"It is not true that the material so shipped and consigned by plaintiffs did not consist of borings; and it is not true that 627,160 pounds thereof, or any other substantial quantity, consisted of slag or sand or other worthless material."

The second is that the defendant at the time it made the contract of purchase had examined the pile, and was fully informed as to the real nature of the material in it, so that what was delivered to the defendant was just what it contracted for. It is evident that if either one of these findings is sustained by the evidence, there was no mistake, and the defendant was not justified in its rejections.

The defendant's counsel contended vigorously that the evidence does not sustain the first finding. It is quite doubtful if this contention is sound, but we need not pause to discuss it. The second finding is not attacked in the briefs or in the argument, although the bill of exceptions does specify that it is not supported by the evidence, and in any case the evidence is ample to justify it. That the defendant's agent inspected the pile before purchasing is admitted. Of course, such inspection would not necessarily be final, and if it appeared, as it did in Abel v. Murphy, 88 N. Y. Supp. 256, that in spite of the inspection there was a substantial mistake as to the nature of the thing purchased, the contract could be avoided. But there is nothing to show that in this case the inspection which the defendant made failed to reveal the real nature of the pile. In fact, the fair conclusion from the evidence is that the character of the pile was such that an inspection of it would necessarily reveal the nature of the material of which it was composed. Apparently the material was all about alike and its character plainly evident. The real contention of the defendant's counsel upon the merits would seem to be that the sale was one by description. But the sale was not that, either, according to the letters upon which counsel rely, or according to the other evidence in the case. The sale, not being such, but one of a certain pile of material, the finding of the court that the defendant knew when it purchased what the real nature of the pile was is decisive of the case upon its merits.

[5] There is a point, however, beside the merits, which requires a reversal of the judgment. The plaintiffs were doing business as copartners under a fictitious name. As such, they were required by the Code (sections 2466 and 2468, Civ. Code) to file with the county clerk of the county of their principal place of business a certificate of partnership, and to publish the same for four weeks, in order to entitle them to maintain an action upon a partnership contract. The complaint in this case counted on a partnership contract, showed that the plaintiffs were partners, doing business under a fictitious name, and alleged compliance with both the Code requirements. The allegation as to such compliance was denied by the defendant's answer, and upon the pleadings in this state the parties went to trial. At the trial the plaintiffs proved the filing of the partnership certificate, but introduced no evidence whatever of its publication. The court found that such publication was made, but the finding is without support, and objection to it upon this ground is made in the bill of exceptions and in the briefs. The answer which plaintiffs' counsel make is that the point was, in effect, waived at the trial, and that the failure to make the required publication was a defense which should have been presented by way of a plea of abatement. As to the waiver, suffice it to say that we find nothing to justify the claim that it occurred. As to the contention that the point should have been presented by a plea in abatement, the answer is that when the plaintiffs affirmatively pleaded the fact of publication, they tendered an issue upon the point, and the denial by the defendant accepted the issue. The issue was therefore in the case, and this is enough.

[6, 7] The issue being in the case, and the court finding upon it in the plaintiffs' favor without evidence, the finding can be upheld only in case the burden did not rest upon the plaintiffs to prove the affirmative of the issue, and the real question is, Did the plaintiffs have such burden? This question was flatly presented in Sweeny v. Stanford, 67 Cal. 635, 8 Pac. 444, and a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, who were copartners, was reversed because they had not proven the filing of their certificate of partnership. The case cannot be distinguished from the present, and it has been referred to by this court a number of times (see Phillips v. Goldtree, 74 Cal. 151, 13 Pac. 313, 15 Pac. 451; Alaska, etc., Co. v. Standard, etc., Co., 158 Cal. 567, 577, 112 Pac. 454; Holden v. Mensinger, 175 Cal. 300, 165 Pac. 950), and upon this particular point, the only one really decided by it, it has not been overruled, either expressly or by implication, and we are not prepared to do so now. Its authority is controlling, and necessitates a reversal of the judgment.

[8-10] It is not, however, necessary that there be a new trial as to any issue, except this single one as to the publication of the plaintiffs' certificate of partnership. All the other issues have been properly determined, and there is no occasion for retrying them. Collins v. Ramish, 188 Pac. 558. For the purposes of the new trial, we deem it well to say that if it appear that the plaintiffs have at that time had publication made as required by the Code, it will be sufficient to warrant judgment in their favor whether the publication be before or after the commencement of the action. The fact, if it be the fact, that publication has not been made, is but a matter of abatement. This is now settled, although upon this point the language of Sweeny v. Stanford, just referred to, might seem to justify a different view. Phillips v. Goldtree, 74 Cal. 151, 13 Pac. 313, 15 Pac. 451; Ontario Bank v. Tibbits, 80 Cal. 68, 22 Pac. 66; California, etc., Society v. Harris, 111 Cal. 133, 43 Pac. 525; Ward, etc., Co. v. Mapes, 147 Cal. 752, 82 Pac. 426. The rule is also settled that it is not necessary that the plaintiffs have complied with the statute at the time of the commencement of the action; that it is sufficient if they have done so at the time at least when issue as to the matter of abatement is made. California, etc., Society v. Harris, supra; Ward, etc., Co. v. Mapes, supra; Roullard v. Gray, 38 Cal. App. 79, 175 Pac. 479. We have no hesitation in extending this rule so as to make it sufficient if there be a compliance with the statute before trial upon the issue. It is well settled that a plea by way of abatement of another action pending will be avoided by proof that the other action is no longer pending at the time of trial, although it may have been pending when the plea was made. Collins v. Ramish, supra, and authorities there cited. The reasoning of the decisions we have cited, beginning with California, etc., Society v. Harris, holding that in such a case as the present a compliance with the statute is sufficient if accomplished before objection is made that it has not been accomplished, proceeds upon the analogy between such a defense and one of another action pending. We see no reason for not following the analogy throughout and holding that in the case of one, as well as in that of the other, the defense fails if it appear at the time of the trial that the matter of abatement no longer exists. In fact, it would seem difficult to reconcile First National Bank v. Henderson, 101 Cal. 307, 35 Pac. 899, with any other view. In that case a judgment in favor of a banking corporation, as plaintiff, had been given, and an appeal was taken on the ground that the defendant had pleaded and proved that the plaintiff had not filed with the county recorder certain statements which it was required by statute to file as a condition of its right to maintain an action. Pending the appeal, the statute imposing the condition was repealed, and, this being made to appear to the Supreme Court, it was held that the ground of defense was removed, and the judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed, although the fact that the plaintiff had not complied with the statute plainly appeared. If the removal of the ground of such a defense after judgment is sufficient to justify a disregarding of the defense upon appeal, we can see no reason for not disregarding a very similar defense in the present action, if at the time of trial it appears that the ground for it no longer exists.

Judgment reversed for a new trial, in accordance with this opinion, upon the single issue as to publication by the plaintiffs of their certificate of partnership, as required by law, with directions that if such issue be determined in favor of the plaintiffs, judgment be given for them in accordance with the findings upon the other issues of the cause, and that if such issue be found against the plaintiffs the action be dismissed without prejudice. It is also ordered that appellant recover its costs on appeal from the respondents.

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 19, 1920. Rehearing Denied Dec. 16, 1920.)

1. Corporations ⊜93 — Sale of delinquent stock without notice is void.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 337, 346, relating to sale of corporate stock for delinquent assessments, a sale made without published notice is void.

2. Corporations ⊜243(7) — Creditors cannot set aside irregular forfeiture of stock where stockholders have acquiesced.

Under Civ. Code, § 347, limiting the time to set aside irregular forfeitures of delinquent stock and requiring money paid for the stock to be tendered, creditors cannot hold stockholders personally liable for unpaid balances on shares which had previously been sold for delinquent assessments without collusion.

3. Corporations ⊜93—Stock sold for delinquent assessment vests title in company.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 343, 344, permitting corporations to purchase stock sold for delinquent assessments, the sale passes title to the company and, as between the stockholder and corporation, deprives stockholders of all interest in the shares.

4. Corporations ⊜254 — Stockholders not charged with knowledge of corporation's insolvency.

Stockholders are not charged with knowledge of the corporation's insolvency.

5. Corporations ⊜243(7) — Stockholders not liable to creditors after shares have been forfeited for delinquent assessments.

In absence of fraud, stockholders whose shares have been forfeited and purchased by the corporation for delinquent assessments are not liable to the company's creditors for the unpaid balance on their stock, though the forfeiture was made while company was insolvent.

LAWLOR, J. Both the plaintiff, American Well & Prospecting Company, a corporation, and the defendants, C. P. Blakemore, William Schneider, and Jacob Fieber, appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the respective sums of $3,820.15 against the defendant Blakemore, $1,140 against defendant Schneider, and $1,140 against defendant Fieber, in two actions brought to recover from the defendants certain sums alleged to be due from each of them as the balance not paid in upon their stock in the defendant corporation, Rex Midway Oil Company.

There is no dispute as to the facts. The oil company was organized under the laws of this state in May, 1910. All its works were located in Kern county. April 10, 1912, the company's note for $8,738.80 was executed in favor of the plaintiff. This note was not paid, and on October 27, 1913, the plaintiff secured judgment thereon against the oil company in the sum of $8,738, upon which judgment execution was issued but later returned wholly unsatisfied. It is this judgment which is the basis of plaintiff's claim.

At the time of its organization the oil company had a capital stock of $250,000, divided into 1,000,000 shares of the par value of 25 cents each. It was stated on each certificate, however, that the par value was $1. In July, 1910, 999,980 shares were issued to F. H. Lathrop, as "fully paid-up stock," in consideration for the transfer by Lathrop to the oil company of a lease on certain oil lands in Kern county. Immediately thereafter Lathrop returned to the oil company 950,000 shares to be held as treasury stock. On October 10, 1910, proceedings were duly completed for an increase in the par value to $1, but no certificates of stock were recalled nor were any reissued. Subsequently various blocks of treasury stock were purchased from the company by the three individual defendants. Blakemore bought 2,250 shares at 4 cents and 14,500 shares at 8 cents; Schneider and Fieber each 5,000 shares at 25 cents. Thereafter each of the last-named defendants paid an assessment of 2 cents per share. In December, 1912, a second assessment of 3 cents was levied, but the defendants failed to pay this, and their stock was declared delinquent, March 20, 1913, a delinquent sale was held at which no bids were offered, and the defendants' stock was accordingly purchased by the oil company itself. The transfer was duly entered on the oil company's books. It was found that "on the 20th day of March, 1913, and at least six months prior thereto, and until the forfeiture of its charter thereafter the said defendant Rex Midway Oil Company was insolvent," and this finding is not questioned. On November 30, 1913, the oil company's charter was declared forfeited for failure to pay its license tax to the state.

The amended complaint herein, filed December 3, 1914, alleges that, nothwithstanding the sale of the delinquent stock, defendants are the present owners thereof. On this theory it is further alleged that there is due to the oil company from Blakemore, Schneider, and Fieber on each share the difference between $1, the par value, and the respective sums actually paid for said stock plus the first assessment also paid by them. The defendants Schneider and Fieber jointly, and Blakemore separately, answered the complaint. In each answer it was alleged that, by virtue of the above-mentioned sale, the individual defendants were no longer the owners of the stock, and therefore their liability for the sums remaining unpaid on their shares had terminated. The cause was tried by the court, sitting without a jury, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff.

On appeal Blakemore, Schneider, and Fieber, "expressly waiving all other objections," claim that all interest which they had in the stock purchased by them was divested by reason of the sale thereof, and hence they are not now liable to the creditors of the corporation. Plaintiff's contention is that, because each certificate of the stock which was purchased by the defendants stated the par value of each share to be $1, the defendants are now estopped to deny that one dollar was the par value at the time they purchased the stock, and therefore that the measure of their liability per share is the difference, not between the amounts paid in by them and 25 cents, but the difference between such amounts and one dollar.

[1] 1. Before proceeding to discuss defendants' contention, it will be proper to consider plaintiff's claim:

"That the attempted forfeiture of the stock * * * was not a valid forfeiture * * * because the necessary statutory steps were not taken."

The court found:

"That no publication of the notice of said sale for said delinquency was made in any newspaper published in Kern county at any time; that there was at said time a newspaper published in said Kern county;" that "in all the proceedings in and about said assessment and in leading up to said sale, all of the provisions and requirements of the law * * * regarding the levying of assessments and making calls on capital stock of corporations and the sale of stock for the nonpayment thereof, and particularly, among other things, the provisions of sections 334 to 345, inclusive, of the Civil Code, were followed and complied with except as to the failure to publish notice of delinquent sale under sections 337 and 339 * * * in Kern county."

As to the sale of delinquent stock, section 336 of the Civil Code provides:

"Notice must be * * * published once a week, for four successive weeks, in some newspaper of general circulation and devoted to the publication of general news, published at the place designated in the articles of incorporation as the principal place of business, and also in some newspaper published in the county in which the works of the corporation are situated, if a paper be published therein."

And section 337 of the same Code reads, in part:

"If any portion of the assessment * * * remains unpaid * * * the secretary must, unless otherwise ordered by the board of directors, cause to be published in the same papers in which the notice hereinbefore provided for shall have been published, a notice. * * *"

Section 346 declares:

"No assessment is invalidated by a failure to make publication of the notices hereinbefore provided for, nor by nonperformance of any act required in order to enforce the payment of the same; but in the case of any substantial error or omission in the course of proceedings for collection, all previous proceedings, except the levying of the assessment, are void, and publication must be begun anew."

It is well settled in this state that, in taking the necessary steps to sell stock for nonpayment of assessments, "a strict observance of the statutory provisions with respect to notice is essential." San Bernardino Inv. Co. v. Merrill, 108 Cal. 490, 41 Pac. 487. See, also, Occidental B. & L. Co. v. Sullivan, 62 Cal. 394, 398; Ruck v. Caledonia, etc., Min. Co., 6 Cal. App. 356, 92 Pac. 194; 14 C. J. 649. Under this rule, there having been no publication of notice of the delinquent sale in Kern county, as required by section 337, the forfeiture was void. This conclusion finds support in section 346, for, while under the provisions of that section the assessment itself was valid, the sale was defective and a new publication of notice necessary.

[2] But section 347 provides that—

"No action must be sustained to recover stock sold for delinquent assessments, upon the ground of irregularity in the assessment, irregularity or defect of the notice of sale, or defect or irregularity in the sale, unless the party seeking to maintain such action first pays or tenders to the corporation, or the party holding the stock sold, the sum for which the same was sold, together with all subsequent assessments which may have been paid thereon and interest on such sums from the time they were paid; and no such action must be sustained unless the same is commenced by the filing of a complaint and the issuing of a summons thereon within six months after such sale was made."

And according to the weight of authority, "a sale of forfeited shares cannot be set aside on the ground of mere irregularities unless within a reasonable time a tender is made * * * of the amount of the assessment." 14 C. J. 650. The following quotation from Crissey v. Cook, 67 Kan. 20, 72 Pac. 541, is also pertinent:

"'If the forfeiture is invalid in respect of something which the parties cannot waive and which cannot be cured by their acquiescence, he remains liable to the company's creditors in the event of its insolvency. On the other hand, where there has been a mere irregularity in making a bona fide forfeiture within the company's powers, as by failing to give him the prescribed notice or to pass a formal resolution of forfeiture, but only an entry to that effect on the corporate books has been made by the secretary, yet, if both the company and the shareholder treat the forfeiture as valid, it will be held as such as against the company's creditors.' 2 Thomp. Corp. § 1792."

These authorities have application here. Upon the findings it must be assumed that the levy of the assessment was valid; that the defendants were personally notified both that the assessment was due and payable and that the sale was to take place; that a proper notice of the assessment was duly published; that a proper notice of the sale was published at the oil company's principal place of business, as distinguished from the place where its works were situated; and that the stock was sold at public auction, in default of bidders, to the oil company itself. There is no suggestion that defendants were guilty af any collusion or bad faith, that they have not acquiesced in the validity of the sale, or that the failure to publish notice "in some newspaper published in the county where the works of the corporation are situated" resulted in any injury to plaintiff. It must be held that, as to this irregularity in the publication of a notice, plaintiff is bound by the acquiescence of the defendants and cannot now insist that (passing for the moment the question of the power of the directors to forfeit the stock after the corporation had become insolvent) the sale did not divest the individual defendants of title to their shares.

[3-5] 2. We shall next consider the claim of the individual defendants that by virtue of the sale they were relieved from liability for the unpaid balances upon their stock

In this connection the sole contention of plaintiff is that bidding in at a sale by a corporation of its own stock "at a time when it is insolvent is an invalid transaction, no matter what was the nature of the transaction."

We may observe at the outset there is no evidence, nor is it found, that at the time of the delinquent sale any of the defendants or the directors knew of the corporation's insolvency, or that the sale was tainted with fraud or collusion.

The plaintiff cites Vermont Marble Co. v. Declez Granite Co., 135 Cal. 579, 67 Pac. 1057, 56 L. R. A. 728, 87 Am. St. Rep. 143, to the effect that the assets of a corporation, in case of insolvency, are held in trust for the creditors is not disputed. This is the so-called trust fund theory. It is further argued that the obligation of the defendants herein to pay the balance of their subscriptions was an asset of the corporation. Upon the trust fund theory the judgment is correct for it follows as a corollary to the above that, after the corporation * * * is insolvent and the creditor himself can compel the stockholder to make good the stockholder's obligation to him as beneficiary, the corporation cannot deprive the creditor of the stockholder's obligation by any agreement or transaction between the corporation and the obligor.

Plaintiff further claims that the decisions in Vermont Marble Co. v. Declez Granite Co., supra, People's Bank v. Rickard, 139 Cal. 285, 73 Pac. 858; Welch v. Sargent, 127 Cal. 72, 59 Pac. 319; National Carriage Co. v. Story, etc., Co., 111 Cal. 531, 44 Pac. 157; Herron Co. v. Shaw, 165 Cal. 668, 133 Pac. 488, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1265, and Lucey Co. v. McMullen, 178 Cal. 425, 173 Pac. 1000—are applicable to the facts in the case at bar. But we do not find that in any of those cases a similar state of facts was presented. In the Rickard, Sargent, and Story Cases it appeared that the stockholder, with knowledge of the corporation's insolvency, voluntarily transferred his stock to an irresponsible third person with the intent to escape liability; and that the decision in each of those cases turned upon this fact appears, for instance, from this excerpt from the opinion in the Sargent Case:

"After the corporation has become insolvent to the knowledge of the stockholder, he cannot, by a transfer of his stock to an irresponsible person, escape liability for an unpaid subscription to stock, as against a creditors' bill." (Italics ours.)

In the case at bar, as we have said, there is no showing that at the date of the sale any of the defendants knew of the corporation's insolvency. In the Vermont Marble Company, the Herron Company, and the Lucey Company Cases, the shares which defendants held had been issued to them as fully paid up stock in return for the transfer from defendants to the corporation of certain property which was actually worth much less than the par value of the stock, and the sole question was whether, there being no contract between the defendants and the corporation to pay the balance, the defendants were nevertheless liable therefor to the creditors. There was no question arising out of any attempted sale, either voluntary or involuntary, of the stockholder's shares. Here, however, as we have noted, the individual defendants have expressly waived any question that might arise as to their original liability, and their sole contention on appeal is that that liability was terminated by the purchase of the stock by the corporation itself at the delinquent sale.

Plaintiff also cites in this connection Thompson and Morawetz, respectively. In volume 4, § 3759, of the former it is said:

"The rule that a forfeiture bars an action for any balance due on the stockholder's subscription is fraught with too much danger both to the corporation and to the corporate creditors, and opens such a wide and inviting door to fraud, to become the settled policy of corporate law. Under this rule designing directors could by tacit agreement proceed to forfeit unpaid stock in a failing or already insolvent corporation, and by forfeiture and sale thereby free the stockholders, including themselves as such, from further liability on calls, and where the stock itself might be worthless on the market. In an effort apparently to escape such a conclusion it has frequently been held, especially in England, that a forfeiture will not be exercised for the purpose of enabling the subscribers to escape their liability. * * * A subscriber * * * cannot, by announcing his withdrawal from the corporation, relieve himself from liability to pay additional installments. And on the same theory it has been held that a stockholder cannot forfeit his shares by mere abandonment and thus discharge himself from his subscription. Instead of preventing, these cases indicate and tend to encourage the dangers suggested. The only safe, reasonable, and sane rule, consistent with all analogous principles of law, is the one that holds the right of forfeiture to be merely cumulative and not exclusive, and that after forfeiture and sale the subscriber is liable for the residue on his express promise to pay."

But it is clearly the rule in California, as between the stockholder and the corporation, that the effect of a sale made to meet delinquency in the payment of assessments is wholly to divest the stockholder of all right or interest in his shares, to pass title to the corporation (Civ. Code, §§ 343, 344), and, therefore, to terminate all liability on the part of the stockholder for unpaid balances on his stock. See, also, 4 Thompson, supra, § 3757. And the learned author from whom we have just quoted, in the section succeeding that referred to, admits that—

"On the theory of the class of cases holding that the forfeiture terminates the relation of the stockholder to the corporation and relieves him from further liability on his subscription, it follows logically that on a valid forfeiture he ceases to be a stockholder for all future purposes. * * * It follows also that such a forfeiture releases the former stockholder from all liability to creditors of the corporation; * * * a corporate creditor cannot thereafter charge him with the amount of his subscription remaining unpaid. And a valid forfeiture, or even an invalid forfeiture which has been treated by the corporation and the stockholders as valid, will be held as such against the creditors of the corporation."

It is declared in Morawetz that—

"The power of declaring a forfeiture of shares is conferred upon a corporation solely for the purpose of compelling the subscribers to pay their dues promptly, and thus to increase the amount of the common fund. It was not conferred, and cannot be exercised, for the purpose of discharging stock subscribers from liability to creditors, in case the corporation should prove a failure. Unpaid shares in an insolvent corporation, or a corporation which has lost a portion of its original capital, are clearly of no value, but are a burden to the owner, and to declare them forfeited would be a benefit rather than a loss. To say that a corporation, when insolvent, can declare a forfeiture of the shares of its members would, in effect, mean that the members of a corporation may, under the corporate name and for their own benefit, incur debts upon the faith of their subscriptions, and afterwards, if the corporation should prove a failure, annul their liability, leaving creditors unpaid, by going through the form of declaring a forfeiture." (2 Morawetz on Private Corporations. § 857.)

The only case cited in the text in support of the views thus expressed is Tiger Bros. v. Rogers, etc., Co., 96 Ark. 1, 130 S. W. 585, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 694, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 488, where it was held that a purchase by the corporation at a delinquent sale of shares upon which the full amount of the subscription had not been paid was void as to creditors. But in that case neither the statutes under which the corporation was formed nor the corporate by-laws contained any provision authorizing the corporation to purchase its own shares, as do sections 341 and 343 of our Civil Code.

We are not referred to, nor have we been able to find, any case in this state in which it is held that where there is no fraud or collusion, and the directors in good faith have forfeited the shares, the stockholder's liability for the unpaid balance on his stock is not thereby terminated.

Defendants cite on this point 1 Cook on Corporations, §§ 127, 128:

"In the absence of fraud and collusion it is a settled rule that where a corporation has authority to declare the forfeiture of stock for nonpayment of calls, and the forfeiture is regularly declared, such formal declaration puts an end to the liability of the stockholder, and corporate creditors cannot subsequently hold such an expelled or released stockholder liable. This is the rule, even though the debt was contracted by the company before the stock was forfeited. The same principle of law that prevents the corporation from suing on a subscription after the stock has been forfeited, prevents the corporate creditors also from doing the same."

In Mills v. Stewart, 62 Barb. (N. Y.) 444, it is said:

"If the directors should intentionally discharge the stockholders, leaving the debts unpaid, it would be a fraud on the creditors, and therefore void. If it was done in good faith, having due regard to the rights * * * of both creditors and stockholders, I can perceive no reason why it is not both legal and proper. If we are to forbid the exercise of corporate powers, because they may be abused, we may, for like reason, prohibit the exercise of judicial and legislative power. * * * The corporation acting, as I presume in good faith, have, in conformity with the charter, forfeited the stock of the defendant. He thereby ceased to be liable to the creditors * * * and this action cannot be maintained. If the directors fraudulently forfeited the stock, and thereby released the defendant from liability to the plaintiffs, the forfeiture is void." (Italics ours.)

That case was subsequently before the court of appeals (41 N. Y. 384). The opinion in the higher court contains the following:

"The forfeiture relieved the respondent from all liability to the company for the unpaid subscription. * * * The debt [upon which the action was brought] was contracted * * * while the respondent was a stockholder. * * * The finding and judgment show that the proceedings to forfeit the stock of the respondent were instituted and conducted in good faith, without any design to defraud the creditors of the company. * * * The power to forfeit, like the power to manage all the affairs of the corporation, is vested in the directors, upon the assumption that they will exercise it in the best manner practicable for the promotion of the interest of the company and its creditors. That they will not forfeit stock unless the interest of all concerned will be promoted thereby. Should they forfeit it for the purpose of defrauding the corporation or any creditor, such forfeiture would, for that reason, be set aside. Again it is said that the creditor trusts the corporation, upon the faith of this liability of the stockholders to him, and that it would be unjust to deprive him of this remedy by the forfeiture of the stock. The answer to this is that he can rely only upon the liability of the stockholder, subject to the power of the company to discharge the same, by receiving payment, or, if they deem it for the interest of all concerned, forfeiting the stock. This the party dealing with the company is presumed to know, and to rely much more upon the capacity and fidelity of the directors, than upon any liability of the stockholders. Again, when the stockholder has paid in full for his stock, he is entitled to it. This he can never obtain after forfeiture, although compelled to pay the entire price thereof to a creditor of the company. The Legislature could never have intended a result so unjust to the stockholder. * * * The appellant's counsel insists, that the judge erred in excluding proof of the insolvency of the company at the time of the forfeiture of the defendant's stock. This evidence, if the act of the directors was free from fraud, was wholly immaterial. Such proof alone would not show it to have been done fraudulently. No other proof tending to show fraud was offered in connection with it, nor was any intimation of the purpose for which it was offered given to the court." (Italics ours.)

Earle v. Carson, 188 U. S. 42, 53, 23 Sup. Ct. 254, 257 (47 L. Ed. 373), was a suit by the receiver of an insolvent bank, on behalf of the creditors, to recover the amount of the double liability imposed by statute upon stockholders in national banks. The facts were much stronger than in the case at bar, for the sale which the plaintiff claimed was void was a voluntary sale on the part of the stockholder, while here the delinquent sale was, of course, involuntary. The court held that—

"The power of a stockholder in a national bank to transfer stock thereof, like other personal property, is not limited by the mere fact that at the time of the transfer the bank, which was a going concern, was insolvent * * * unless it be shown that the seller was aware of the facts and had sold the stock in order to avoid the impending liability. Nor is such a bona fide sale void if the person to whom the stock is sold is, owing to his insolvency, unable to respond to the double liability, if the fact of such insolvency was unknown to the seller." (Italics ours.)

On a similar state of facts it was said in McDonald v. Dewey, 202 U. S. 510, 526, 26 Sup. Ct. 731, 734 (50 L. Ed. 1128, 6 Ann. Cas. 419):

"The original stockholder cannot be held liable, unless the bank was practically insolvent at the time the transfer was made, and its condition was known, or ought to have been known to the stockholder making the transfer. * * * The transferor can only be held liable if the bank be insolvent, and such insolvency be known, or ought to have been known to him from his relations to the bank. * * * We think it a proper deduction from the prior cases, and such we hold to be the law, that the gist of the liability is the fraud implied in selling, with notice of the insolvency of the bank and with intent to evade the double liability imposed upon the stockholder by the National Banking Act. In short, the question of liability is largely determinable by the presence or absence of an intent to evade liability. The fact that the sale is made to an insolvent buyer is doubtless additional evidence of the original fraudulent intent, but would not be in itself sufficient to constitute fraud without notice of the insolvency of the bank." (Italics ours.)

See, also, Allen v. Montgomery, 11 Ala. 437, 450; Macauly v. Robinson, 18 La. Ann. 619, 14 C. J. 1007.

In our opinion, these authorities announce the correct rule as to the effect of a forfeiture of delinquent shares on the liability of the stockholder to creditors for the sums remaining unpaid on his stock. Plaintiff urges that—

"It is the right of the creditor to have recourse against any stockholder in whose hands the stock appears which is not fully paid-up stock and such a stockholder is under the obligation of seeing that his transferee is financially able to make good the representation upon which the stock was issued."

But in the final analysis this contention rests upon the assumption that the rule announced in Vermont Marble Co. v. Declez Granite Co., supra, was designed to preserve for the creditors not only the liability, but the solvency of the stockholder. Such is not the law. The directors are vested with statutory authority to institute proceedings for the sale of any stock on which an assessment is delinquent, and on behalf of the corporation to buy in that stock in default of other bidders. So long as the good faith of the directors is not questioned, the power thus to take over shares continues even through insolvency. And Thompson, supra, while arguing that the adoption of the rule here contended for by defendants "is fraught with too much danger," nevertheless concedes, in the succeeding section, that where, as in California, a forfeiture terminates the shareholder's liability as between him and the corporation, it also precludes creditors from recovering on that liability.

Here was a corporation organized, it seems, when it was probably believed that the property which it proposed to acquire contained valuable deposits of oil. Formed under these circumstances, the corporation exchanged all but 20 of its 1,000,000 shares of capital stock for a lease of such property. Nine hundred and fifty thousand shares were returned by the lessee to be held as treasury stock, and it was from this stock that the shares were purchased by the defendants. As bearing on the bona fides is the fact that the defendants paid one assessment on their stock. It was found necessary to levy a second assessment, and the circular letter sent to stockholders on that occasion was introduced in evidence. It was to the effect that the assessment "would clear up all the corporation's obligations and absolutely put us out of debt." There is no suggestion that this statement was not made in good faith. According to the minute book, which was admitted in evidence, it was not until more than three months after the sale that the secretary, Clyde P. Campbell, notified the board that—"The company was unable to meet its obligations, and had been in financial troubles for several months past."

As already noted, it is not found, nor is it claimed, that the directors had knowledge of the insolvency. Moreover, no contention is made by the plaintiff that the directors were chargeable with knowledge. And it is the well-settled rule that "stockholders" are not charged with knowledge of the corporation's insolvency. 4. Thomp. Corp. § 4470; 6 Fletcher, Cyc. Corp. § 4043; 14 C. J. 845. We have a case, then, where the sole question raised by the plaintiff is whether, after the corporation has become insolvent, the board of directors can by forfeiture extinguish, as between a shareholder and creditors, the former's liability for the balance as yet not paid in on his stock. In view of the record, and the authorities we have discussed, it must be held that, since there was no showing of any fraud, collusion, or intention to prejudice the rights of creditors, and neither the directors of the Rex Midway Oil Company nor the individual defendants knew of the insolvency of the corporation, the taking over by the corporation of the defendants' shares not only divested the defendants of title thereto, but terminated their liability to creditors for the difference between the respective amounts paid in by them and the par value of the stock.

3. In view of this conclusion it will be unnecessary to discuss plaintiff's contention that the measure of the defendants' liability should be the face value of their stock rather than the actual sums which they contracted to pay for the shares.

DAHNE v. DAHNE. (Civ. 3203.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 7, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 6, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸197(1)—Variance cannot be objected to for first time on appeal.

Objection that testimony pertained to a matter not within the issues cannot be made for the first time on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ⟸1048(5)—Questions on cross-examination held harmless in view of negative answers.

In an action to establish a trust in which defendant denied that plaintiff had paid the purchase price of the property and alleged that defendant herself had paid the entire consideration, action of the court in permitting plaintiff to be cross-examined as to whether in purchasing the property he had not made a gift thereof to defendant, if error in that it admitted evidence not within the issues, held harmless where plaintiff's answers were negatived.

3. Trusts ⟸371(8)—Testimony held not at variance with allegation that defendant had paid for land with her own money.

In action to establish a trust on theory that plaintiff had paid for land conveyed to defendant, defendant's testimony that she had paid for the property with money accumulated from gifts given her from time to time by plaintiff held not at variance with allegation that defendant herself had paid the entire consideration for the land.

4. Gifts ⟸47(3)—Donee in confidential relationship with donor required to prove absence of fraud and undue influence.

Where confidential relations existed between donor and donee, the donee is required to prove, not only the making of the gift, but also the absence of fraud or undue influence.

5. Gifts ⟸47(3)—Fraud and undue influence presumed against donee in confidential relationship with donor.

Where confidential relations existed between donor and donee, the existence of fraud or exercise of undue influence is presumed as against the one who profited in the transaction.

6. Gifts ⟸52—Finding on issue of undue influence held sufficient.

Finding that gifts were made voluntarily and of grantor's own free will and accord, but without use of the words "undue influence," held a sufficient finding that there was no undue influence exerted by donee.

7. Appeal and error ⊂⊃931(1)—Findings construed in support of judgment.

On appeal findings should be construed most favorably in support of the judgment.

8. Trusts ⊂⊃81(2)—Invalidity of marriage did not preclude wife from claiming property purchased by her with money given her by husband as gifts.

In action to establish a trust on theory that land deeded to defendant was in fact paid for by plaintiff, the fact that defendant, who had lived with plaintiff for 10 years supposing herself to be his lawful wife, did not by reason of invalidity of marriage acquire marital rights in his property, did not preclude her from retaining property on ground that she had paid therefor with money received from time to time as gifts from plaintiff, since in such case she did not claim property by virtue of marital rights.

9. Husband and wife ⊂⊃265—Husband cannot revoke gift of community property to which wife did not consent.

A husband has no power to revoke his own gift of community property on the ground that his wife did not consent thereto, and is as fully bound as though it was his separate estate.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Eugenio Dahne against Louise B. Dahne. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. Jefferson Davis and Sweet, Stearns & Forward, all of San Diego, for appellant.

Holcomb & Kempley, of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In this action plaintiff sought a decree declaring certain real property, consisting of a house and lot, legal title to which was vested in defendant, to be the subject of a trust wherein, as alleged sole beneficiary and legal owner thereof, he prayed that such trustee be required to execute a deed conveying the property to him.

The admitted facts and defendant's testimony, in accordance with which, since the only evidence in conflict therewith is the testimony of plaintiff, the court properly made its findings, show that on January 17, 1906, plaintiff, knowing that he had a legal wife then living and falsely representing that she was dead, married the defendant, with whom he cohabited and lived as her husband until March 26, 1916, during all of which period the court found that confidential relations existed between the parties. The property in question was purchased by defendant on July 28, 1913, on which occasion plaintiff, who was present, stated that it was his wife's transaction and directed that the receipt for $200 paid on account of the purchase price be issued to her, which was done. A few days later she paid $1,800 on account of the purchase; whereupon a deed was executed by the owner conveying the property to her, subject to an existing mortgage thereon. The consideration paid for the property consisted of funds accumulated by the parties during the time they were living together as husband and wife and moneys from time to time given to defendant by plaintiff. That, as found by the court, it was the intention of plaintiff and in pursuance of which he acted, to give the property to defendant as her own estate, conclusively appears not only from statements touching the subject contained in plaintiff's letters, but also from the fact that about March 25, 1916, upon learning that, due to the property having been conveyed to his putative wife by another, some question existed as to her power to sell and convey it without his joining therein, he, for a consideration of $10, which defendant paid to him, voluntarily and of his own accord executed to her a quitclaim deed to all his right and interest in the property. The effect of the findings is to exclude the making of any promises, representations, persuasion, fraud, or anything said or done on the part of defendant to influence plaintiff's action; on the contrary, it appears therefrom that, whatever he did in the matter, was voluntary, of his own free will and accord, and without conditions, representations or promises made on the part of defendant, and with the intention that the property should be her sole and separate estate—all of which findings are fully supported by defendant's testimony.

[1, 2] Coming now to the alleged errors of which appellant complains, the defendant, in response to an allegation of the complaint that plaintiff had paid the entire purchase price of the property, and was and at all of the times mentioned had been the owner in fee thereof, denied the same and alleged that the entire consideration therefor was paid by herself. Because of this denial and counter allegation in defendant's answer, appellant insists that the court erred in permitting respondent's attorney to interrogate plaintiff on cross-examination with reference to the property being the subject of a gift made by him to defendant. In connection with this testimony certain letters written by plaintiff to defendant were introduced in evidence, wherein he recognized the property as being the sole and separate estate of defendant, and also recognized the proceeds of a mortgage given thereon as being her sole and separate estate, and which, if used in the manner directed by him, he would pay back to her. He was then questioned as to whether he did not at the time of the purchase of the property consider that he was giving it to defendant, to all of which questions he gave negative answers. No objection was made to the questions, but after they were answered plaintiff's attorney for the first time stated:

"It seems to me she is precluded from changing her tactics and claiming a gift when her answer alleges she purchased it with her own separate funds."

In the absence of any objection made or motion to strike out the testimony upon the ground now urged, that it pertained to a matter not within the issues, appellant is in no position to raise the question for the first time in this court. Moreover, if error, since his answers were negative, he could not in any event have been prejudiced by the evidence.

[3] It is next insisted that proof made by defendant that the real estate was the subject of a gift from plaintiff constituted a variance between the allegations of the answer and evidence received. Defendant's testimony was to the effect that she paid for the property with money accumulated from gifts thereof from time to time made by plaintiff to her, as to all of which testimony no objection whatever was interposed. Moreover, notwithstanding the purchase price of the property was concededly paid by defendant, plaintiff claimed that it was his money; hence the source from and manner in which defendant obtained it was a proper subject of inquiry and evidence tending to controvert his claim was properly received. As to this point we perceive no merit in appellant's contention.

[4-7] The evidence conclusively shows that following the marriage ceremony the parties lived together and cohabited as man and wife for some 10 years, during all of which time plaintiff was fully cognizant of his bigamous marriage, and of which fact defendant had no knowledge until shortly before this action was commenced, when she learned that he had a wife then living from whom he had not been divorced, and thereupon separated from him. Due to this fact appellant insists that, notwithstanding the relation was illicit, the law presumes that a gift of either the property or money with which it was purchased was the result of undue influence exercised by defendant, and therefore the transfer was invalid. Plaintiff did not base his alleged right to the property upon the ground that it was the subject of a gift; on the contrary, he denied that it was so held by defendant, claiming that he paid the purchase price thereof out of his separate funds and caused the title to be vested in defendant merely as a matter of convenience and in reliance upon her parol promise to convey to him upon request, as to which, as stated, the court made adverse findings. As tried, however, and without objection, the case took a wider scope, and, while it was made to appear that the allegations of the complaint as to alleged actual fraud were untrue, the evidence disclosed that, in part at least, the property was purchased with money which plaintiff, who at times received a salary of $1,600 per month, had given to defendant. Since, although the parties were not husband and wife, the court found at the times such gifts were made confidential relations existed between the donor and donee, it devolved upon the latter not only to show the making of the gifts with which she acquired the property, but, since the law from the relation found to exist presumes the existence of fraud or exercise of undue influence as against the one who profits in the transaction, the further burden rested upon her to overcome this presumption by showing that the making thereof was not the result of such fraud or influence. Sections 2219 and 2235, Civ. Code; White v. Warren, 120 Cal. 322, 49 Pac. 129, 52 Pac. 723; Frantz v. Porter, 132 Cal. 53, 64 Pac. 92; Odell v. Moss, 130 Cal. 352, 62 Pac. 555. As to such transactions, "the party benefited by it will be under the necessity of showing that no advantage was taken, and that it was the result of free volition." Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) p. 982. While in the findings the trial court omits the use of the words "undue influence," it does in effect and upon sufficient evidence find that the gifts by plaintiff were, in the absence of fraud, made voluntarily and of his own free will and accord, thus excluding the theory that they were due to any influence exercised by defendant over him, and under the rule that findings should be construed most favorably in support of the judgment, we deem them sufficient.

[8] Appellant next argues that, conceding defendant contracted the marriage with plaintiff in good faith, believing his representation that the wife to whom he had theretofore been married was dead, nevertheless, and notwithstanding her innocence, she acquired no marital rights in his property. A sufficient answer to this contention is that she does not claim the property by virtue of any marital rights as the wife of plaintiff. In the case of Jackson v. Jackson, 94 Cal. 446, 29 Pac. 957, cited by appellant, the facts are readily distinguishable from those in the instant case. What is there said is based upon the fact that, when the husband contracted the marriage, the former wife had, due to her desertion of him in a foreign country, been absent for a period of more than five years, was reputed to be and in good faith by him believed to be dead, in which case, under subdivision 2 of section 61 of the Civil Code, his second marriage was valid until annulled; whereas, in the present case, the complaint discloses that plaintiff knew at the time he contracted the marriage with defendant he had a wife then living from whom he had not been divorced. Moreover, in the Jackson Case it was made to appear that the deeds to the property involved were obtained by gross fraud and the exercise of undue influence by the donee whose relation to the donor was, as provided in sections 2219 and 2235, Civil Code, that of a trustee, facts which the findings herein exclude.

[9] In reply to appellant's contention that, since plaintiff had a legal wife living, he could not give away the community property, it may be said that, conceding the funds to have been the community property of himself and wife, she is not complaining. However this may be, he has no power to revoke his own gift of community property, for the reason that his wife did not consent to the making of it. As to him, he is as fully bound as though it was his separate estate. Spreckels v. Spreckels, 172 Cal. 775, 158 Pac. 537.

There is no merit in the claim that the findings are contradictory. While following the complaint, which contains a vast deal of surplusage and immaterial matter repeatedly stated and restated, no inconsistency appears in the material findings.

Taking the voluminous record as whole, it is clear that in arriving at its conclusion the trial court properly excluded the testimony of plaintiff as unworthy of belief and accepted that of defendant as true, thus in our opinion, reaching a decision which, in the absence of any errors resulting in a miscarriage of justice, is a righteous one.

The judgment is affirmed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF HASKELL, OKL., v. RANGER et al. (Civ. 3342.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 5, 1920.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances ⟸278(2) — Plaintiff has burden of establishing fraud.

Where conveyance by a husband to his wife was attacked under Civ. Code, § 3442, as a fraudulent transfer, the burden of proving that it was such a transfer was on the plaintiff.

2. Fraudulent conveyances ⟸297 — Finding that conveyance by husband to his wife was not fraudulent held warranted.

Where a creditor of a husband attacked under Civ. Code, § 3442, a conveyance by the husband to his wife, evidence held to warrant a finding that the husband was solvent at the time the conveyance was made and that he did not at that time contemplate insolvency.

3. Fraudulent conveyances ⟸57(4)—Though property retained proves valueless, conveyance is not therefore fraudulent.

Where a husband at the time he conveyed property to his wife owned oil leases then valued at about $50,000 and had other property and moneys on deposit, the fact that the oil leases after he expended all of his funds in boring wells proved valueless will not establish that the conveyances were fraudulent.

4. Witnesses ⟸52(6) — Husband incompetent to testify against his wife in action to set aside fraudulent transfer to wife.

As Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, declares that a husband cannot be examined for or against his wife without her consent, a husband cannot be called in an action to set aside as fraudulent transfers to his wife, on the theory that subdivision 1, declaring that a husband without consent of the wife cannot be examined as to any communication during marriage, made the husband competent as to other matters.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Haskell, Okl., against Mae B. Ranger and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas A. Sanson and Eugene E. Morris, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Kemp & Clewett and Schmidt & Riggins, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff, as a judgment creditor of F. B. Ranger, brought this action to set aside certain alleged fraudulent transfers of real estate and money, made by him to his wife, the defendant Mae B. Ranger, and to subject the property so transferred to the payment of plaintiff's judgment.

The appeal is from the judgment entered in favor of defendants.

At the time of the transfers, made in the months of March and May, 1914, F. B. Ranger, as indorser upon a promissory note, was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $3,500 and accrued interest. On July 26, 1918, the indebtedness originally evidenced by this note and interest thereon amounted to the sum of $5,485.11, for which a judgment was obtained against Ranger. Upon a return nulla bona of an execution issued upon the judgment, an alias execution was issued, by virtue of which a writ of garnishment was served upon defendant Mae B. Ranger, the purpose of which was to hold and sequester any and all moneys in her possession belonging to Ranger as judgment debtor of plaintiff. She answered, stating that she was not indebted to him in any sum whatsoever and held no property to which he or his creditors were entitled. Thereupon plaintiff brought this action in the nature of a creditor's bill, alleging that on March 24, 1914, when Ranger, without consideration, conveyed to his wife the two lots of land in question, he was insolvent, or, if not insolvent, he made the conveyance in contemplation of insolvency, and further that at the time of serving the writ of garnishment upon Mae B. Ranger she had in her possession upwards of $10,000 in money which F. B. Ranger had, for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, given her while indebted to plaintiff and others, all of which allegations Mae B. Ranger by her answer denied.

As to these issues the court found adversely to plaintiff, whose chief contention is that the finding is not justified by the evidence.

[1-3] Section 3442 of the Civil Code provides:

"That any transfer or incumbrance of property made or given voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent, and void as to existing creditors."

And section 3450 of the Civil Code provides:

"A debtor is insolvent, within the meaning of this title, when he is unable to pay his debts from his own means, as they become due."

While the burden of establishing the alleged fraudulent transfers of the property devolved upon plaintiff, the evidence in support of the allegation is very meager. It appears therefrom that at the time of the transfers made, in the spring of 1914, F. B. Ranger, as an oil operator was, and for a long time prior thereto had been, engaged in acquiring leases of oil lands in the state of Oklahoma and elsewhere, and undertaking the development of the same for the production of oil. Among such holdings was a lease to 560 acres in the Haskell oil field in Oklahoma. At the time in question he had sold 80 acres of this lease to the 99 Oil Company, which had put down a well that produced some 250 barrels of oil per day. The land retained by him surrounded this 80 acres so transferred to the 99 Oil Company on three sides thereof, and Ranger's west line of 160 acres was within 250 feet of the well of the 99 Oil Company, and the south line of 80 acres was within 200 feet of the same. On said 80 acres of land so held by him and within about 200 feet of the well of the 99 Oil Company, he was at the time in question engaged in boring a well which, when completed, produced about 20 barrels of oil and some 6,000,000 feet of gas. Later he bored two other wells on the lease, neither of which proved successful. The uncontradicted testimony of J. J. Hawk, a stockholder in the 99 Oil Company, is that his leasehold of 480 acres was at the time when Ranger made the transfers reasonably worth $48,000. In addition to this, the evidence tends to show that he had other leases and large sums of money on deposit in sundry banks, including that of plaintiff, which, less the amount given his wife, he used in his oil operations until the funds were exhausted in his unsuccessful operation in developing his property. Other than a number of undated letters written by F. B. Ranger, which the testimony shows he commenced writing more than a year after the transfers, and continued for two or three years, the evidence shows that, in addition to the note held by plaintiff and upon which Ranger as indorser was indebted in the sum of $3,500 he was also an indorser upon a note of the Longuey Mining Company, held by the Hellman Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles. Whether this note was secured collaterally, or whether the mining company was able to pay the same, is not disclosed, nor is the date of maturity of the note shown. It does appear, however, that the note was fully paid in the month of August following the transfer of the property to his wife, and that Ranger's standing with the Hellman Trust & Savings Bank was such that they loaned him $11,000 upon his unsecured note. With reference to the letters, which appear to have been received in evidence without objection, and aside from any question as to the competency of admissions therein made against his wife, Mae B. Ranger (as to which we entertain grave doubt), the letters have little or no probative force other than to tend to establish the fact that at the time of the transfers Ranger was a man possessing considerable means, consisting of cash deposited in banks, oil leases and boring machinery used in connection with the development of oil on such leaseholds. Upon these facts this court cannot say the evidence was insufficient to justify the finding that Ranger was solvent and able to pay his debts at the time when he made the transfers. Nor, considering the character of the property owned by him, its situation in being contiguous to the well of the 99 Oil Company, and the fact that after the transfers he expended large sums of money, until he had exhausted his funds, in boring wells and developing the property in an unsuccessful attempt to find oil, can this court say the trial court erred in concluding that Ranger in making the transfers did not at the time contemplate insolvency. On the contrary, it appears that Ranger in making the transfers retained property in value largely in excess of his debts. While the leasehold, upon development thereafter made at a large expenditure, proved valueless, such fact in itself is insufficient to establish fraud on the part of Ranger. In Evans v. Sparks, 170 Cal. 532, 150 Pac. 372, it is said (quoting from the syllabus):

"In an action by a creditor to set aside such a conveyance, proof that the assets retained by the grantor * * * subsequently became valueless does not compel the conclusion that the transfer was fraudulent and that the grantor was insolvent."

So, here, the fact that the leasehold, valued at the time of the transfer in the sum of $48,000, subsequently, upon the expenditure of large sums of money thereon in developing the same, proved valueless, does not compel the conclusion that Ranger was either insolvent or contemplated insolvency when he made the transfers.

[4] Another point made is that the court erred in its ruling that F. B. Ranger was an incompetent witness against his wife, Mae B. Ranger, against whom he was called by plaintiff to testify. Appellant cites subdivision 1 of section 1881, Code of Civil Procedure, to the effect that a husband, without the consent of the wife, cannot be examined as to any communication made between himself and wife during the marriage, and argues that Ranger's testimony was competent as to all matters other than as to communications made between him and his wife during the marriage. The same section provides that "a husband cannot be examined for or against his wife without her consent." Clearly, the action was one against her, and the purpose of calling him was to testify against her. Without her consent he was not a competent witness. As between husband and wife, the declared policy of the law is to encourage confidence and preserve it inviolate, and hence the broad provision of the statute above quoted, subject, however, to exceptions within which the case is not included.

The judgment is affirmed.

RANGER v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF HASKELL, OKL. (Civ. 3343.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 5, 1920.)

Fraudulent conveyances ⟸57(4)—Transfer of money before indebtedness not subject to claims of subsequent creditors.

Where a husband at a time he was not insolvent, and had no expectation of becoming, made his wife a present of money and she purchased an automobile, the automobile cannot be reached by the husband's subsequent creditors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery by Mae B. Ranger against the First National Bank of Haskell, Okl. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas A. Sanson and E. E. Morris, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Davis, Kemp & Post, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Defendant, having obtained a judgment against F. B. Ranger, caused an execution to be issued thereon which was levied upon a Rausch & Laing electric coupé and a Cadillac automobile then in possession of plaintiff herein, Mae B. Ranger, who claimed ownership of the same. Under the execution so levied the property was by the sheriff sold to defendant for the sum of $300. Thereupon plaintiff brought this action of claim and delivery. Judgment for the restoration of possession of the property was rendered in her favor, from which defendant appeals.

The contention made by appellant is identical with that made in the case of First National Bank of Haskell, Oklahoma, v. Mae B. Ranger, 193 Pac. 788, involving other transfers of property by Ranger to his wife, namely: That title to these cars was transferred by F. B. Ranger to plaintiff, Mae B. Ranger, while he was indebted to defendant bank, and, if he was not insolvent at the time he made the transfer, he made it in contemplation of insolvency. The Rausch & Laing electric coupé was purchased in December, 1913, with money given plaintiff by her husband as a Christmas present, long before he became indebted to defendant, and hence, since it was property acquired by her prior to the time when the bank became a creditor of F. B. Ranger, it could not be subjected to the payment of indebtedness thereafter incurred. In part only was the Cadillac paid for out of funds given by Ranger to his wife after incurring the indebtedness to defendant, but since in an opinion this day filed in the case of First National Bank of Haskell, Oklahoma, v. Ranger et al., 193 Pac. 788, Civil No. 3342, affirming the judgment of the trial court therein, it was held that such transfer of money by F. B. Ranger was not in fraud of his creditors, it follows that plaintiff herein was, as held by the trial court, the owner and entitled to possession of both vehicles.

The judgment is affirmed.

GOOD v. CITY OF SAN BERNARDINO. (Civ. 3352.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 13, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 9, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸741(1)—Surviving heir who has presented demand against city for death does not lose action because other heir has neglected to join.

Under Charter of City of San Bernardino, § 236, providing no claim or demand of any kind shall be the basis of an action against the city unless a verified claim in writing specifying the items shall be filed with the city clerk at least 30 days before action, surviving heir who has presented a demand for damages on account of a death negligently caused by the city does not lose her right of action merely because some other heir has neglected or refused to join in making the demand, or because it subsequently appears there is another heir, unknown at the time of filing of the demand.

2. Master and servant ⟸88(1)—City not liable for death of painter employed by other painter engaged without authority by water commissioner.

Where a member of the board of water commissioners of the city of San Bernardino directed a painter to do such painting as was necessary at a pumping plant, and the painter, on the second day of his work, hired plaintiff's decedent, and they worked together painting for a while until decedent was killed by electric shock while painting the ceiling of a room in which certain electric machinery was located, the attempt of the commissioner without authorization of the board pursuant to Charter of City of San Bernardino, § 139, to employ the painter who employed plaintiff's decedent, was unauthorized, and the city was not liable for the death; decedent not having been invited on the premises, and being a mere licensee.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Hugh H. Craig, Judge.

Action by Flossie Good against the City of San Bernardino. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

William Guthrie, City Atty., and Ralph E. Swing, both of San Bernardino, for appellant.

Joseph Scott and A. G. Ritter, both of Los Angeles, and A. S. Maloney, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action wherein judgment has been rendered, pursuant to the verdict of a jury, against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff Flossie Good for the recovery of damages on account of the death of Hugh S. Good. Such death was alleged to have been caused by negligence of the defendant. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

As shown by the amended complaint, this action was prosecuted by said Flossie Good, together with Mrs. George Milligan and Joseph H. Good. Flossie Good was the wife of said Hugh S. Good. Mrs. George Milligan was his mother and Joseph H. Good was his father. It was alleged that deceased left no children or grandchildren surviving him, and that plaintiffs were his only heirs at law. The plaintiffs brought the action as such heirs, as permitted under provisions of section 377, Code of Civil Procedure. Section 236 of the charter of the city of San Bernardino (Stats. 1905, p. 977) provides that—

"No claim or demand of any kind whatever shall be the basis or ground for an action or proceeding against the city for the collection or on account thereof, unless a verified claim in writing, clearly specifying the item or items constituting such claim or demand shall be filed with the city clerk, or with the board or commission having jurisdiction to allow or reject the same, at least thirty days prior to the commencement of such action or proceeding."

It was shown by the evidence that more than 30 days prior to the commencement of this action the plaintiff, Flossie Good, filed with the city clerk a demand for the sum of $10,000, basing her said claim on the alleged negligence of the defendant resulting in the death of claimant's husband, the said Hugh S. Good, at the same time and place alleged in the complaint in this action. There being no evidence that any other claim or demand was ever filed or presented to the city, the defendant moved for a nonsuit and for the dismissal of the action, the motion being based upon the absence from the claim received in evidence, of any reference to the plaintiffs Mrs. George Milligan and Joseph H. Good. There were other grounds of the motion not pertinent to the point now under consideration. Upon the ground stated, the court sustained the motion as to the plaintiffs Mrs. George Milligan and Joseph H. Good, but denied the same as to the plaintiff Flossie Good.

[1] Appellant now claims that the right to maintain the action was joint and cannot be maintained by the widow alone; that when the action is not brought by the executor or administrator, but brought by the heirs of the deceased, then all of the heirs must join as plaintiffs, or those refusing to join must be made defendants. Code Civ. Proc. § 382. It is argued that this is a substantial defense, for the reason that the rendition of a judgment in favor of the widow alone would not relieve the defendant from its liability, if any, to the mother and father of the deceased. But since the mother and father of the deceased joined with the widow as plaintiffs in this action, we cannot see that her situation in this respect is any different from that which would have existed if the mother and father had refused to join in this action and if the widow for that reason, had made them defendants. Appellant, relying upon the rule that "a right created in favor of several persons, is presumed to be joint, and not several" (Civ. Code, § 1431), asserts that the plaintiff, Flossie Good, cannot maintain this action without first proving that the preliminary demand presented by her to the city was made not only on her own behalf but on behalf of the other heirs. Our attention is not directed to any decision directly determining this point. Taking into consideration the purposes of the charter provision, we are not prepared to say that a surviving heir who has presented a demand of the character here in question must lose her right of action merely because some other heir has neglected or refused to join in making such demand, or perhaps because it subsequently appears that there is another heir who was unknown at the time of the filing of her demand.

The complaint alleged that on the 17th day of August, 1917, while said Hugh S. Good was lawfully engaged in painting the interior of defendant's pumphouse, with the knowledge and consent of said defendant city, and while in the exercise of due care and caution, he came in contact with certain wires, etc., and was thereby injured by a powerful current of electricity then and there present in said wires, etc., resulting in his death on the same day. The negligence of defendant was alleged to consist in improper construction and installation of the apparatus; in failure to place danger signals; in failure to guard or screen the same from contact; in failure to properly operate, inspect and use said apparatus; in permitting said apparatus to become and remain in a defective condition by failure to properly inspect and protect the same; in permitting and allowing a high and dangerous current of electricity to pass through said wires, etc., without proper and sufficient insulation and protection; in failure to warn deceased of the dangerous character of said wires, etc.; in negligently failing to provide for said Hugh S. Good a safe and suitable place in which to work.

The provisions of the charter of the defendant placed the control of its water department in a board of water commissioners consisting of three members. The board is authorized "to employ and discharge at will such help as the necessities of the water service may demand." It is required that a record be kept of all proceedings of the board. Section 139 provides as follows:

"No claim for commodities furnished, or service performed, shall be valid unless prior to furnishing such commodities, or the rendition of the service, authority for the same had been given by the common council or some department of the city government having authority so to do. No member of the common council, or member of any department, and no city officer shall have power to create an indebtedness against the city, or to furnish the basis of a claim without said authority."

C. W. Smith was a member of the board of water commissioners. On or before the 16th day of August, Smith directed one Nick Codori, a painter, to go out to the Perris Hill pumping plant. The terms of employment are succinctly stated in Smith's testimony as follows:

"I employed him to go out there and do such painting as we would require; he was to get $4 a day and he furnish tools and brushes."

This is consistent with the testimony of Codori, which is the only other evidence on the subject. Codori worked at the plant on August 16th and returned to work on the following morning. On the morning of the 17th Hugh S. Good came to the pumping plant, and, after some conversation between them concerning the work to be done and the amount of wages to be paid, Codori directed Good to go to work. Thereafter they worked together until about 9 o'clock, when the accident happened. There is no evidence that the board of water commissioners employed either Codori or Good, or ordered the work to be done. There is no evidence that any member of the board of water commissioners or any official of the city, other than Smith, knew that the work was being done or that Codori was employed or was doing any work for the city. There is no evidence that Smith knew that Good was at the pumping plant or had been employed by any one to be there. The only evidence that any person connected in any way with the city had knowledge of Good's presence at the pumping plant is found in the testimony showing that Henry Maston, the engineer who was running the plant for the city, was there on the morning of the accident and knew that Good was there. But there is nothing in the nature of the employment of Maston which tends to show that he had any authority to represent the city in any dealings with either Codori or Good, or that he had anything to do with their presence there, other than that he did not prevent them from being there and did not interfere with the work which they were doing.

At the time of the accident Codori and Good were painting the ceiling of the room in which the electrical machinery was located. The ceiling was 12 feet above the floor. The wires through which the electricity came into the building, including all of the wiring alleged to have been unprotected and defectively insulated, came into the room near the ceiling and were not accessible from the floor. In order to reach the ceiling, Codori and Good had erected a platform by placing two boards at a height necessary for their purpose, resting one end of the boards upon a trestle and the other upon a transformer which was beneath the place where the wires in question were located. It was while standing on this platform that Good came in contact with the wires and received the injuries which caused his death.

[2] Under the circumstances above stated, the attempt of Smith to employ Codori was unauthorized. Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 96, 81 Am. Dec. 96; Reams v. Cooley, 171 Cal. 150, 152 Pac. 293, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 1200; Foxen v. Santa Barbara, 166 Cal. 77, 134 Pac. 1142; Gamewell Fire Alarm Tel. Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 187 Pac. 163. Moreover, the terms of Codori's employment, even if it could be held to have been authorized by the city, were such that his rights and duties were only those of a workman personally employed to work by the day. There was neither express nor implied authority of Codori to employ any other person to do that work or to assist in its performance. Therefore there is nothing shown in the transaction between Smith and Codori or between Codori and Good, which would even have the effect to place Good in the position of a licensee on the defendant's premises. The only possible thread upon which one might hang the proposition that Good was there as a licensee consists in the fact that the engineer, who seems to have been in charge of the pumping plant, knew that Good was there and did not exclude him from the premises. But there is no evidence of negligence amounting to failure to perform any duty imposed by law upon the owner of such premises in favor of a licensee. The rule applicable in such cases was stated by this court in Herold v. P. H. Mathews Paint House, 39 Cal. App. 489, 179 Pac. 414, as follows:

"We readily concede that a mere licensee cannot recover, where the injuries are caused solely by reason of the unsafe condition of the premises, and without any active or overt act of negligence committed against him by the occupant or owner of the premises. That rule, however, does not apply to a case where the licensee is upon the premises of a defendant, and is injured by an overt act of negligence committed against him by the defendant."

In the present case, however, there was not any overt act of any character done by the defendant or any of its agents. In going into the pumping plant Hugh S. Good took the risks of the premises as he found them. If his injuries and death were caused by the unsafe condition of the premises, they were caused solely by such unsafe condition. The evidence, however, does not even tend to prove that the position and condition of the wires carrying the alleged high-power current of electricity were such that they were dangerous to a person entering the place in an ordinary manner. The switches connecting those wires were placed at a height where they could not be reached from the floor. The uncontradicted evidence is that they were so placed for purposes of safety. By no stretch of the rules governing reasonable conduct can it be said that the defendant owed to the deceased any obligation to anticipate that he and Codori, or that either of them, would bring in materials for a platform and erect such platform by which they could climb up to the place of danger. It must be remembered that it was not shown and respondent does not claim that deceased was an employe of defendant city. Respondent's only claim is that deceased was employed upon defendant's premises engaged in a work for the benefit of defendant; that he was not a mere volunteer on the premises, nor trespasser, but was there by implied invitation for the purpose of doing the work for which he had been hired by Nick Codori. Upon the facts and for the reasons already indicated, we are satisfied that deceased was not impliedly or at all invited to be on said premises for the purpose of doing any work or for any purpose.

The judgment is reversed.

DEMATEIS v. VEZU. (Civ. 3350.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 5, 1920. Rehearing Denied Oct. 29, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 2, 1920.)

1. Bills and notes ⊂⊃392—Plaintiff, having no account with bank, was not entitled to notice of dishonor of check.

Where plaintiff drew on a bank in which he had no account a check for the initial payment on a contract, plaintiff was not entitled to notice of dishonor pursuant to Civ. Code, § 3195; there being no reason why plaintiff should have expected the check to be honored, though he did assert the contract was for the benefit of a corporation of which he was president, and which did have an account.

2. Sales ⊂⊃99—Seller's rescission on dishonor of buyer's check not fraudulent.

Where the check given by a buyer for initial payment on account of contract for the purchase of grapes was dishonored although it had been represented to be good, the act of the seller in rescinding the contract cannot be held fraudulent merely because the grapes meantime advanced in price.

3. Sales ⊂⊃104—Where check given by buyer was dishonored, return was not necessary to rescission.

Where a buyer gave for the initial payment a check on a bank in which he had no account, and the same was dishonored, the seller may rescind without returning the check, for the buyer could not be injuriously affected by the seller's retention of the check, where it was produced in court in an action for breach of contract.

4. Sales ⊂⊃104—That seller brings into court buyer's dishonored check warrants rescission.

Where the seller on the dishonor of a buyer's check rescinded, and on the buyer's action for breach of contract brought the check into court for cancellation, that was sufficient it not being necessary in such case to offer to return it sooner.

5. Sales ⊂⊃99—Nonpayment of sum specified in contract held to warrant rescission.

Where a contract for the sale of grapes declared that for and in consideration of the amount of $500, receipt of which was acknowledged, defendant agreed to sell to plaintiff grapes at a specified price, the fact that plaintiff's check for $500 was dishonored warranted defendant in repudiating the contract, even though the $500 payment be considered the first installment due under the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by G. Demateis against Frank Vezu. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank C. Prescott and Prescott & Prescott, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ralph E. Swing, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On the 15th day of April, 1918, the plaintiff, as party of the second part, and the defendant, as party of the first part, entered into a contract in writing which provided "that for and in consideration of the amount of $500, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged by the party of the first part," the party of the first part agreed to sell to the party of the second part, and the party of the second part agreed to buy a specified quantity and quality of grapes at a stated price per ton. "Payments are to be made as follows: The amount of $1,000 is payable on commencement of cutting and picking of the grapes; balance to be paid, half of the amount of grapes picked payable after same has been delivered, and the other half respectively. Balance due is payable when all the grapes are delivered." In his complaint, which was filed on the 3d day of July, 1918, the plaintiff alleged facts showing an attempted rescission of the contract by the defendant; alleged that the grapes would be ready for picking in the month of August, 1918, and not until then; alleged facts on which he relied as entitling him to specific performance; and demanded a decree of specific performance, or, in case such performance be impossible, that plaintiff have judgment against the defendant in the sum of $15,000 damages. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom.

The controversy centers about the circumstances attending the nonpayment of plaintiff's check for the sum of $500, delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant at the time of the execution and delivery of the contract. The check was drawn in favor of the defendant, and signed by the plaintiff personally. The plaintiff did not have at that time, nor at any of the times in question here, any personal account with the Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank, on which bank said check was drawn. He was in fact the president, and, according to the evidence, was the owner of all the stock of a corporation known as the Italian-American Vineyard Company, which corporation did have an account in said bank. But there is nothing in the contract, nor in any of the testimony concerning the transactions between the parties in connection with the making of the contract, tending to show that the sale was other than a sale of the grapes by the defendant to the plaintiff personally, or that the plaintiff agreed to or was expected to receive any check or money from the Italian-American Vineyard Company. Defendant having deposited said check with another bank, the same was in due course presented to the drawee bank, which refused payment. The court found:

"That notice of the nonpayment of said check was received by defendant on or about the 21st day of April, 1918; that defendant, believing that said plaintiff would call and make said check good, waited until the 9th day of May, 1918, for said plaintiff to do so; that on said 9th day of May, 1918, notice of the dishonor of said check was given to plaintiff; that thereafter defendant waited until the 16th day of May, 1918, for the plaintiff to make said check good; that said plaintiff not having made said check good and not having paid said consideration for said contract the said defendant on May 16, 1918, rescinded said contract and caused notice of such rescission to be given plaintiff."

The evidence is sufficient to sustain this finding, except possibly the finding that on the 9th day of May, 1918, notice of the dishonor of the check was given to the plaintiff. The only evidence of such notice on that day is found in the approved fact that on that day the plaintiff was informed by the wife of the defendant that payment of the check had been refused. In connection with defendant's rescission of the contract and at the time thereof, he did not offer to return to the plaintiff said dishonored check, but at the commencement of the trial of this action, the defendant produced the check in court, and asked that his indorsement thereon be canceled, and that the check be returned to the plaintiff. The plaintiff refused to receive said check, and it was filed with the clerk of the court, and there remains in evidence. On the 17th day of June, 1918, the plaintiff tendered to the defendant the sum of $500 in lawful money of the United States, in payment of the $500 consideration mentioned in said contract, and then and there demanded that defendant carry out said contract, which tender and demand were then and there refused by the defendant. The court found (and appellant does not attack this finding):

"That thereafter, to wit, on the 25th day of June, 1918, with the knowledge of plaintiff, defendant sold his crop of black grapes herein referred to, to the Italian Vineyard Company; that at said time said plaintiff was the owner of 131 shares of the capital stock of the said Italian Vineyard Company; that thereafter, to wit, on the 3d day of July, 1918, plaintiff herein instituted this action."

It should be noted that the Italian Vineyard Company mentioned in this finding is a different corporation from the Italian-

American Vineyard Company. The court found and the evidence proves that at the time of entering into the contract the plaintiff did so for the purpose of procuring said grapes for the use of the Italian-American Vineyard Company, and intended that said $500 check should be drawn against the account of that company, which company had on deposit with the bank money sufficient to meet the check; but the defendant did not know of such intention on the part of the plaintiff, and had no means of acquiring such knowledge. The court further found as follows:

"It is true that the market price of grapes advanced after the 15th day of April, 1918, but it is not true that such advance in said market price of grapes was the cause of defendant rescinding said agreement, but the said defendant in rescinding said agreement, acted in good faith and without regard to the price of such grapes, and without any intention to take any undue advantage of plaintiff, and it is true that defendant did, prior to the rescission of said contract, give plaintiff an opportunity to pay the said consideration for said contract, and that said plaintiff did not avail himself of such opportunity."

The foregoing is not a statement of all the issues tendered by the pleadings and determined by the decision of the trial court, but is sufficient to exhibit those elements of the case which are brought to our attention by appellant in the statement by his counsel of the grounds of appeal relied upon by him.

Appellant contends that the mistake in the check's signature was made by defendant's agent under circumstances that the defendant himself insisted upon. Assuming that the witness Castera, by whom the check was written out, was the agent of defendant, no negligence on the part of such agent is established by the evidence. The error, if any, was solely in the signature of the check, which signature was placed thereon by the plaintiff. If the plaintiff intended to draw this check on the account of the Italian-American Vineyard Company, that fact appears to have been known to him alone.

[1] Appellant next contends that he was entitled to notice of dishonor of the check in regular and due course, as upon any other bill of exchange, and that such notice was not given. Section 3195 of the Civil Code provides as follows:

"Notice of dishonor is not required to be given to the drawer in either of the following cases: * * * 4. Where the drawer has no right to expect or require that the drawee or acceptor will honor the instrument."

Since the plaintiff had no account with the bank on which the check was drawn, he had no right to expect or require that the same would be paid by that bank. The defendant, therefore, was not under obligation to give to the plaintiff any notice of dishonor of such check.

[2] Appellant next contends that the attempted rescission of the contract did not comply with the conditions required by section 1691 of the Civil Code, in that defendant did not rescind promptly upon discovering the facts which he claims entitle him to rescission, and, further, in that he did not restore, or offer to restore, to plaintiff the said check. Appellant claims that the attempted rescission was an act of bad faith, prompted by the fact that between the date of the contract and the date of rescission there was a great increase in the market price of black grapes. It is true that the market price of grapes advanced within the specified period of time; but this fact is not alone sufficient to compel a finding that such advance in the market price was the cause of defendant's rescission of the contract. The court found that the defendant acted in good faith, and that finding is well warranted by the evidence, which tends to prove that defendant rescinded the contract for the very definite and sufficient reason that the check, which he had received on the positive assurance that it was good and in consideration whereof he had delivered the contract, had been dishonored and had so remained for a period of nearly one month.

[3, 4] The rescission of the contract does not fail merely because at the time thereof defendant did not restore, or offer to restore, the dishonored check to the plaintiff. "There are exceptional cases where restoration, or an offer to restore, before suit brought, is not necessary—as, for instance, where the thing received by the plaintiff is of no value whatever to either of the parties; or where the plaintiff has merely received the individual promissory note of the defendant; or where the contract is absolutely void; or where it clearly appears that the defendant could not possibly have been injuriously affected by a failure to restore." Kelley v. Owens, 120 Cal. 502, 47 Pac. 369, 52 Pac. 797; California, etc., Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra, 151 Cal. 732, 738, 91 Pac. 593. In this case, under the facts as shown, the check was of no value and the plaintiff could not possibly have been injuriously affected by its retention in defendant's hands until the time when it was produced in court. Moreover, it has been held that on rescission of a contract of sale, where the defendant vendee had given his note as part of the original transaction, it was sufficient for the vendor to offer to surrender the note, even after action brought, and bring it into court to be canceled. Coghill v. Boring, 15 Cal. 213; Whyte v. Rosencrantz, 123 Cal. 634, 642, 56 Pac. 436, 69 Am. St. Rep. 90. Under this rule, it was sufficient in this case that the defendant brought into court the plaintiff's check and left it there for cancellation.

[5] Finally, it is claimed by appellant that the payments provided for by the contract were in separate installments, and that failure as to one of these alone would not constitute a breach of the entire contract. We will assume (although it is not entirely clear from the reading of the contract) that the $500 mentioned at the beginning of the contract was to be an installment of the purchase price, and not a separate consideration for the vendor's entry into the contract; nevertheless, we are of the opinion that the failure or refusal, without sufficient cause, by the buyer to make that payment, justified a repudiation of the contract by the seller. Los Angeles Gas, etc., Co. v. Amalgamated Oil Co., 156 Cal. 776, 781, 106 Pac. 55; California Sugar, etc., Agency v. Penoyar, 167 Cal. 274, 280, 139 Pac. 671.

Plaintiff's notice of appeal is a notice of appeal, not only from the judgment, but also from the order denying his motion for a new trial of the action. As there is not any right of appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial (Code Civ. Proc. § 963), that appeal is dismissed.

The judgment is affirmed.

COULDTHIRST et al. v. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. (Civ. 2128.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 11, 1920.)

1. Justices of the peace ⟸36(2)—Action to recover for stock killed by railroad on alleged private land involves title to land.

In a complaint for the killing of stock by a railroad brought under Civ. Code, § 485, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1281, the allegation that the plaintiffs were owners of the land along the railroad is material, so that the action involves title to land and is beyond the jurisdiction of a justice's court.

2. Justices of the peace ⟸75(1)—Answer unnecessary to remove cause where want of jurisdiction appears from complaint.

The provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 838, providing for transfer of a case from the justice court when it appears by verified answer that the title to land is involved, does not require a verified answer to defeat the jurisdiction of the justice, where it appears from the face of the complaint that title to land is involved.

3. Constitutional law ⟸56—Constitutional jurisdiction cannot be changed by legislation.

The legislature cannot change the jurisdiction conferred upon courts of the justices of the peace by the Constitution, though it may regulate the mode or manner in which the jurisdiction may be invoked or challenged.

4. Justices of the peace ⟸36(2)—Necessity of proving railroad was not on public lands defeats jurisdiction.

Even under Civ. Code, § 485, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1281, authorizing recovery for the killing of animals by railroads passing through private lands under circumstances different from killing by railroads passing through public lands, it is necessary for plaintiffs to prove that the land in question was not public land, which involves proof of title to land, so that the justice of the peace has no jurisdiction thereof.

5. Justices of the peace ⟸141(2)—Superior court on appeal has no jurisdiction if justice had none.

The superior court acquires no jurisdiction in a case appealed from a justice court if the justice of the peace had no jurisdiction.

6. Justices of the peace ⟸141(4) — Neither appellate nor Supreme Court have jurisdiction of action involving less than $300.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4, neither the appellate court nor the Supreme Court has appellate jurisdiction in action for killing stock involving less than $300; it being conceded that title to property was not involved.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Action by H. T. Couldthirst and others against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

F. A. Kelley, of Susanville, for appellants.
Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought in a justice court of Lassen county to recover damages for the killing of certain stock belonging to plaintiffs. The claim was based upon the provisions of section 485 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1281), requiring railroads to maintain fences on both sides of the railroad track and making them responsible for injury to stock caused by failure to observe said duty. A demurrer was interposed upon various grounds including the want of jurisdiction of the subject of the action and of the person of the defendant and the failure to state a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained upon the ground of the want of jurisdiction of the justice court, and the action was thereupon dismissed. Plaintiffs then appealed to the superior court "on questions of both law and fact." The superior court affirmed the judgment of the lower court sustaining said demurrer.

[1] Among the allegations of the amended complaint is the following:

"That plaintiffs for several years last past have been and now are the owners of the following described land, situate, lying and being in Lassen county, state of California and more particularly described as follows, to wit" (said property being described therein).

The ownership of real property was thus put in issue by the complaint, and, if it was necessarily involved in the determination of the cause, it would follow that the justice court had no jurisdiction to try the action. Section 838, Code Civ. Proc. Indeed it has been decided that the action brought under said section 485 of the Civil Code does necessarily involve the ownership or possession of real property, and therefore a justice court has no jurisdiction to try such action. Wills v. Southern Pacific Co., 31 Cal. App. 723, 161 Pac. 501; Holman v. Taylor, 31 Cal. 338; Boyd v. Southern California Ry. Co., 126 Cal. 571, 58 Pac. 1046.

[2, 3] Nor was it necessary for the defendant to raise the question by filing a verified answer as specified in said section 838 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That is required only when the want of jurisdiction does not appear on the face of the complaint. Herein, however, it was expressly alleged by the plaintiffs that they were the owners of said real property, and, this being a material allegation in an action brought under said section of the Civil Code, advantage could be taken of it by filing a demurrer. It cannot, of course, be disputed that the defendant could not by failure to file an answer clothe the justice court with the jurisdiction which it is denied by the Constitution. King v. Kutner-Goldstein Co., 135 Cal. 65, 67 Pac. 10. Manifestly, the Legislature itself could not change the jurisdiction that has been conferred upon the various courts by the Constitution, although it may regulate the mode or manner in which the jurisdiction of a court may be invoked or challenged.

[4] It is true, as pointed out by respondent, that the decisions of the appellate courts specifically holding that the justice court has no jurisdiction of actions brought under said section 485 of the Civil Code were rendered before said section was amended in 1915. But there can be no doubt that the title, possession, or right of possession is equally involved under said section as amended. The effect of the law is not changed in that respect, since, in order to recover under the amended section, it is incumbent upon the plaintiffs to show that the loss or injury to his live stock happened along some portion of the railroad's right of way not running through or upon public lands, that is, in other words, at a place where the adjoining lands were in private ownership or possession.

[5] It appearing that the justice court was without jurisdiction to try the cause, it was entirely proper for the superior court on appeal to affirm said judgment. There could be no trial in the superior court, since its jurisdiction is entirely derivative, and, the justice of the peace having no jurisdiction, the superior court acquires none by the appeal. Ballerino v. Bigelow, 90 Cal. 500, 27 Pac. 372; Null v. Superior Court, 4 Cal. App. 207, 87 Pac. 392; Bates v. Ferrier, 19 Cal. App. 79, 124 Pac. 889; Bartnett v. Hull, 19 Cal. App. 91, 124 Pac. 885.

[6] The case, of course, is distinguishable from such decisions as City of Madera v. Black, 184 Pac. 397, where the parties appeared in the superior court and submitted to trial without objecting to jurisdiction or to the irregular manner in which the case may have reached the superior court. Moreover, if we concede that plaintiffs are right in their contention that the case does not involve title to or right of possession of real property, and that it is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the justice court since the amount sued for was less than $300, then it would necessarily follow that this court as well as the supreme court has no jurisdiction to entertain this appeal. Neither of said tribunals is given jurisdiction of an appeal in a case such as the appellants claim this one to be. Const. of Cal., art. 6, § 4; Willow Land Co. v. Goldschmidt, 11 Cal. App. 297, 104 Pac. 841; Edsall v. Short, 122 Cal. 533, 55 Pac. 327.

In any view of the case, it seems clear that this court cannot grant plaintiffs any relief in this proceeding.

The judgment is affirmed.

WATSON v. PRYOR. (Civ. 2198.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 11, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸373(1)—One undertaking on appeal from several orders insufficient.

In supplementary proceedings, where no final order was entered, and where there was but one notice of appeal, reciting that the appeal was "from the orders made after judgment in said action, refusing to permit plaintiff to examine defendant upon proceedings supplementary to execution concerning the owership by defendant, of property, real or personal, and of assets belouging to him, which said orders were made and entered * * * in words and figures following," and enumerating 18 rulings as orders appealed from, the appeal was from the 18 rulings, and not from one order, and because of appellant's failure to file more than one undertaking will be dismissed.

2. Appeal and error ⟸391(2)—Appeal from 18 rulings, not under alternative method, in which only one undertaking has been filed, will be dismissed.

Appeal from 18 separate rulings, not taken under the alternative method in which only one undertaking has been filed, will be dismissed, since in such case no new or amended undertakings can be filed.

3. Appeal and error ⟸225—Objection to examination in supplementary proceedings must be made below.

That examination of defendant on a second supplementary proceeding hearing related to matters as to which he was examined on the first hearing cannot be made for the first time on appeal.

4. Execution ⟸380—Second examination in supplementary proceedings discretionary with court.

It is discretionary with the court to permit a second examination in supplementary proceedings.

5. Execution ⟸397—Debtor in supplementary proceedings may be examined as to property in another state.

A creditor is entitled to examine debtor on supplementary proceedings as to property situated in another state.

6. Appeal and error ⟸82(5)—Rulings on evidence in supplementary proceedings held not appealable as "special order made after final judgment."

An appeal will not lie from 18 separate rulings on the admissibility of proposed evidence in supplementary proceedings in which there was no final order entered, under Code Civ. Proc. § 719; such rulings not being "special orders made after final judgment," within section 963.

7. Appeal and error ⟸116—Orders in supplementary proceedings appealable only in cases provided by law.

Proceedings supplemental to execution are a substitute for a creditor's bill, and while they are not separate actions, they are separate proceedings in an original action and appeals lie from orders therein only in the cases provided by law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; James F. Lodge, Judge.

Action by W. S. Watson against Thomas D. Pryor. From 18 orders made in proceedings supplemental to execution, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Peck, Bunker & Cole and C. D. Dethlefsen, all of Oakland, for appellant.

Taylor & Tebbe, of Yreka, for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Judge pro tem. In this case the plaintiff and appellant appeals from 18 orders, made by the lower court on proceedings supplemental to execution. But one notice of appeal was given. The clerk certifies that "an undertaking on appeal in due form has been properly filed in the foregoing action."

[1] The defendant and respondent insists that, as there were 18 appeals and but one undertaking, the appeals must be dismissed, and he cites authorities which sustain his position. People v. Center, 61 Cal. 191; Home, etc., v. Wilkins, 71 Cal. 626, 12 Pac. 799; Meley v. Boulon, 104 Cal. 262, 37 Pac. 931. The appellant does not controvert the soundness of these authorities, but he seeks to avoid their effect by claiming that his appeal is from but one order, to wit, a certain ruling or order made by the court in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence, wherein the court used this language:

"I am inclined to the opinion that the examination should be confined to the property Mr. Pryor may have acquired since the prior examination."

This is clearly a ruling upon the admissibility of proposed evidence, and is one of some 28 similar rulings. No final judgment or order was made or entered by the court adjudicating the rights of either party, and the appeals are from 18 of above 28 rulings. All the rulings appealed from are described in one notice of appeal, and are referred to therein as follows:

"Appeals to the Supreme Court of the state of California from the orders made after judgment in said action, refusing to permit plaintiff to examine defendant upon proceedings supplementary to execution concerning the ownership by defendant, of property, real or personal, and of assets belonging to him, which said orders were made and entered * * * in words and figures following to wit."

Then follows at length an enumeration of 18 rulings from which the appeal is taken.

[2] 1. It is not claimed that the appeal is taken under the alternative method. If it was not so taken, then it follows from the authorities above cited that no new or amended undertakings can be filed, and the appeal must be dismissed.

[3, 4] 2. But conceding that this court may go beyond the claim of the appellant, and hold that the appeal is taken under the alternative method, the appellant is placed in no more favorable position. It appears from the statement of the court in his ruling embraced in the first-numbered exception that the defendant had once before been subjected to an examination upon the same matter. No objection was made at the time as to the truth of this statement, and, clearly, the examination was conducted upon the assumption that such prior examination had been had. Even if the mere statement of the court is an unsatisfactory method of showing the fact, still, the proceeding having been conducted upon that assumption, it is too late to raise the point for the first time on appeal. It is well settled, both in this state and elsewhere, that it is in the discretion of the court to permit a second examination. Freeman on Executions, § 406a; 12 Encyclopedia of Evidence, 237. The following California cases conclusively dispose of the matter:

"It has been held that after such examination has been had and the creditor has been given the privilege of fully examining his debtor as to the latter's property, he cannot subject him to a second examination without disclosing to the court some new facts, such as that other facts have become known to the creditor of which he was not apprised at the former examination, or matters of like kind. Our Supreme Court has determined that an order made at the conclusion of such a proceeding will be res adjudicata as to all matters properly therein involved and considered." People v. McKamy, 28 Cal. App. 196, 151 Pac. 743.

"The judgment creditor and debtor are parties to the proceeding, and each is at liberty to call and examine witnesses in respect to any contested fact which may be brought in issue in the course of the proceeding. If the parties to such a proceeding, as between themselves and their privies, are not estopped from again litigating the same matters in another form of action, the whole proceeding would be but a judicial farce, accomplishing no useful end." McCullough v. Clark, 41 Cal. 298.

In the last case the affidavit contained a defect similar to the defect in the affidavit in the case at bar, in that it failed to set out any new or additional facts in support of a second examination.

[5] 3. It is clear that a creditor is entitled to examine his debtor as to property situated in another state. Freeman on Executions, § 394, and many authorities there cited; McGee v. McSweeney, 84 Cal. 100, 23 Pac. 1117; Tomlinson v. Webster Mfg. Co. (C. C.) 34 Fed. 381. Nevertheless, the trial court committed no error in refusing permission to conduct a second examination: First, because the affidavit upon which the same was based is insufficient; and, secondly, the right to a second examination rests in the sound discretion of the trial court, subject only to the limitation as to its abuse.

[6] 4. The rulings in question are not appealable. No final judgment was entered in the matter as contemplated by section 719 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the court entered no final order determining any right or liability. Mere rulings upon the admissibility of proposed evidence are not orders within the meaning of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure as "special orders made after final judgment."

The court, in discussing the character of orders that are deemed excepted to under section 647 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in McGuire v. Drew, 83 Cal. 225, 23 Pac. 312, uses the following language:

"We do not understand that a ruling made during the progress of a trial, either admitting or rejecting evidence, is an order within the meaning of above section. By section 1003 of the Code of Civil Procedure, an order is defined as follows: 'Every direction of a court or judge, made or entered in writing and not included in a judgment, is denominated an order. An application for an order is a motion.'"

[7] The examination of the judgment debtor is not, in itself, an end, but is one of the steps in the means to an end, and errors committed in the course of the examination are not reviewable on appeal until the end sought by the proceeding has been first crystallized into a final order granting or denying the proposed relief or dismissing the proceeding. "The order appealed from is not a special order made after final judgment, within the meaning of subdivision 2 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, although it was made subsequent to the entry of judgment. It in no manner affected the judgment or bore any relation to it, either by way of enforcing it or staying its operation. Neither is it a final determination of any matter affecting the appellant in the proceeding in the court in which it was made." Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 136 Cal. 676, 69 Pac. 497. This authority is peculiarly applicable to the matter now under examination. The rulings complained of neither added to nor substracted from the relief granted in the judgment, nor did they adjudicate any rights or establish any liabilities. Proceedings supplemental to execution are a substitute for a creditor's bill, and, while they are not separate action (Collins v. Angell, 72 Cal. 513, 14 Pac. 135), they are, nevertheless, separate proceedings in an original action (Bryant v. Bank of California, 7 Pac. 128),[1] and appeals lie from orders therein only in the cases provided by law. The 18 rulings above mentioned are not within this class.

Whether the appellant is entitled to any appropriate relief without the entry of some final order, or in case the court declines to enter a final order, need not at this time be discussed.

The appeal is dismissed.

PEOPLE v. ADKINS. (Cr. 519.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 11, 1920.)

1. Homicide ⟸276—Self-defense held for jury.

The question of self-defense in homicide prosecution held for jury.

2. Criminal law ⟸1159(3)—Verdict on conflicting evidence conclusive.

A verdict on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

3. Criminal law ⟸1037(2)—Absence of request for instruction to disregard improper remarks precludes review.

In absence of request that court direct jury to disregard improper remarks of prosecutor, defendant cannot complain thereof on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

John A. Adkins was convicted of manslaughter, and from judgment of conviction and order denying new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

H. E. Manning and Thomas J. Horan, both of Vallejo, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NICOL, Presiding Justice, pro tem. Defendant was informed against by the district attorney of Solano county for the crime of murder. He was thereupon tried and convicted of manslaughter, and he prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

It appears from the evidence that on the evening of November 16, 1919, the defendant in the company of Bessie A. Hamilton, Hazel Chapman, and Walter W. Foster, were present at a roadhouse known as Monreal's place, situated about two miles outside of the city of Vallejo. Defendant and his party engaged in dancing for about an hour and a half when the deceased, Charles Denio, with his wife, Martha Denio, and his brother-in-law, Stewart B. Reynolds, and the wife of Stewart B. Reynolds, entered the dance hall and took a table which was unoccupied and had accommodations for four, and said deceased and his party took seats thereat; that shortly thereafter the defendant left his seat and proceeded to the deceased's table, where at the time were seated Mr. and Mrs. Stewart B. Reynolds, the deceased and his wife having left the table and not being present at the time, and asked Mrs. Reynolds, to whom he was a stranger, to dance with him. Mrs. Reynolds testified that in reply to his request that she dance with him she said, "No thank you, I do not dance with anybody but my own party," and that the defendant swore at her. The defendant testified that when he asked her to dance with him she threw the contents of a glass in his face. The deceased having returned, a quarrel ensued over this occurrence, between the defendant and Reynolds and the deceased, which terminated in the shooting which caused the death of the said Charles Denio.

The defendant claims that when he fired the fatal shot that caused the death of the said Charles Denio he was acting in necessary self-defense and to repel a dangerous and violent attack then being made upon him by the said Charles Denio and his brother-in-law Stewart B. Reynolds.

Mrs. Martha Denio, the wife of the deceased, testified that, at the time deceased was shot by defendant, deceased was "standing beside me. We were standing about 15 or 20 feet from Mr. Adkins, watching him struggling with the women of his party, one of whom he kicked to the floor, and then pointed his revolver and shot my husband." On cross-examination this witness testified that she and deceased were just standing there and defendant was struggling with some of the women of his party and kicked one of them to the floor and then pointed his gun at deceased and shot; that there was no man near the defendant at the time, just the two women. It was shown by the testimony of the examining physician that there were no powder burns on the body of the deceased.

[1, 2] It was the province of the jury to determine the question whether or not the evidence supported defendant's claim that at the time of the shooting he was acting in necessary self-defense. It was for the jury to say whether or not the story of the defendant should be believed, and the evidence being conflicting the verdict of the jury is final and conclusive. People v. Rongo, 169 Cal. 71, 145 Pac. 1017. "Since our appellate jurisdiction extends only to questions of law, we must accept as proven the facts as detailed by the witnesses for the state." People v. Moore, 155 Cal. 237, 238, 100 Pac. 688.

The appellant contends that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct during his argument to the jury. The alleged misconduct consisted in his reading to the jury during his argument a certain article written by James A. Johnston, warden of San Quentin penitentiary, as to the evils of persons carrying concealed weapons.

[3] There is nothing in the point of this alleged misconduct of the district attorney. Conceding that the reading of the article was improper, there was no request made that the court direct the jury to disregard the same, and hence the appellant cannot now complain. People v. Shears, 133 Cal. 154, 65 Pac. 295; People v. Ye Foo, 4 Cal.

App. 730, 89 Pac. 450; People v. Kramer, 117 Cal. 647, 49 Pac. 842; People v. Beaver, 83 Cal. 419, 23 Pac. 321; People v. Vickroy, 182 Pac. 764.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

CITY OF SAN DIEGO v. KERCKHOFF et al. (Civ. 3364.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 5, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 2, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸1052(8), 1071(1)—Error in admission of evidence harmless.

Where plaintiff in no event could recover, errors in findings or the admission of evidence were harmless.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸680, 681(1)—Where powers of council were enumerated, they should be strictly construed.

Where a city charter specified the powers of the council with respect to granting franchises to steam, street, and interurban railroads to use the streets, the charter provisions should be strictly construed in favor of the city.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸680, 681(1)—Enumeration of powers excludes those not specified.

Where the powers of the city council to grant franchises to steam, street, and interurban railroads to use the streets were enumerated, all powers not enumerated were excluded.

4. Municipal corporations ⟸79—Charter governs over general act in respect to street railroads.

The granting of franchises for street railroads being a municipal affair, the charter provisions of San Diego, relating thereto, will govern over the Broughton Act, but with respect to franchises for interurban railroads as to which the city charter is silent the act governs.

5. Municipal corporations ⟸683(2)—Act relating to granting of franchises not grant of any right, though preventing grant except on competitive bidding.

The Broughton Act, declaring that every franchise or privilege to construct or operate street or interurban railroad on any public street or highway shall be granted on competitive bidding, is not the grant of any right or franchise, though it does prevent the grant of any such right except on competitive bidding.

6. Municipal corporations ⟸683(2)—Franchise granted by city invalid because granted without competitive bidding.

San Diego Charter, art. 2, c. 2, § 1, subds. 46, 47, and section 9, provide that the council shall have the authority to grant franchises to lay street railroad tracks over streets of the city, and to allow any railroad company or corporation to enter the city, but that the council shall not grant authority to construct street railway, except on competitive bidding, etc. In 1907 the council granted to individuals the right to construct railroad tracks on, over, along, and across highways, etc. The Broughton Act of 1905, then in force, declares that every franchise or privilege to construct or operate street or interurban railroads, etc., except steam railroads, shall be granted on competitive bidding. Civ. Code, §§ 454–494, relate to the organization of railroad companies known generally to the courts as steam railroads, while other sections deal with street railroad companies. Held that, though Const. art. 11, § 11, gives each city the power to enforce local police regulations, and notwithstanding the grant authorized the use of any sort of power, the franchise must be deemed invalid, as there was no compliance with the charter provision as to competitive bidding, for the council, being without authority to charter a railroad company, the franchise, which was to individuals, must be deemed for a street or interurban road.

7. Municipal corporations ⟸683(3)—City held to have burden of showing validity of franchise in suit on bond given on grant of franchise.

Where a city was asserting the validity of franchise so as to recover on a bond given by the grantees thereof, it has the burden of showing that the franchise came within the exception of the Broughton Act so as to be valid.

8. Municipal corporations ⟸682(3)—City council held not to have power to grant perpetual right of way.

Where a city charter authorized the council to provide for the sale and conveyance, or lease of all land not dedicated or reserved for public use, the council was without authority to grant, without consideration, a perpetual right of way over public property.

9. Municipal corporations ⟸683(3)—Where franchise was invalid, no action can be maintained on bond.

Where a franchise for the construction of a railroad on municipal streets was invalid, no action can be maintained on a bond given for performance thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by the City of San Diego, a municipal corporation, against William G. Kerckhoff and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

S. J. Higgins, City Atty., Arthur F. H. Wright, Deputy City Atty., and N. S. Hammack, all of San Diego, for appellant.

O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover the sum of $50,000 on a bond given to insure the performance of the terms and conditions of a certain franchise for the construction of a railroad in the city of San Diego. The plaintiff alleged the granting of the franchise by ordinance of the common council approved April 11, 1907, the acceptance by the grantees, the deposit of a check in the sum of $25,000 to insure the faithful performance of the terms and conditions of the contract, the return of the check by the common council upon the filing of the bond in suit, and the breach of the conditions of the bond. The amended answer, among other defenses, alleged that the bond was without consideration because the franchise which was granted by the common council was illegal and void, and put in issue the entire question of the validity of the franchise. The trial court failed to find upon the question of want of consideration, but did find that the franchise was granted substantially in the manner alleged in the complaint. The conclusion of law is merely that the defendants are entitled to judgment; but, if the facts found to be true are such as will lead to but one legal conclusion, this court may draw that conclusion without reversing the case for a new trial.

[1] Appellant makes a great many objections to the findings made and the court's failure to find upon issues which are claimed to be material, and also makes numerous assignments of error in the rulings of the trial court on the admission of evidence. An examination of the entire record fails to present a case where the asserted errors have resulted in a miscarriage of justice; and, as plaintiff could not recover on the bond in view of the invalidity of the franchise, as hereinafter pointed out, it would serve no purpose to return the case to the trial court on account of any of the asserted errors or to give further consideration to them here.

The attack upon the franchise is made upon two grounds: (1) That the common council did not comply with the restrictions of the charter of the city of San Diego or of the state law in making the grant; and (2) that public property of the city was given to the grantees without compensation and in violation of the express provisions of the municipal charter.

The provisions of the municipal charter relating to the granting of franchises are contained in article 2, chapter 2, section 1, subdivisions 46 and 47, and in section 9 of the same chapter, reading as follows:

Subd. 46. "To grant authority for a term not exceeding twenty-five years to construct street railways and lay down street railroad tracks upon or over any of the streets of said city, upon which cars may be propelled by horses, mules, steam, or other motive power, or by wire ropes running under the streets and moved by stationary engines, and on such conditions as may be required by this charter, or by ordinance, and from time to time to establish, alter, and regulate the rates of fare to be charged by any person, company, or corporation to which such authority may be granted." Stats. 1905, p. 908.

Subd. 47. "To allow any railroad company or corporation to enter said city, and make its way to the water front at the most convenient point for public convenience; but no exclusive right, franchise, or privilege shall be granted to such railroad company; and the use of all such rights, privileges,and franchises shall at all times be subject to regulation by the common council. Every ordinance granting such right, privilege, or franchise shall be upon the conditions that said company or corporation shall pave and keep in repair the street between the rails of each track, and also between the tracks, and for at least two feet on each side of the same, including switches, turnouts, and side tracks, and that said company or corporation shall allow any railroad company or corporation to which a similar right, privilege, or franchise may be granted, to use in common with it the same track or tracks upon such terms as the common council shall determine." Stats. 1889, p. 655.

Sec. 9. "The common council shall not grant authority to construct a street railway or lay down street railroad tracks upon or over any of the streets of said city except in the manner and on the terms following, viz. [Here follow provisions for the filing of an application, publication of notice thereof, invitation for bids, and the award to the best bidder.]" Stats. 1889, p. 658.

The franchise granted to two individuals the right to construct "a railway track or tracks together with all necessary side tracks, turnouts and switches, and any and all other things necessary and incident to railway construction, maintenance and operation, through, over, across, upon and along any and all public avenues, plazas, streets, alleys, highways and pueblo, tide, submerged and overflow or other lands belonging to the city of San Diego on the general route hereinafter described, and to use, maintain and operate said railway by steam, electricity or other motive power."

The trial court having found that the city suffered no damage from the abandonment of the franchise, the question is whether the city may still exact the penalty of the bond if no consideration passed to the grantees and no injury was suffered by the city. The attack upon the franchise goes to the manner in which it was granted. The argument is that, as the mode is the measure of the power, a grant which is not made in accordance with the prescribed mode is void. Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 96, 101, 81 Am. Dec. 96; Pac. Elec. Ry. Co. v. Los Angeles (C. C.) 118 Fed. 746, 753.

It cannot be ascertained from the franchise whether the grant covered the right to construct and maintain a street railroad, an interurban line, or a commercial steam railroad. It is conceded that the council did not comply with the provisions of section 9, and that if the right to construct and maintain a street railroad was given the franchise is void. On behalf of appellant it is argued that the council intended to grant a franchise to construct and maintain a steam railroad, because the grantees were authorized to operate the road "by steam, electricity or other motive power." On behalf of respondents it is argued that the franchise contemplated either a street railway or an interurban line, and that, if the former, the franchise was void for noncompliance with the provisions of section 9 of the charter, quoted above, and, if the latter, it was void for noncompliance with the act of March 22, 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 777), commonly known as the Broughton Act.

[2, 3] The argument of appellant is that the council found its power to grant the franchise in the provisions of section 47, which reads, in part:

"To allow any railroad company or corporation to enter said city, and make its way to the waterfront."

Inasmuch as the powers of the council are enumerated at length in the charter, it must follow that the municipality has withheld from the council power to dispose of its streets and other public property except to such extent and in such manner as may be specified in the charter. These powers being inherent in the city as a matter of municipal affair, the provisions of the charter must be strictly construed in favor of the city. So construing them, it follows that the council is authorized to allow a railroad company or corporation to enter the city, either for the purpose of finding a terminus there or for the purpose of passing through the city to reach another terminus. This is in consonance with the decision of the Supreme Court in People v. Craycroft, 111 Cal. 544, 44 Pac. 463, wherein it was held that the provisions of the act of March 23, 1893 (Stats. 1893, p. 288), prescribing the terms and conditions upon which a franchise might be granted "to construct or operate railroads along or upon any public street," did not apply to a steam railroad which must pass through a city or town in order to construct and operate is road between fixed termini.

[4-7] The provisions of the Broughton Act, as in force at the time the franchise was granted were, generally, that—

"Every franchise or privilege * * * to construct or operate street or interurban railroads upon any public street or highway, * * * or to exercise any other privilege whatever, * * * except steam railroads, * * * shall be granted upon the conditions in this act provided, and not otherwise." Stats. 1905, p. 777.

The sections following provide in detail a plan for letting such franchises upon competitive bidding. Wherever this act had not been made inapplicable by conflicting charter provisions, the council could not grant a franchise to construct or operate a street or interurban railroad, or any other privilege except a steam railroad, without competitive bidding. Any franchise granted otherwise would be void.

The history of this legislation shows that the original act of 1893 read:

"Every franchise or privilege to * * * construct or operate railroads * * * or to exercise any other privilege whatever." Stats. 1893, p. 288.

In March, 1896, the Supreme Court, in People v. Craycroft, supra, held that the act did not apply to a commercial railroad desiring "to make a connection through the town of those portions of its road extending upon either side of the town to its opposite termini." In this connection the court said:

"The builder of the road must own and operate the whole line; the right to do so is part of its corporate franchise, and how is it possible that any other person or corporation can acquire the right to construct, and own and operate, as a distinct and independent road and franchise, that part of the road necessary to connect its two ends? This law was not intended to apply to such a case, but only to those cases—as of street railroads—in which bona fide competition is possible."

And again:

"It is the policy of this state to encourage the building of railroads, and a corporation complying with the statutory prerequisites acquires, among other things, the right to construct and operate its road between the termini named in its articles of incorporation. In the exercise of this right it may pass through cities and towns along its route, if they are willing to grant the privilege."

Immediately following this decision the Legislature, in 1897, amended section 1 of the Broughton Act to read in part as follows:

"Every franchise or privilege * * * to construct or operate street railroads * * * or to exercise any other privilege whatever * * * except steam railroads." Stats. 1897, p. 135.

This act was superseded by the act of 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 265), which in turn was amended in 1903 (Stats. 1903, p. 90), but without material change. In 1905 the act in force when the franchise was granted superseded the earlier act, and for the first time included interurban railroads in the franchise restrictions.

In view of this legislation and the rule of the Supreme Court, as announced in the Craycroft Case, it cannot be doubted that, unless controlled by charter provisions to the contrary, no city could grant without competition a franchise for any privilege to construct or operate a railroad within its limits, unless such railroad came within the meaning of a "steam railroad" as that term is used in the act and explained in the decision of the court. The exception contained in the act having been inserted immediately following the court's decision, it would seem apparent the the Legislature had reference to the character of railroad covered by the decision—that is to say, a commercial railroad for the carrying of passengers and freight over a private right of way between fixed termini, without regard to the motive power, but running for some distance at least outside of city limits—such a road as that contemplated by the sections of the Civil Code, 454–494, inclusive. These sections, it will be noted, come under title 3, headed "Railroad Corporations," chapter 1 of which relates to "Officers and Corporate Stock," chapter 2, "Enumeration of Powers," and chapter 3, "Business, How Conducted." Title 4, including sections 497–511, is headed "Street Railroad Corporations," showing a clear intention on the part of the Legislature to distinguish between these two enterprises. The interurban railroads, which were included in the Broughton Act of 1905, are not mentioned in the Code, but were treated by the Supreme Court in S. F., etc., Ry. Co. v. Scott, 142 Cal. 222, 232, 75 Pac. 575, 583, where the court said:

"There has recently come into existence a certain class of railroads, known as interurban roads, which are a sort of hybrid, having in some respects the characteristics of the ordinary railroad, and in others those of the street railroad. Within the limits of the cities which they enter they usually pass along the streets, and perform the ordinary functions of street railroads, stopping where desired to let passengers on or off, and serving the public need for local street travel. Outside the cities, on their way from one city or town to another, they frequently travel upon a roadway obtained from private persons, not upon a public road, and stop, as in case of ordinary railroads, only at stations established by them for that purpose. They also often convey freight as well as passengers."

The decision in the Scott Case was rendered in February, 1904, and, no doubt, accounts for the inclusion of interurban railroads in the act of March, 1905, above noted. The court expressly declined to determine whether such a road was to be classed as a street railroad or as an "ordinary railroad," but did decide that when a "franchise" had been granted to construct and operate a railroad over designated public streets within the city, though the line continued outside the city to a terminus in another county, it was nevertheless a street railroad, and not subject to the jurisdiction of the state board of equalization for taxation purposes.

As has heretofore been stated, the municipal charter of San Diego covered the subject of granting franchises for street railroads at the time respondents' grant was made. That subject being a municipal affair, the charter provisions controlled over the Broughton Act. (Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Pasadena, 161 Cal. 265, 282, 118 Pac. 796. If the franchise was for the operation of an interurban railroad, the Broughton Act controlled, because on that subject the municipal charter was silent. Clouse v. San Diego, 159 Cal. 434, 437, 114 Pac. 573. It is conceded that neither the charter nor the Broughton Act was followed in so far as they relate to street or interurban railroads. The case of appellant then rests upon the argument that a steam railroad franchise was granted. Bearing in mind that the motive power is not the determining factor, an examination of the record fails to disclose anything which would indicate that the character of railroad contemplated in the exception in the Broughton Act or in subdivision 47 of the charter was intended. The ordinance purported to grant a franchise coupled with a perpetual right of way over certain public property. The franchise of a street railroad finds its origin in the action of the municipality—it is a contract between the city and the grantee. The franchise of the ordinary steam railroad comes from the Civil Code, § 465, which gives to every railroad corporation power to lay out its road and to construct and maintain the same across, along, or upon any street, avenue, or highway. By section 470, Civil Code, the consent of the city authorities must be had to use the streets in an incorporated city, but this consent is more in the nature of a permit than a franchise. The distinction is clearly drawn by the Supreme Court in S. F., etc., Ry. Co. v. Scott, 142 Cal. 222, 228, 75 Pac. 575, 581, where it is said:

"In the case of an ordinary railroad the right which it may acquire to operate its road along a public street is, strictly speaking, a mere right of way, similar to the right it may acquire from landowners along the route. It is a part of its roadway, and not a part of the franchise, within the meaning of the word in the phrase in question. It imposes no implied obligation upon the grantee or donee to facilitate the local public use of the street by carrying persons from place to place thereon. The right which a street railroad obtains from the city to lay its track and operate its road on a street, on the contrary, is the most valuable part of its franchise. It carries the obligation to serve the public in the use of the street, and is in furtherance of the original use. It does not receive this franchise by becoming incorporated, as an ordinary road receives its franchise to operate its road between its termini, but obtains it afterward by special grant from the municipality, and the thing thus obtained includes both the roadway and the franchise."

The framers of the San Diego charter recognized this distinction in the enactment of subdivision 47, which reads in part:

"To allow any railroad company or corporation to enter said city, and make its way to the water front at the most convenient point for public convenience."

The franchise of a street railway is limited by subdivision 46 to 25 years. A railroad company may, so far as the charter is concerned, be allowed to enter the city for an unlimited time. By subdivision 46 a street railroad franchise may be granted to "any person, company or corporation"; by subdivision 47 the right to enter the city may be granted to "any railroad company or corporation." In the case of the former the franchise can be granted only after bids have been received in accordance with notice given; as to the latter, the permit may be given without these restrictions. Reading subdivision 47 of the charter with the sections of the Civil Code relating to railroad corporations sections 454–494 and sections 291 and 292 relating to the amount of capital stock of a railroad corporation which must be subscribed and paid into the treasury), the only reasonable interpretation of the charter section is that, when a railroad corporation has complied with the general law and obtained a franchise under Civil Code, § 465, the common council may permit it to enter the city of San Diego and make its way to the water front. The evident purpose of the charter framers in omitting the word "person" from this subdivision was to withhold that privilege from all individuals who had not brought themselves under the restrictions and the limitations of the Code sections. The franchise was granted for an unlimited term to two individuals who did not constitute either a company or a corporation. It was not authorized by the charter. Appellant argues that the council found its power in section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution, which gives to each city power to enforce local police regulations. But by this same section the exercise of such power is limited to such regulations as are "not in conflict with general laws." Thus, if the charter is silent upon the matter, and the general laws prescribe the mode by which the power may be exercised, the grant contained in the Constitution is limited to that extent.

That the Broughton Act itself is not a grant of any right or franchise cannot be disputed. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Pasadena, supra, 272. But it prevented the granting of any privilege included in its terms in any other manner than that prescribed. McGinnis v. Mayor, 153 Cal. 711, 96 Pac. 367. Section 465, Civil Code, is a grant to railroad corporations; section 470, Civil Code, is a limitation upon such grant, but is not in itself a grant of power to the city or of any right or privilege to the corporations; subdivision 47 of the charter is a limited grant of power to the city. It does not, however, refer to "steam railroads" and is not in conflict with the Broughton Act.

There was therefore no express statutory or charter grant of power to give a franchise to individuals for such a railroad as that contemplated by the ordinance without competition. If the power existed by implication, it was nevertheless limited by the provisions of the Broughton Act, because the franchise was one "to exercise any other privilege" within the meaning of the act. If the privilege sought was for a "steam railroad" within the exception of the Broughton Act, the power of the city was limited by subdivision 47 of the charter to the right to grant the privilege to a "railroad company or corporation." In this connection, it should be said that, except as hereinafter noted, there was nothing in the ordinance inconsistent with a grant to construct and operate a street railroad, and that, if the council had followed the charter provisions relating to street railroad franchises, the ordinance would have been a valid exercise of the charter powers. Furthermore, it was incumbent upon the city, in this action, to bring itself within the exception of the Broughton Act, and this it failed to do.

[8] Another objection to the ordinance which has been raised by the pleadings is that it granted to these individuals a right of way in perpetuity over public property of a strip of land 100 feet wide and two miles long. This grant was made without consideration and without compliance with the express provisions of subdivision 50 of the same section of the charter, which permits the council "to provide for the sale and conveyance, or lease, of all lands now or hereafter owned by said city not dedicated or reserved for public use * * * at public auction after publication of notice thereof." Thus if the city lands were dedicated to public use, they could not be alienated; if not so dedicated, they could be sold, conveyed, or leased only in accordance with the terms of subdivision 50. The council had no power to grant a perpetual right of way over the lands to the city in any event.

[9] From the foregoing it follows that the purported franchise was void, and that, as it was the basis of the bond sued on, the bond was without legal consideration. For this reason no recovery can be had upon the bond. Other points raised do not require consideration. The judgment is affirmed.

PORTUGUESE AMERICAN BANK v. SCHULTZ. (Civ. 3493.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 8, 1920. Rehearing Denied Nov. 5, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 6, 1920.)

1. Escrows ⟸9 — Agreement for delivery on payee procuring certificates for maker satisfied by maker himself procuring certificates.

Condition in escrow agreement for delivery of notes to payee on payee putting maker in possession of automobile registration certificates was satisfied by maker himself procuring the certificates.

2. Escrows ⟸10—Notes held to have been delivered.

Where escrow agreement provided for delivery of notes on performance of specified conditions, and on presentation, to bank holding notes, of order signed by maker and payee, there was a good delivery on the performance of the conditions, notwithstanding maker's refusal to sign order for delivery, since payee on performance of conditions had absolute right to such order, and since, under Civ. Code, § 3529, that which ought to have been done is to be regarded as having been done.

3. Escrows ⟸5—Bank holding notes in escrow held not to have violated duty by taking assignment.

Where there was nothing in escrow agreements preventing the sale of notes held in escrow, the bank to which the notes had been delivered in escrow did not violate its duty as escrow holder by taking an assignment of the notes from the payee, subject to the conditions upon which it held them in escrow.

4. Bills and notes ⟸477—Defense of fraud must be pleaded.

In action on notes, maker to avoid payment on ground that notes were procured by fraud must plead such defense.

5. Bills and notes ⟸494—Burden of proving fraud on maker.

In an action on notes, maker relying on fraud has burden of proving fraud.

6. Contracts ⟸88—Burden of proving failure of consideration on party asserting it.

The burden of showing failure of consideration for a written contract is upon him who asserts it.

7. Bills and notes ⟸476(2)—Failure of consideration must be pleaded.

A party who asserts failure or partial failure of consideration for a promissory note must allege such failure, or he will not be permitted to present the defense upon that point in the case.

8. Appeal and error ⟸1170(10) — Indefiniteness of finding held not to warrant reversal.

In action on notes, defended on ground of nondelivery in that condition of escrow agreement that payee procure registration certificates for a touring car and a truck was not performed, finding on such issue that maker received certificates for "said trucks" held not to warrant reversal for failure to more specifically identify the touring car, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 475.

9. Witnesses ⟸270(2)—Cross-examination on immaterial matter held improper.

In action on notes involving defense that notes placed in escrow had never been delivered, because of nonperformance of escrow conditions, where the maker, called as a witness for the plaintiff, testified as to the nonperformance of the conditions, questions on cross-examination as to damage sustained by him because of noncompliance with the conditions held improper; such evidence having no bearing on whether the conditions had been performed.

10. Pleading ⟸258(3)—Refusal to permit defendant to amend answer at late stage of trial held not abuse of discretion.

In an action on notes, refusal to permit maker at a late stage of the trial to amend answer by setting up fraud, where facts sought to be alleged had at all times been within the knowledge of the maker and of his counsel, and they had had ample time and opportunity to plead them, held not an abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by the Portuguese American Bank against John W. Schultz. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Rode, of Oakland, for appellant.

Robinson & Sizer, of Oakland (Clarence De Lancey, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendant upon three promissory notes given by the latter as the purchase price of an interest in a garage in Oakland.

On November 18, 1918, defendant Schultz and Mrs. M. E. Farrell, wife of F. M. Farrell, were copartners in a garage and automobile repair shop in Oakland, and on that day Schultz purchased Mrs. Farrell's interest in the garage, including a lease of the premises where the business was conducted, for the price of $1,900. Schultz paid $500 in cash and gave three promissory notes for the remainder of the purchase price of the property. These notes were not delivered directly and at once to Mrs. Farrell, but were deposited by Schultz with the Portuguese American Bank of Oakland, as it is said "in escrow," under instructions from the parties to deliver them to the payee, Mrs. Farrell, upon the written order of both Schultz and Mrs. Farrell; it being further stated in these instructions that such written order would be given whenever the conditions of the bill of sale of the property from Mrs. Farrell to Schultz should have been complied with. A copy of the bill of sale was delivered to the bank with the escrow directions.

There was at the time of the sale a mortgage upon the premises occupied by the business, which if foreclosed would oust Schultz from the leasehold; and the delivery of the notes by the bank to Mrs. Farrell was accordingly conditioned in the bill of sale upon Schultz remaining in undisturbed possession of the premises; and the delivery was also conditioned upon the delivery to Schultz of certificates of registration of an Overland car and truck which were included in the property carried by the bill of sale. The registration certificates were never delivered by the seller or her husband to Schultz, but the latter, subsequently, by his own efforts, procured that for the truck in February, 1919, and for the car in April, 1919. Schultz claims that he could not use the truck or car until he received these registration certificates. He remained in undisturbed possession of the property and premises until October 25, 1919, when he sold the property to G. S. Held, although meantime there was a squabble between Schultz and Brien, the landlord, about the amount of the rent. This dispute arose out of the refusal of the landlord to recognize or live up to the agreement between himself and Farrell made on April 29, 1918, providing for a reduction of the rent; and, although a foreclosure proceeding was meantime started upon the second mortgage, still Schultz's possession while he owned the garage was not disturbed.

At the time of the sale of the garage to Schultz, F. M. Farrell, husband of Mrs. M. E. Farrell (who may be suspected of being the real party in interest in the garage), owed the Portuguese American Bank $1,000; and two days after the deposit of the notes with the bank Mrs. Farrell indorsed them to the bank as security for her husband's debt. Schultz was, however, apprised of this before the assignment, and, being asked by an official of the bank if the notes were good, he made no objection to the indorsement, but stated that the notes were good if he was permitted to continue to occupy the premises.

On December 12, 1918, however, Schultz served a writing upon the bank, in which he notified the latter in general language that the conditions of the instructions upon which the notes had been placed with the bank had not been complied with; that Mrs. Farrell had undertaken to sell Schultz property of which she was not the owner; that the notes were secured by fraud and false representations, which had not been discovered by Schultz until after the delivery of the notes in escrow, and in this instrument Schultz claimed that the notes were therefore "null and void." He made no attempt, however, to rescind the contract or the notes, nor did he offer to return the property he had received for them. The bank retained possession of the notes. No written direction for their delivery to either Mrs. Farrell or the bank was ever given by either Mrs. Farrell or Schultz. There was no manual delivery of the notes by Mrs. Farrell or Schultz to the bank (and none by Schultz to the bank to hold as owner, but only the escrow delivery above referred to).

The notes not being paid at maturity, the bank instituted suits for their collection, and from judgments in its favor the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

[1, 2] It is claimed by appellant on these facts that the notes were never delivered. But they were delivered, subject to the conditions stated in the directions which accompanied them when they were placed with the bank. All that remained to be done to entitle the payee to their possession was compliance with these directions, to wit: That defendant should remain in possession of the garage and should be put into possession of the registration certificates of the truck and car. He did remain in possession and he procured the certificates. The fact that they were procured by himself instead of by the payee of the notes for him did not avoid the notes. It must be held that the finding of delivery is sustained by these facts. The fact that no written directions for the delivery of the notes were given by Mrs. Farrell or Schultz does not alter the case, for "that which ought to have been done is to be regarded as done, in favor of him to whom, and against him from whom, performance is due." Civ. Code, § 3529. And upon the performance of the two conditions specified in the escrow directions, the holder of the notes had the absolute right to the execution upon the part of Mrs. Farrell and Schultz of the direction to deliver.

[3] Nor is there anything in the contention that the bank violated its duty as escrow holder by taking an assignment of the notes to itself, for there was nothing in any of the papers or agreements pertaining to this escrow which prevented the sale of the notes to any one. The bank had the undoubted right, as well as any one else, to take an assignment of the notes. It took them subject, of course, to the conditions upon which it held them in escrow. The notes did not become good in its hands until compliance with these conditions of the escrow agreement, but it could buy and Mrs. Farrell could sell or hypothecate the interest of the latter in the notes, subject to the conditions upon which they were held by the bank as escrow holder. Nor were Schultz's interests, as far as we can see, affected adversely by this assignment.

[4-7] Closely associated with this contention of defendant is the offer made by him at the trial to prove that Farrell had deceived him at the sale by including therein many articles not owned by Mrs. Farrell, and by delay in procuring the registration certificates of the truck and the Overland car. If it was intended by this claim to avoid total payment of the notes upon the ground that they were procured by fraud, it should have been so pleaded, which was not done. But as we understand defendant's contention, they were not so offered, but only in proof of damages sustained as an offset to the payment of the notes, and against the balance of the purchase price represented by them. The court at the trial excluded the evidence and rejected offers of proof of such facts upon the ground that they were not pleaded. There is no pleading of this damage, and no defense of partial or total failure of consideration is pleaded. Conceding, but not deciding that these claims, if true, would have constituted a defense or a partial defense to the notes, still it was not available to defendant in the absence of allegations informing the plaintiff of defendant's claims. The burden of proving fraud, if he relies upon it, is upon defendant in such cases as this. Wilson v. White, 84 Cal. 239, 24 Pac. 114. And the burden of showing failure of consideration for a written contract is upon him who asserts it. Cuthill v. Peabody, 19 Cal. App. 304, 125 Pac. 926. It follows that he who would assert failure or partial failure of consideration for a promissory note must allege such failure or he will not be permitted to present evidence upon that point in the case. Defendant has not so pleaded this defense and the trial court was correct in rejecting it. See note to 13 Am. Dec. 378. This is elementary. 1 Sutherland on Code Pleading, § 386.

[8] Defendant claims that there is no finding that the escrow conditions were complied with. But the court found that the defendant remained in undisturbed possession of the premises as set forth in the bill of sale, and received the registration certificates for the trucks as in the bill of sale referred to. This finding, it is claimed, does not meet the issue of nonperformance of the escrow directions given to the bank. While the finding might have been more artfully drawn we think it sufficient on the point. The defendant is found to have had undisturbed possession of the property, and to have received the registration certificates. It is true the certificates are not in terms found to have been for the truck and the touring car, but for "said trucks," which are, however, also described in the findings as the ones referred to in the bill of sale. The cars are also referred to in a letter attached to the complaint, and the reference is sufficient to identify the machines for which the certificates were received. At least the case should not be reversed for failure to more specifically identify the Overland car in the findings. Code Civ. Proc. 475.

The findings are also attacked because it is not stated therein that the direction to the bank to deliver the notes was given by Mrs. Farrell or Schultz. But even so, in our view the allegation, proof or finding of this direction was not necessary to plaintiff's case for the reason that upon performance of the conditions precedent to the right to delivery, the plaintiff had the right to the delivery of the notes, regardless of whether the formal order for delivery was given or not.

[9] At the expense of some repetition another point must be mentioned. In an attempt to prove the damage above referred to and the nonperformance of the conditions precedent contained in the directions to the escrow-holder, defendant's counsel, upon cross-examination of defendant Schultz, who had been called as a witness for plaintiff, asked him as to the amount of damage sustained by him by reason of the failure to sooner obtain the registration certificates. The court sustained objections to the question. The ruling is attacked upon the theory that the evidence sought by the question would tend to show failure to perform the conditions precedent to the delivery of the notes by the bank to Mrs. Farrell as provided in the bill of sale and escrow directions. Schultz had been permitted to testify that he had never delivered or authorized the delivery of the notes; that he had not consented to their indorsement by Mrs. Farrell to the bank; that the bank had not asked his consent to this indorsement; that neither Mr. Farrell nor Mrs. Farrell had delivered the registration certificates to him, and that he had not waived that condition of the contract; that he ultimately by his own efforts obtained a registration certificate; and that meantime until he obtained the certificates he had not been able to use the truck or Overland car in his business. The question which was asked was directed to the amount of his damage by reason of these facts. The ruling of the court excluding the evidence was correct. In being permitted to cross-examine to the extent of showing the above-recited facts, the scope of cross-examination had been fully covered. The amount of damage sustained by defendant, if any, by reason of the failure of Mrs. Farrell to perform the conditions precedent to the right of delivery of the notes to her, was not material to a showing that she had in these respects failed to perform. The amount of damage sustained or whether he was damaged at all had no bearing on the question whether Mrs. Farrell had actually done or failed to do the things provided in the bill of sale and escrow agreement, as conditions precedent to the delivery of the notes.

The question whether the defendant had been defrauded by the misrepresentations of Farrell as to title to the property sold had no bearing upon the terms of the escrow directions, nor was fraud in this respect pleaded as a defense to the notes. The cross-examination was not unduly curtailed by these rulings.

From the record it appears that the motion for a nonsuit was properly decided.

[10] We cannot see that the court abused its discretion in refusing Schultz permission to amend at a late stage of the trial so as to set up the fraud which he claimed had been practiced upon him in selling him articles to which Farrell had no title, and his claim of damages arising out of this, and out of the delay in securing the registration certificates, for, as said by the trial court in refusing the permission, these matters were at all times within the knowledge of the defendant and also of his counsel. They had had ample time and opportunity to plead them, and the question was one for the trial court, in deciding which it not only cannot be said that it abused its discretion, but it must be admitted that it could hardly be said to have erred at all.

The judgment is affirmed.

KELLER v. GERBER. (Civ. 2214.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 9, 1920. Rehearing Denied Nov. 8, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 6, 1920.)

1. Executors and administrators ⟸228(3)—Claim given to deputy clerk in courtroom held filed in the "office of the clerk of the court."

Claims presented against the estate of a decedent to a deputy county clerk in the courtroom of a department of the superior court are filed "in the office of the clerk of the court," within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 1490, notwithstanding Pol. Code, §§ 4178, 4312, defining the duties of the county clerk, and requiring that he have an office, etc.; every courtroom in which a deputy clerk is assigned being as much a part of the county clerk's office as if the partitions were removed and it was in fact a part of one room.

2. Executors and administrators ⟸228(3½)—Taking of claims from county clerk for presentation to judge not withdrawal.

The taking of claims by the attorney of one who filed claims against an estate for presentation to the judge after their delivery to the county clerk for filing did not constitute such a withdrawal of the claims as to destroy the effect of the previous presentation for filing; the claims having been left with the clerk of the court who had them in his possession until they were taken to the judge.

3. Frauds, statute of ⟸119(2)—Oral agreement to pay for services enforceable, though within statute, where services rendered.

Conceding that a contract of a deceased to pay for services was within the statute, the party performing the services was entitled to recover where there was full performance on his part, as neither law nor equity will permit statute to be used as an instrument of or a shield for fraud.

4. Contracts ⟸230—Promise to pay reasonable value of services implied.

There being no provision in an agreement for the measure of compensation for services, the law implies a promise to pay the reasonable value thereof.

5. Limitation of actions ⟸150(4)—Memorandum of agreement to pay for services held sufficient, though not mentioning rate.

A written memorandum, "And besides I will pay to Mr. K. extra for his services for nursing during the time of my sickness," was a sufficient acknowledgment to take the promise out of the bar of the statute of limitations, though it did not provide for the measure of compensation.

6. Witnesses ⟸211(1)—Testimony of physicians as to value of services rendered deceased by nurse held competent.

In an action against an estate to recover the reasonable value of services rendered the deceased in his lifetime, consisting of nursing during the time of deceased's sickness, testimony of physicians of decedent as to the general character and value of the services rendered by the claimant as nurse was admissible under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, precluding a physician from being examined "as to any information acquired in attending the patient, which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient."

7. Appeal and error ⟸1170(7)—No reversal for erroneous admission of testimony resulting in no miscarriage of justice.

Erroneous admission in evidence of testimony that was privileged under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 4, would not furnish a sufficient ground for reversal of the judgment, where other witnesses testified substantially to the same facts, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing that no judgment shall be set aside, unless there was a miscarriage of justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by Adam Keller against John Gerber, as executor of the last will and testament of Conrad Iser, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Baker and R. Platnauer, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

C. E. McLaughlin and White, Miller, Needham & Harber, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. The plaintiff and defendant are executors of the last will and testament of Conrad Iser, deceased. The said Conrad Iser died on the 19th day of January, 1917. His will was admitted to probate and letters testamentary issued to the said Adam Keller and John Gerber on February 6, 1917. The estate exceeds in value the sum of $10,000, and the first publication of notice to creditors was made on February 7, 1917. Two claims against the estate, the latest of which was to all intents and purposes an amendment of the first, were presented by plaintiff, and neither was allowed nor rejected within the time allowed by law. A short time after the period prescribed for allowance or rejection of claims had expired this action was commenced. The claims were for "work, labor, and services rendered by claimant in caring for and nursing Conrad Iser continuously during the whole period of time commencing October 20, 1913, and ending January 19, 1917, the date of the death of Conrad Iser, a period of 169 weeks," and other services rendered in caring for the business of deceased. The court did not allow anything for services rendered in caring for the business of the deceased, but rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $5,070 for services rendered by plaintiff in caring for and nursing deceased for the period above stated.

It is claimed by the appellant that the claims were not presented or filed within the time prescribed by law. The essence of the argument on this contention is that a claim filed with a deputy county clerk in the courtroom of a department of the superior court is not filed with the county clerk. In other words, it is claimed that no claim is filed with the county clerk until it is presented in the main office of the county clerk. It appears from the evidence that on September 29, 1917, Clinton L. Harber, one of the attorneys for plaintiff, handed to the deputy county clerk at his desk in the courtroom of department 3, of the superior court of Sacramento county, the first claim, and requested him to file the same, at which time he requested the deputy clerk, when he handed the claim to the judge, to ask the judge not to take any action on it until after he had an opportunity of talking with the judge; that he handed the amended claim to the said deputy county clerk at his desk in said courtroom on November 14, 1917, and requested him to file it, and also told him, when he presented it to the judge, to call the judge's attention to the fact that he did not want him to take any action on it without first giving claimant an opportunity to be heard.

[1] The presenting of these claims to the deputy county clerk in the manner as above stated was a filing of the claims. Section 1490 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that claims must be filed "in the office of the clerk of the court from which the letters were issued." In our opinion each department of the superior court is necessarily a court, and the clerk of each department is the clerk of that court. There is nothing in sections 4178 and 4312 of the Political Code that militates against this conclusion. These sections, defining the duties of the county clerk, require that he have an office at the county seat and that in such office during the hours from 9 o'clock a. m. until 5 o'clock p. m. of each day in the year, except Sundays and holidays, there shall be present at least one person qualified and prepared to transact the business that may properly come into said office. But neither of said sections supports the contention of appellant that the main central office, where the permanent records are kept, is the sole and exclusive office of the county clerk. In our opinion every courtroom in which a deputy county clerk is assigned under the law is as much a part of the county clerk's office as if the partitions were removed and it was in fact a part of one room.

The appellant cites the following California cases: Estate of Sbarboro, 63 Cal. 5; Tregambo v. Comanche, 57 Cal. 501; Edwards v. Grand, 121 Cal. 254, 53 Pac. 796; Hoyt v. Stark, 134 Cal. 178, 66 Pac. 223, 86 Am. St. Rep. 246; Rauer v. Standley, 3 Cal. App. 44, 84 Pac. 214. But none of these cases in our opinion supports the appellant in this contention. In Estate of Sbarboro, 63 Cal. 5, the petition for revocation of probate of will was delivered to the clerk of the court for filing about 9 o'clock a. m. on the 3d day of December, 1879; but the decree of the court admitting the will to probate had been entered on the 2d day of December, 1878, and the year within which the probate could be contested had run at midnight on December 2, 1879. The petition, before it was filed or presented to the clerk for filing, had been presented to the judge of the court at his private residence on December 2, 1879, for an order for the issuance of a citation upon it, and for the purpose of examining it, so as to determine whether the petitioners were entitled to the order. The judge retained the petition in his possession until the morning of the 3d day of December, 1879, when he took it to the office of the clerk of the court, and about 9 o'clock a. m. on that day delivered it, with his order for the issuance of a citation thereon. It was held that presenting the petition to the judge was not filing it in court, nor the equivalent of filing it; that it must be filed with the clerk, and, if not so filed prior to the expiration of the year, the decree becomes conclusive and absolute.

In Tregambo v. Comanche, 57 Cal. 501, the attorneys for the defendant, on the 20th day of April, 1879, forwarded to the clerk of the court, to be filed, certain demurrers to the complaint. The demurrers were regularly delivered to the clerk of the court on the 29th day of April, 1879. He received them without demanding his fees for filing them. But on May 1, 1879, defendant's attorneys received a letter from the clerk demanding his fees for filing the demurrers. They left Bodie for the county seat on May 2d, and arrived there the same day, whereupon they tendered to the clerk his fees, which he refused to receive, because he was then in the act of entering the defendant's default for not answering. Upon these facts the Supreme Court held that the demurrers were on file in contemplation of law and that the default should have been set aside.

In Edwards v. Grand, 121 Cal. 254, 53 Pac. 796, the defendant Gerard Grand executed a mortgage to the plaintiff on November 22, 1892, and on the same day his wife made a declaration of homestead upon a portion of the mortgaged premises. The foreclosure of the mortgage was resisted by the wife upon the ground that, to the extent that the mortgaged premises are covered by the declaration of homestead, the mortgage was invalid, for the reason that she did not unite in its execution. The mortgage was taken to the office of the county recorder for record a few minutes after 5 o'clock p. m. on the day it was executed, and, as the statute only required the office to be kept open until 5 o'clock, the mortgage was delivered to the recorder, with the request that he would record it the first thing on opening his office the next morning. On the next morning, a little before 9 o'clock, while the recorder was on his way to the office, the declaration of homestead was handed to him, with the request that he would record it the first thing after the office was open, and when he reached his office, finding that the two instruments affected the same premises, he indorsed each of them as follows: "Filed for record November 23, 1892, at 9 o'clock a. m." The court said:

"An instrument is filed for record when it is deposited in the proper office, with a person in charge thereof, with directions to record it. * * * Delivering an instrument to the proper officer, at a place other than the office where it is required to be filed, is not sufficient, even though the officer indorses it as properly filed."

And it was held that the mortgage, which was presented at the recorder's office after 5 o'clock p. m., took precedence as to time of recordation over that of the declaration of homestead which was delivered to the recorder upon the street the following morning.

In Hoyt v. Stark, 134 Cal. 178, 66 Pac. 223, 86 Am. St. Rep. 246, the attorney for appellant on the last day allowed by law to file an undertaking on appeal, went to the office of the county clerk after 5 o'clock p. m. Finding the office closed, he went to a social club in the city of San Jose, where he found one of the deputy county clerks. To him he explained the circumstances. The deputy took the undertaking and indorsed it as filed upon that day and date. At 9:30 a. m. upon the following day, respondent's attorney called at the clerk's office and found no record of the filing of the undertaking. Thereafter the deputy clerk to whom had been intrusted the undertaking arrived at the office and delivered the bond to a fellow deputy, who placed it in its proper receptacle and made in the proper books the entry of its filing. It was held by the Supreme Court that the filing of the undertaking was not in time.

In Rauer, etc., Co. v. Standley, 3 Cal. App. 44, 84 Pac. 214, December 1, 1905, was the last day upon which an undertaking on appeal could be filed, and no such undertaking was filed until the 5th day of December, 1905, which was too late unless the time had been extended. Attached to the undertaking was a paper signed by the judge of the superior court and dated December 1, 1905, granting to appellant to and including December 6, 1905, in which to file its undertaking, but it was held by the court that any order extending the time would be unavailing unless presented for filing at the office of the clerk before the time for filing the undertaking on appeal had expired.

[2] The taking of the claims by the attorney for plaintiff for presentation to the judge after their delivery to the deputy county clerk for filing did not constitute such a withdrawal of the claims as to destroy the effect of such previous presentation for filing. In the case of Wilkinson v. Elliott, 43 Kan. 590, 23 Pac. 614, 19 Am. St. Rep. 158, the attorney for plaintiff on May 21, 1883, presented a petition praying for a divorce to the clerk of the district court. He did not ask for, or obtain, the issuance of summons. The clerk placed his file marks on the petition, when it was immediately thereafter taken by counsel for plaintiff from the possession of the clerk, who retained it until May 25, 1883. It was held by the Supreme Court of Kansas that under these facts there was not a sufficient filing. That when a party temporarily hands a petition to the clerk of the district court, in order that he may place his file marks thereon, and not for the purpose of allowing it to remain in official custody as a permanent record, and he does not ask for, or obtain, the issuance of summons, but holds the petition in his own possession away from the record, the action is not pending, within the meaning of the statute on lis pendens.

In the case at bar the claims were left with the clerk of the court, who had them in his possession until they were taken to the judge of the superior court.

Complaint is made by appellant that the claims fall within the statute of frauds and that the writing received in evidence is not a sufficient memorandum within that statute. It is true that it is alleged in the claims that the said Conrad Iser promised to pay the plaintiff for the services upon his death, but neither of the claims is based on this promise. The nonperformance of the contract is expressly alleged and the claims are founded on a quantum meruit. The case is one to establish a claim for the reasonable value of services.

[3] Even conceding that the contract is within the statute of frauds, and that the services were rendered under an invalid oral contract, respondent was still entitled to recover, by reason of full performance on his part, as neither the law nor equity will permit the statute of frauds to be used as an instrument of or a shield for fraud. In Arguello v. Edinger, 10 Cal. 150, 158, Justice Field, speaking for the court, said:

"So, where a verbal contract had been so far performed, by one of the parties, relying upon the good faith of the other, that he could have no adequate remedy except by complete performance, courts of equity decreed its execution, upon the ground that the refusal to execute the same under such circumstances was a fraud, and that a statute having for its object the prevention of fraud could not be used as an instrument for its perpetration."

In Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 782, 794, 106 Pac. 88, 94 (134 Am. St. Rep. 154), it is said:

"The right of courts of equity to hold a person estopped to assert the statute of frauds, where such assertion would amount to practicing a fraud, cannot be disputed. It is based upon the principle, 'thoroughly established in equity, and applying in every transaction where the statute is invoked, that the statute of frauds, having been enacted for the purpose of preventing fraud, shall not be made the instrument of shielding, protecting, or aiding the party who relies upon it in the perpetration of a fraud or in the consummation of a fraudulent scheme.' 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 921. It was said in Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 24, 35 (3 Am. Rep. 418): 'The fraud most commonly treated as taking an agreement out of the statute of frauds is that which consists in setting up the statute against its enforcement, after the other party has been induced to make expenditures, or a change of situation in regard to the subject matter of the agreement, or upon the supposition that it was to be carried into execution, and the assumption of rights thereby to be acquired; so that the refusal to complete the execution of the agreement is not merely a denial of rights which it was intended to confer, but the infliction of an unjust and unconscientious injury and loss. In such case, the party is held, by force of his acts or silent acquiescence, which have misled the other to his harm, to be estopped from setting up the statute of frauds.' This statement has been accepted as setting forth a plain and satisfactory ground for equitable jurisdiction, together with a clear indication of the proper limitation of its exercise. See 5 Browne on Statute of Frauds, § 457a. In the section last cited, Mr. Browne says: 'A plaintiff * * * must be able to show clearly * * * not only the terms of the contract, but also such acts and conduct of the defendant as the court would hold to amount to a representation that he proposed to stand by his agreement and not avail himself of the statute to escape its performance, and also that the plaintiff, in reliance on this representation, has proceeded, either in performance or pursuance of his contract, to so far alter his position as to incur an unjust and unconscientious injury and loss, in case the defendant is permitted after all to rely upon the statutory defense. After proof of this, the court may well be justified in using its undoubted power, in cases of equitable estoppel, to refuse to listen to a defendant seeking to deny the truth of his own representations previously made.' We can see no good reason for limiting the operation of this equitable doctrine to any particular class of contracts included within the statute of frauds, provided always the essential elements of an estoppel are present, or for saying otherwise than as is intimated by Mr. Pomeroy in the words already quoted, viz. that it applies 'in every transaction where the statute is invoked.' It is a general equitable principle, a part of the broader equitable doctrine stated in Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 580, and quoted therefrom in Carpy v. Dowdell, 115 Cal. 687 (47 Pac. 695), as follows: 'The vital principle is that he who by his language or conduct leads another to do what he would not otherwise have done shall not subject such person to loss or injury by disappointing the expectations upon which he acted. Such a change of position is sternly forbidden. It involves fraud and falsehood, and the law abhors both.'"

[4] But the written memorandum above referred to is in our opinion a valid and sufficient written contract to pay the reasonable value of the services rendered by the plaintiff. It is an express written promise by Conrad Iser to pay Adam Keller for such services rendered in nursing him during his illness which ended with his death, and no oral evidence is necessary to complete the contract. There being no provision for the measure of compensation, the law implies the promise to pay the reasonable value thereof.

[5] This written memorandum, the court found, was signed by Conrad Iser on or about the 7th day of January, 1917, and among other things it provides, as follows:

"And besides I will pay to Mr. Adam Keller extra for his services for nursing during the time of my sickness."

This is a sufficient acknowledgment of his indebtedness to plaintiff, and sufficient to take plaintiff's claim out of the bar of the statute of limitations.

[6] Appellant contends that the testimony of Dr. W. A. Briggs and Dr. George A. Foster was privileged, and hence inadmissible, under section 1881, subdivision 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that:

"A licensed physician or surgeon cannot, without the consent of his patient, be examined in a civil action as to any information acquired in attending the patient, which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient."

We do not think that the testimony of these physicians was inadmissible under the said provision of the statute. Their testimony was simply as to the general character and value of the services rendered by the plaintiff as nurse, and not as to any information acquired in attending the patient which was necessary to enable them to prescribe or act for the patient, and under section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure a physician is precluded from being examined as a witness only—

"as to information acquired in attending the patient which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient." Estate of Black, 132 Cal. 392, 396, 64 Pac. 695; Harris v. Zanone, 93 Cal. 59, 71, 28 Pac. 845; In re Redfield, 116 Cal. 644, 48 Pac. 794.

[7] But, conceding that this testimony was privileged under section 1881, subdivision 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure, it would not furnish a sufficient ground for a reversal of the judgment, as it was harmless for the reason that other witnesses testified substantially to the same facts, and under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution:

"No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, in any case on the ground * * * of the improper admission or rejection of evidence * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

In view of the foregoing, we deem it unnecessary to pass upon the other questions argued in the briefs.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

49 Cal. App. 513

Ex parte MAYEN. (Cr. 742.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 11, 1920.)

1. Criminal law ⟸1073—Order revoking stay of execution tantamount to revocation of certificate of probable cause for appeal.

Order of the trial judge revoking stay of execution of sentence on defendant, on account of defendant's attempt to escape from the county jail, was tantamount to revocation of the judge's previously issued certificate of probable cause for appeal; the principal, if not the sole, purpose of such certificate being to stay execution of judgment of conviction pending appeal.

2. Criminal law ⟸1073—Justices of District Courts of Appeal may grant certificate of probable cause.

In view of Const. art. 6, § 4, in any case where it is proper to grant certificate of probable cause for appeal, any justice of the District Courts of Appeal may grant the certificate, though Pen. Code, § 1243, does not expressly confer on them power to issue the certificate; the section not having been amended since the creation of such courts.

3. Criminal law ⟸1084—Stay of execution prevents defendant from being treated as convict undergoing punishment.

The effect of suspension of judgment of conviction, as by stay of execution granted by a District Court of Appeal, is that during the time of the judgment's suspension defendant cannot be treated as a convict undergoing punishment for his crime, nor as one subject to imprisonment in the state prison, even for the purpose of detention, as the law regulating state prisons provides only for the imprisonment therein of convicts actually undergoing punishment for their crimes, and one convicted of an offense after stay of execution must remain in the custody of the sheriff and be confined in the county jail, within Pen. Code, § 1597, subd. 3.

4. Habeas corpus ⟸109—Court empowered to deliver petitioner to custody of person entitled thereto by law.

Where petitioner in habeas corpus is held by one person when another is entitled to his custody, the court is expressly empowered by Pen. Code, § 1493, to deliver him to the custody of the person entitled thereto by law.

5. Criminal law ⟸1012—Order revoking certificate of probable cause not "appealable order"; "substantial rights."

The trial court's order revoking, on account of defendant's attempted escape, certificate of probable cause for appeal from judgment of conviction previously granted by him, is not an "appealable order," within Pen. Code, § 1237, subd. 3, not being an order affecting defendant's "substantial rights"; defendant being afforded an adequate and more expeditious remedy by section 1243, under which he may apply to a justice of the District Court of Appeal for certificate of probable cause. Where an order adverse to defendant is made, and the code affords him a more effective and expeditious remedy than by appeal, the order is not one affecting his "substantial rights."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Substantial Right.]

6. Criminal law ⟸1073—Defendant could apply to District Court of Appeal for certificate of probable cause after trial court's revocation of own certificate.

Where defendant was granted certificate of probable cause for appeal by the trial court, but such certificate was revoked by the court for defendant's attempt to escape, the remedy provided by Pen. Code, § 1243, giving the right to apply to a justice of the District Court of Appeal for certificate of probable cause, was available to defendant.

7. Criminal law ⟸1084—"Certificate of probable cause" is equivalent to order staying execution pending appeal.

A "certificate of probable cause" in its effects is substantially the equivalent of order staying execution pending appeal from judgment of conviction; its filing with the clerk of the trial court, by whomsoever it may have been granted, the trial court itself or a justice of the District Court of Appeal, operating as a supersedeas.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Certificate of Probable Cause.]

8. Criminal law ⟸1084—Appeal from order revoking certificate of probable cause would not stay execution.

Defendant's appeal from order of the trial court revoking his previously issued certificate of probable cause for appeal (if such order were appealable at all) would not, being an appeal from an order made after final judgment, stay execution of such judgment.

9. Habeas corpus ⊂⊃3—Mandamus held not to exclude remedy by habeas corpus; "commitment by competent authority."

Any commitment to the county jail, or to the custody of the sheriff, that the District Court of Appeal may make, is a "commitment by competent authority," within the meaning of Pen. Code, § 1611, obligating the sheriff to receive all persons committed to jail by such authority, so that mandamus, to which the sheriff can be made a party, is not the only remedy for defendant, improperly incarcerated in the state's prison after stay of execution of judgment of conviction by certificate of probable cause for appeal issued by a justice of the District Court of Appeal, after revocation by the trial court of such certificate previously issued by him, habeas corpus being available to defendant.

10. Criminal law ⊂⊃1073—Certificate of probable cause may be issued by trial court or District Court of Appeal.

The trial court and the several justices of the District Court of Appeal have concurrent and co-ordinate jurisdiction to issue a certificate of probable cause for appeal, and grant stay, each irrespective of the action of the other.

11. Habeas corpus ⊂⊃48—Where petitioner brought into court in response to mandate, detention will be inquired into.

Even though the District Court of Appeal had no power to issue writ of habeas corpus to the warden of the state prison at San Quentin, for the reason the writ may not be issued outside the court's particular appellate district, where the warden brings petitioner into such district, and produces him in court, the cause of the detention will be inquired into, irrespective of the jurisdictional question.

In the matter of the application of Fred H. Mayen for a writ of habeas corpus, to be directed to the warden of San Quentin Prison, to secure petitioner's remand to the custody of the sheriff of Los Angeles county during pendency of stay of execution. Writ granted.

John S. Cooper, of Los Angeles, and George H. Shreve, of San Diego, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Arthur Keetch and Thomas A. Wood, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Thomas Lee Woolwine, of Los Angeles, W. J. Clark, and W. C. Doran, of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

PER CURIAM. By this habeas corpus proceeding petitioner seeks an order directing that he be taken from the custody of the warden of the state prison at San Quentin and remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Los Angeles county.

[1] Petitioner, who had been convicted of a felony in the superior court for Los Angeles county and by that court sentenced to the state prison at San Quentin, appealed to this court from the judgment of conviction. Subsequently, the judge of the trial court, pursuant to section 1243 of the Penal Code, issued a certificate of probable cause, certifying that, in his opinion, there is probable cause for the appeal. Thereafter, upon a showing that petitioner had attempted to escape from the county jail, the trial judge, upon motion of the district attorney, ordered that his stay of execution of the sentence be vacated, and directed the clerk forthwith to deliver to the sheriff a commitment committing petitioner to the state prison. In its effect upon petitioner's rights, the order of the trial judge revoking the stay of execution was tantamount to a revocation of his previously issued certificate of probable cause; for the principal, if not the sole, purpose of such certificate is to stay execution of the judgment of conviction pending appeal.

The stay of execution having thus been revoked by the trial judge, and the efficacy of his previously issued certificate of probable cause having thereby been destroyed, application was made here for an order staying execution of the judgment of conviction until such time as the record on appeal from the judgment could be prepared and transmitted to this court, and application made to a justice of this court for a certificate of probable cause. The sheriff, in the meantime, had taken petitioner to the state prison at San Quentin under the judgment and commitment of the superior court. Petitioner was delivered by that officer into the custody of the warden of the state prison, where he remained until September 23, 1920, when the warden, in obedience to the writ of habeas corpus issued in this proceeding, produced petitioner before this court.

Shortly after the trial judge's revocation of his certificate of probable cause and order staying execution of the judgment, this court heard an application for a stay of execution, and on September 18, 1920, ordered that execution of the judgment of conviction be stayed until such time as the record on appeal from the judgment could be prepared and transmitted to the clerk of this court. See People v. Mayen, 193 Pac. 173. This stay of execution was granted by us to enable petitioner to exercise his right under section 1243 to apply to a justice of this court for a certificate of probable cause. The order was made upon the authority of such cases as People v. Lane, 96 Cal. 596, 31 Pac. 580, In re Adams, 81 Cal. 163, 22 Pac. 547, People v. Clark, 125 Cal. 251, 57 Pac. 986, and People v. Gallanar, 144 Cal. 656, 79 Pac. 378. When we made the order staying execution of the sentence, we further ordered that, pending the stay, petitioner be remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

[2] At the argument in this habeas corpus proceeding, counsel on both sides, correctly, as we think, assumed that, in any case where it is proper to grant a certificate of probable cause, any justice of this court may grant the certificate, notwithstanding section 1243 does not purport, in express terms, to confer upon the justices of the district courts of appeal power to issue the certificate. That Code section has not been amended since the creation of these appellate courts. It reads:

"An appeal to the Supreme Court * * * stays the execution of the judgment * * * upon filing * * * a certificate of the judge [of the trial court] * * * or of a justice of the Supreme Court," etc.

Though the letter of the section does not confer upon the justices of the several District Courts of Appeal authority to issue the certificate of probable cause, nor, indeed, authorize issuance of the certificate by a judge or justice of any court, save in those comparatively few cases where an appeal from the judgment of conviction may now be taken to the Supreme Court, nevertheless, the constitutional amendment whereby the District Courts of Appeal were created expressly provides that—

"All statutes now in force allowing, providing for, or regulating appeals to the Supreme Court shall apply to appeals to the District Courts of Appeal so far as such statutes are not inconsistent with this article and until the Legislature shall otherwise provide." Section 4, art. 6, Const.

We have no doubt that, in all cases where the appeal has been regularly taken to a District Court of Appeal, the effect of this constitutional provision is to confer upon the justices of such court the same power to issue certificates of probable cause that formerly was vested in the justices of the Supreme Court in all criminal cases where appeals were taken to that court from judgments of conviction. This conclusion accords with a uniform practice that, so far as we are aware, has been acquiesced in for many years by bench and bar throughout the state.

[3] The effect of our order staying execution of the sentence was to make illegal petitioner's detention in the state prison during such time as the stay of execution may continue in force. A stay of execution of a judgment of conviction suspends the judgment and arrests all proceedings thereon during the continuance of the stay. The effect of the suspension of the judgment is that, during the time of the judgment's suspension, the defendant cannot be treated as a convict undergoing punishment for his crime, nor as one who is subject to imprisonment in the state prison—even for the purpose of detention. We know of no law under which the warden of the state prison can be compensated for the keep or maintenance of persons not actually serving time as convicts, undergoing all the punishment, including hard labor, that the law says shall be meted out to persons convicted of felony. The whole scope of the law regulating such prisons must be held to provide only for the imprisonment therein of convicts actually undergoing punishment for their crimes. Ex parte Arras, 78 Cal. 304, 20 Pac. 683. Therefore, pending our stay of execution of the judgment of conviction, petitioner should be remanded to and remain in the custody of the sheriff (Ex parte Rodley, 132 Cal. 40, 64 Pac. 91); and the sheriff must keep his prisoner in the usual place of confinement—the county jail. During the stay of execution, and while he is in the custody of the sheriff, petitioner is a person confined "by other authority of law," within the meaning of subdivision 3 of section 1597 of the Penal Code. In Ex parte Arras, supra, the court said:

"It is provided generally that all persons committed by authority of law shall be confined in the common jails in the several counties. (Pen. Code, § 1597.)"

The detention of petitioner in any other place than the county jail of Los Angeles county, during the life of the order heretofore made by us staying execution of the judgment, is therefore unwarranted and unlawful.

[4] Where the petitioner in habeas corpus is held by one person, when another is entitled to his custody, the court is expressly empowered to deliver him to the custody of the person who by law is entitled thereto. Pen. Code, § 1493; Ex parte McGuire, 135 Cal. 339, 67 Pac. 327, 87 Am. St. Rep. 105. Because the county jail is the only lawful place for petitioner's confinement during our stay of execution of the judgment of conviction, and the sheriff is the only person lawfully entitled to his custody during that time, it will be our duty to deliver him from his unlawful imprisonment in the state prison—unlawful while our stay of execution is in force—and remand him to the custody of the sheriff, to be by that officer kept in confinement in the county jail, unless we shall conclude that there is merit in one or more of the objections raised by the district attorney, who appears here, through his deputies, as amicus curiæ. These objections we shall now consider.

1. It is claimed by the district attorney that, because a certificate of probable cause was issued by the trial judge, petitioner's only remedy is an appeal from that judge's order revoking his previously issued certificate and stay of execution, and that therefore this court was without authority to order a stay of execution of the judgment, or, at any rate, that there was no occasion for our order staying execution. The district attorney's argument, as we understand it, runs substantially as follows: The order of the trial judge revoking the certificate of probable cause that previously had been issued by him was an order affecting the substantial rights of the defendant, made after judgment, and therefore is an appealable order, under subdivision 3 of section 1237 of the Penal Code; an appeal from such order stays enforcement of the judgment; therefore, such appeal affords the only proper remedy, where, as here, the trial judge, having issued a certificate of probable cause and granted a stay, subsequently revokes such certificate and stay of execution.

[5] This argument is based upon two erroneous assumptions. In the first place, we do not think that the order revoking the certificate of probable cause is an appealable order. We do not think it is an order affecting petitioner's "substantial rights," within the meaning of subdivision 3 of section 1237, under which only those orders made after final judgment are appealable that affect the defendant's "substantial rights." The order revoking the certificate of probable cause did not affect petitioner's "substantial rights," for the reason that he is afforded an adequate and far more expeditious remedy by another Code section (section 1243), under which he is permitted to apply to a justice of this court for a certificate of probable cause. It seems to be the settled law of this state that where an order adverse to the defendant in a criminal action is made, and the Code affords him some remedy therefor that is more effective and expeditious than an appeal would be, such order is not one affecting his "substantial rights," within the meaning of subdivision 3 of section 1237, which declares that "an appeal may be taken by the defendant * * * (3) from any order made after judgment, affecting the substantial rights of the party." Thus, in People v. Jackson, 138 Cal. 32, 70 Pac. 918, it was held that the refusal of the trial judge to settle a bill of exceptions, though it is an order made after final judgment, is not an order affecting the "substantial rights" of the defendant, for the reason that the remedy specifically provided by section 1174 of the Penal Code is more effective and expeditious than an appeal from the order refusing to settle the bill of exceptions would be.

[6, 7] That the remedy provided by section 1243, the right to apply to a justice of this court for a certificate of probable cause, was available to petitioner, admits of no doubt. The revocation of a certificate of probable cause that has previously been granted leaves the case in the same situation it would have been, had the certificate been refused in the first instance. Where the certificate is refused by the trial judge in the first instance, the defendant is permitted to make application to a justice of this court for a certificate of probable cause, even though he may have commenced serving his sentence. Pen. Code, § 1245. There is no possible reason, perceivable by us, why the right to apply to a justice of this court for a certificate of probable cause should be denied a defendant in a criminal action merely because the trial judge, having granted the certificate on application to him therefor, later sees fit to revoke it. Section 1243 does not say that application may be made to a justice of this court for a certificate of probable cause when and only when the trial judge has refused the certificate in the first instance. The language of the section is that in all cases, other than capital cases, an appeal from the judgment of conviction stays execution of the judgment upon filing with the clerk "a certificate of the judge of the trial court, or of a justice of the Supreme Court," certifying that there is probable cause for the appeal. No limitation is placed upon the authority of a justice of the appellate court to issue the certificate if, in his opinion, it should issue.

With respect to the issuance of the certificate, the jurisdiction of a justice of the appellate court is co-ordinate with that of the trial judge. It at least is not inferior thereto. Of course, in practice, no justice of this court would consider an application for a certificate of probable cause until the applicant had first invoked the authority of the trial judge to issue the certificate. Any other practice would involve too serious and too frequent interruption of the business of this court. But this does not militate against the fact that the authority of the trial judge and that of a justice of this court to issue the certificate of probable cause are concurrent and co-ordinate. Each, in a qualified sense, exercises original jurisdiction, though the jurisdiction to grant the certificate, when exercised, is exercised in furtherance of this court's appellate jurisdiction. There is, we think, no room to doubt the authority of a justice of this court, under section 1243, to grant a certificate of probable cause after the issuance and subsequent revocation of a certificate of probable cause by the trial judge.

A certificate of probable cause, in all its effects, is substantially the equivalent of an order staying execution pending an appeal from a judgment of conviction—nothing more and nothing less. Its filing with the clerk, by whomsoever it may have been granted, operates as a supersedeas. And such stay or supersedeas may be granted by a justice of this court whenever the trial judge refuses to stay execution of the sentence, whether such refusal to stay execution be brought about by the trial judge's refusal to issue the certificate of probable cause in the first instance or by his revocation of a certificate or a stay of execution previously granted by him. This being so, it follows that, upon the the trial judge's revocation of the certificate of probable cause previously issued by him, section 1243 afforded petitioner an effective and expeditious remedy—a remedy far more effective and expeditious than any appeal from the order of revocation would be.

Wherefore we conclude that the order of revocation was not one affecting petitioner's "substantial rights," within the meaning of subdivision 3 of section 1237, and that therefore it was not an appealable order.

[8] The other erroneous assumption in the point raised by the district attorney that now is being considered by us is the assumption that, on an appeal from an order of the trial judge revoking his previously issued certificate of probable cause—assuming such order to be appealable—there can be a stay of execution of the judgment of conviction. With the exception of section 1243 of the Penal Code, we know of no statutory provision permitting a stay of execution in a criminal case. If there be any, it has not been called to our attention. Section 1243 relates solely to an appeal from the "judgment of conviction." An appeal, therefore, from an order made after final judgment, would not stay execution of the judgment. See Carit v. Williams, 67 Cal. 580, 8 Pac. 93; Credits Com. Co. v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 82, 73 Pac. 1009.

For the foregoing reasons, we are satisfied that an application to this court, or to a justice thereof, for a stay of execution pending such time as petitioner's application for a certificate of probable cause can be presented and heard here, is the only remedy available to him. His right, under section 1243, to apply to a justice of this court for a certificate of probable cause, and his right to a stay of execution of the judgment until such time as such application for the certificate can be presented, heard, and determined, are rights that are inseparably incident to his right to appeal from the judgment of conviction, and should not be denied him simply because the trial judge, after having once issued a certificate of probable cause, has subsequently deemed it his duty to revoke it.

[9] 2. It is claimed that if petitioner is entitled to be taken from the state prison and remanded to the custody of the sheriff, his sole remedy is by mandamus against the sheriff. The basis for this contention is the claim that only by a proceeding to which the sheriff is a party can that officer be effectively directed to take the petitioner into his custody. This argument ignores the fact that the sheriff must obey all lawful orders of this court (subdivision 4, § 4157, Pol. Code), and that he must receive all persons committed to jail by competent authority (section 1611, Pen. Code). By the provision of the Political Code just referred to (subdivision 4, § 4157) it is provided that "the sheriff must * * * obey all lawful orders and directions of all courts held within his county," and by the Penal Code section last quoted (section 1611) it is specifically provided that "the sheriff must receive all persons committed to jail by competent authority." For the reasons stated supra, we have the power, and it is our duty, under section 1493 of the Penal Code, to order petitioner taken from the custody of the warden and committed to that of the sheriff until such time as a justice of this court can hear and pass upon his application for a certificate of probable cause.

Any commitment to the county jail, or to the custody of the sheriff, that this court may make, is a commitment by "competent authority," within the meaning of section 1611. County of Sonoma v. Santa Rosa, 102 Cal. 426, 36 Pac. 810. The sheriff has no authority to sit in judgment and determine whether this court has exceeded its jurisdiction or not, but must obey any lawful order that we may make remanding petitioner to his custody, even though that officer be not a party to this proceeding. County of Sonoma v. Santa Rosa, supra. Failure on the part of the sheriff to obey any order that we may make committing petitioner to his custody for detention in the county jail until such time as a justice of this court may hear and determine an application for a certificate of probable cause would subject that officer to the penalties provided by law for a disobedience of this court's lawful orders. The sheriff is just as much bound to obey any order that may be made in this proceeding directing him to take petitioner into his custody as he would be to obey any final order that might be made in a mandamus proceeding against him. It follows, therefore, that there is no basis for the claim that petitioner's only proper remedy is mandamus. It may not be amiss to say in this connection that we have no reason whatever to doubt the sheriff's loyalty to his oath of office, or to surmise that he will not give ready and instant obedience to any order that may be made by this court in this proceeding.

[10] 3. It is said that every intendment is in favor of the jurisdiction of the trial judge to revoke his certificate of probable cause, and that, upon this habeas corpus proceeding, this court is limited to an inquiry into the trial judge's jurisdiction to make the order revoking his certificate of probable cause. This argument proceeds upon an utter misconception of the ground for our authority to stay execution of the judgment of conviction, pending an application to a justice of this court for a certificate of probable cause, and thereby make petitioner's confinement in the state prison illegal pending the stay of execution. It may be conceded that the trial judge's revocation of the certificate of probable cause, whether for a sufficient or insufficient reason, was well within his jurisdiction, and therefore not subject to collateral attack in this proceeding. But, even so, his revocation of his certificate of probable cause, upon whatever ground made, like a refusal by a trial judge in the first instance to issue a certificate of probable cause, does not deprive the defendant in a criminal action of his right to invoke the jurisdiction of a justice of this court to issue a certificate of probable cause. To enable the defendant in a criminal action to exercise his right to make such application to a justice of this court, it is the duty of the trial judge to stay execution of the judgment until application can be made to and determined by a justice of this court. And if, for any reason whatever, the trial judge refuses to issue the certificate of probable cause, or revokes a certificate previously granted by him, and refuses to grant a stay of execution of the judgment until application to a justice of this court to grant a certificate of probable cause can be presented and heard, then, though the trial judge's refusal to issue the certificate, or his revocation thereof, and his refusal to grant the stay, are undoubtedly within his jurisdiction, this court, nevertheless, or a justice thereof may grant such stay until defendant's application for the certificate can be presented to and passed upon by a justice of this court. The judge of the trial court and the several justices of this court have original, concurrent, and co-ordinate jurisdiction to issue the certificate and grant the stay; and a refusal on the part of the trial judge to issue the certificate or to grant the stay is no bar to an exercise of like jurisdiction by a justice of this court and the issuance by him of a certificate of probable cause or the grant by him of a stay of execution of the judgment until such time as he can hear and pass upon an application for the certificate. The exercise of such jurisdiction is an exercise of a part of our appellate jurisdiction. People v. Gallanar, supra; Matter of Adams, supra; People v. Clark, supra; People v. Lane, supra.

For these reasons, we think it clear that the refusal of the trial judge, in the exercise of his unquestionable jurisdiction, to issue the certificate, or his revocation of a certificate already issued by him, does not oust a justice of this court of his jurisdiction and authority to issue the certificate, if, in his opinion, there is probable cause for the appeal. Petitioner's right to an order in this habeas corpus proceeding, directing that he be taken from the custody of the warden of the state prison and committing him to the custody of the sheriff, does not require us to hold that the trial judge was without jurisdiction to revoke his certificate of probable cause. The question before us is: What was the effect of our order staying execution of the judgment of conviction? Did it make petitioner's further confinement in the state prison unlawful during the life of the stay? What we are concerned with here is the validity of our order, heretofore made, staying execution of the judgment of conviction. If that order was within our jurisdiction, and we are satisfied it was, then the only proper place for petitioner's confinement during the continuance of the stay is the county jail at Los Angeles, and we have the power, in this proceeding, to order that he be kept there and not elsewhere.

[11] 4. Finally, it is contended that this court had no power to issue the writ of habeas corpus to the warden of the state prison at San Quentin for the reason that the writ, so it is claimed, may not be issued outside of this appellate district. In this connection reference may be made to Older v. Superior Court, 10 Cal. App. 564, 102 Pac. 829, and the decision of the Supreme Court in the same case, 157 Cal. 773, 109 Pac. 478. Section 4, article 6, of the Constitution contains this provision:

"The said courts [the District Courts of Appeal] shall also have power to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, and habeas corpus, and all other writs necessary or proper to the complete exercise of their appellate jurisdiction. Each of the justices thereof shall have the power to issue writs of habeas corpus to any part of his appellate district."

In the instant case the writ was issued, not by one justice of the court, but by the court itself. The above-quoted language of the Constitution affords ground for the contention that the limitation upon the right to issue the writ beyond the territorial limits of our appellate jurisdiction is confined to those cases where the writ is issued by a justice of the court and has no application where the writ is issued by the court itself. As was said by the author of the Supreme Court's opinion in the Older Case:

"* * * The language of section 4 of article VI of the Constitution is very general and it may be urged with much force that the words 'necessary or proper to the complete exercise of their appellate jurisdiction' modify, not the words 'mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, or habeas corpus' but refer exclusively to 'other writs.' This interpretation would give a district court of appeal jurisdiction to issue to any part of the state either of the four writs mentioned by name, but would limit its power to those designated as 'other writs.'" 157 Cal. 773, 109 Pac. 479.

However, it will not be necessary to determine whether this court had jurisdiction in this proceeding to issue the writ beyond the territorial limits of its appellate jurisdiction; for, even if it be assumed that the issuance of the writ beyond those limits was unauthorized, nevertheless, the writ did issue, and the warden, to whom it was directed, in obedience thereto, has brought petitioner into this appellate district and has produced him in court. Having been brought before this court, in obedience to the writ, we are not disposed to scan too critically the mode by which he got here, but to hold that, being here, the court has authority to make such order as the nature of the case may require. It was held by the Supreme Court of Georgia, in Simmons v. Georgia Iron & Coal Co., 117 Ga. 305, 43 S. E. 780, 61 L. R. A. 739, that although a judge may have no authority to issue a writ of habeas corpus directed to a person holding another in custody beyond certain territorial limits, yet, where he does issue the writ thus directed, and respondent obeys its mandate by producing into court the person detained, a plea that the court had no jurisdiction to issue the writ should be overruled and the cause of the detention inquired into. With this view of the law we are in full accord.

Our conclusion is that the confinement of petitioner in the state prison, during the continuance of our order staying execution of the judgment of conviction, is unwarranted and illegal, and that, during such time as our order staying execution may be in force, he should be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Los Angeles county, to be by him confined in the county jail in that county.

It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. ARGRUSA. (Cr. 874.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 13, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 9, 1920.)

1. Arson ⊂⊃37(3) — Proof of occupancy by lodgers, proof of ownership by others than accused.

In a prosecution for arson, proof that part of the building at the time of the offense was occupied by 35 persons as lodgers was sufficient proof of ownership of such building by persons other than accused, under Pen. Code, § 452, expressly making actual ownership of the building immaterial.

2. Criminal law ⊂⊃822(1)—Instructions to be read together.

The entire instructions on a given question are to be taken together, and the accused cannot predicate error upon a single instruction.

3. Criminal law ⊂⊃823(15)—Instruction as to reasonable doubt held not erroneous in view of other instructions.

An instruction, "The accused person under our system is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved, and in case of a reasonable doubt whether or not his guilt is satisfactorily shown he is entitled to an acquittal," held not erroneous for not containing the words "beyond a reasonable doubt" after "proved," and for containing the word "satisfactorily," in view of other instructions concerning reasonable doubt.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Tony Argrusa was convicted of arson, and he appeals. Affirmed.

William Sea, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of conviction of the crime of arson. Defendant was charged with willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and maliciously, on January 23, 1918, in the nighttime of said day, setting fire to and burning and causing to be burned that certain inhabited structure, building, and dwelling house of one Albert J. Nymand, known and designated as No. 607 Vallejo street, situated in the city and county of San Francisco, and with the felonious intent then, there, and thereby to destroy the same, the said structure, building, and dwelling house, as aforesaid, being then and there actually occupied and inhabited by human beings. Defendant pleaded not guilty, and upon the trial it was shown: That defendant conducted a musical instrument store in the premises at 607 Vallejo street. This was a three-story frame building, on the first floor of which was the store of defendant and the upper two stories of which building were occupied by lodgers. The fire occurred about 2 o'clock in the morning, and was plainly of incendiary origin. The cause of the fire was apparent from the testimony of the fire chief and his assistants and the policemen on duty in the neighborhood, all of whom arrived upon the scene within a few moments after an explosion had blown out the front window of the store. They found several hat boxes upon the floor, about four feet apart, in a line. These boxes contained gasoline, and the flames were springing up in a straight line directly from these receptacles. Some of these containers were introduced in evidence, as were also pictures showing the condition of the premises after the fire. The officers broke open the door of the building, and were obliged to send for reinforcements to get the lodgers out of the building. The defendant was notified by a police officer of the fire at his store, and he came to the premises while the firemen and police officers were there. He was questioned by the fire chief and by the police officer, and he stated, according to their testimony, that he was the only person who had a key to the store. The prosecution introduced testimony to the effect that the value of the musical instruments, fixtures, etc., in the store was approximately $1,200. The contents of the store was insured for $2,000.

Appellant's principal objection is that no proof was offered as to the ownership of the building, and that "the evidence shows that, for the purpose of this case, the appellant, Tony Argrusa, was the owner of 607 Vallejo street; that 607 Vallejo street was a musical instrument store, and not an inhabited structure, building, and dwelling house."

Section 452 of the Penal Code provides:

"To constitute arson it is not necessary that a person other than the accused should have had ownership in the building set on fire. It is sufficient that at the time of the burning another person was rightfully in possession of, or was actually occupying such building, or any part thereof."

In support of his contention that the record does not show the building at 607 Vallejo street to have been inhabited by human beings, appellant sets out, in his brief what he asserts to be all the evidence upon this question. An examination of the transcript discloses, in addition to the matter set out in appellant's brief, the following from the testimony of the fire marshal:

"Do you know the premises numbered 607 Vallejo street, in the city and county of San Francisco? A. I do. * * * Q. How are the two upper floors or stories of said building occupied? A. It is occupied as a lodging house. Q. Do you know how many lodgers were in the building that night [the night of the fire]? A. Thirty-five lodgers in the building."

Also, we find the following testimony by the battalion chief of the San Francisco Fire Department:

"Q. Do you know the premises numbered 607 Vallejo street, Chief? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you know how those premises are occupied and how they were occupied on the 23d of January, 1919? A. They were occupied as a store, and lodging above the stores. * * * Q. Upon the morning in question, namely upon the morning of the 23d day of January, 1919, were the upper two floors or stories of that building occupied? A. They were occupied. There were lodgers in them, and I sent for reinforcements to get them out."

[1] It is true that the case of People v. De Winton, 113 Cal. 404, 45 Pac. 708, 33 L. R. A. 374, 54 Am. St. Rep. 357, holds that under section 452, Penal Code, "to be the subject of arson, the building must be at least the qualified property of another—must be, at least, rightfully in the possession or occupancy of another at the time of the offense." But, surely, this requirement is met by proof that the building, at the time of the offense was occupied by 35 persons as lodgers. It is not necessary that any of these lodgers be the actual owner of the premises. It is sufficient that these lodgers were in the rightful possession and occupancy of a portion of the premises at the time of the alleged crime. The actual ownership of the building is expressly made immaterial by the provisions of section 452, Penal Code, and any statements respecting the same contained in the information may be treated as surplusage.

Appellant relies upon the case of People v. Myers, 20 Cal. 76, to support his position that the ownership of the building is an essential part of the description of the offense of arson, and must be proven. This case is not in point here, for the reason that it was decided in 1862, 10 years before the enactment of the section of the Penal Code above referred to, and at a time when the common law upon this question remained unmodified in this state. The statements of law in that opinion are modified in this state now by the above-quoted provisions of the Penal Code.

[2, 3] Appellant complains of the following instruction:

"The accused person under our system is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved, and in case of a reasonable doubt whether or not his guilt is satisfactorily shown, he is entitled to an acquittal."

The specific objections made by appellant are that the first part of the instruction should have contained the words "beyond a reasonable doubt" after "proved," and that the latter portion of the instruction should not have contained the word "satisfactorily." It is argued in connection with this last objection that the word "satisfactorily" can only mean, in this connection, "by a preponderance of evidence," and therefore it is erroneously used in the instruction. It is unnecessary for us to enter upon a pedantic discussion of the precise meaning of the word "satisfactorily" as used in this instruction. The entire instructions on a given question are to be taken together, and the defendant cannot predicate error upon a single instruction. People v. Worden, 113 Cal. 569, 45 Pac. 844; People v. Carantan, 11 Cal. App. 561, 105 Pac. 768. When the entire instructions in this case are read, it appears clearly that the jury were not led to believe that the question of what proof was "satisfactory" was to be left to the individual whim of each juror, varying with the credulity or incredulity of each juror, but that they were definitely instructed that the presumption of innocence abides with the defendant until the evidence convinces you to the contrary beyond a reasonable doubt. "Reasonable doubt" was then clearly defined by the court. Further, the jury was instructed:

"In order to convict the defendant of arson as charged in the information, the evidence must show beyond a reasonable doubt," etc.

And, further:

"I instruct you that in order to convict the defendant upon circumstantial evidence it is necessary, not only that all the facts concur to show that he committed the crime charged, but that they are inconsistent with any other reasonable conclusion. It is not sufficient that the circumstances proven coincide with, account for, or render probable the hypothesis of guilt, but they must exclude to a moral certainty every other hypothesis but the single one of guilt, or the jury must find the defendant not guilty."

The court also instructed:

"If you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant," etc.

It would therefore appear that the use of the word "satisfactorily" in the instruction complained of, taken in connection with all the other instructions given, could have conveyed no other impression than that the proof must be "satisfactorily" made from the standpoint of excluding all reasonable doubt as such doubt was defined by the court.

Without quoting further from the charge to the jury, it is sufficient to say that it appears from a reading of all the instructions that the jury could not have been mislead by the instruction of which complaint is made, and that the appellant was in no way prejudiced thereby.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: BRITTAIN, J.; NOURSE, J.

WOLFF v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES. EICHHOLZ v. SAME. KEYM v. SAME.

(Civ. 3450–3452.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 29, 1920. Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank, Denying Hearing, Nov. 24, 1920.)

1. Damages ⟸3—Rule of damnum absque injuria foundation of Code provisions for damages; "detriment."

The old rule of damnum absque injuria is the foundation of Civ. Code, § 3281, providing every person suffering detriment from the unlawful act or omission of another may recover compensation, and section 3282, providing that detriment is a loss or harm suffered in person or property, and unless the detriment is the result of an unlawful act or omission there is no right to damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Detriment.]

2. Eminent domain ⟸69 — Owner of private property injured for public benefit must be compensated.

It is fundamental that private property cannot be taken for a public use without compensation made, under Const. art. 1, § 14, and compensation must also be made to the owner if his property is injured for the public benefit.

3. Eminent domain ⟸82 — Compensation in some cases to owners of property not abutting on improvement.

Under Const. art. 1, § 14, owners of property, not directly abutting on or touched by part of a highway graded or closed, cannot be arbitrarily denied the right to damages, but, on the other hand, every depreciation in value of property by reason of a public improvement in the neighborhood cannot be made the basis of an award of damages.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

4. Eminent domain ⟸107 — No damages for injury occasioned by improvement in next block, though it lessened travel near plaintiff's property.

Under Const. art. 1, § 14, a landowner was not entitled to recover damages from a city by reason of an improvement, where the utmost that the evidence tended to show was that by reason of the grading of one block of a street located a considerable distance away and beyond another cross street, which in no way interfered with the easy and convenient access of plaintiff's property by other streets, the use of the street as a thoroughfare near plaintiff's property was not as extensive as before the grading.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. W. Myers, Judge.

Actions by Esther Wolff, Phillip Eichholz, and Sophia A. Keym, respectively against the City of Los Angeles. Judgments for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Ford & Hammond and Henry G. Bodkin, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Charles S. Burnell, City Atty., and R. L. Hanley, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. The plaintiffs in these three cases appeal from several judgments rendered against them upon nonsuits granted on motion of the respondent municipality. The cases were consolidated for the purpose of the respective appeals, it being stipulated that the judgment in the Wolff case should control the determination of the other two appeals. The plaintiffs as owners of their respective lots of land sued for damages for injuries claimed to have been suffered by them by reason of the depreciation of the values of their lands caused, as they alleged, by the opening of North Broadway tunnel and the grading of the approaches thereto and of adjacent streets in the city of Los Angeles. Except in regard to the exact location of the respective properties, their values and the amount of depreciation, if any, was caused by the opening of the tunnel, the facts of the three cases are the same and are unquestioned.

[1, 2] The work in question was done under ordinances adopted pursuant to a general act of the Legislature permitting such work to be done by municipalities under the assessment plan. No question is presented concerning the power of the municipality to order the work to be done, nor of the regularity of the procedure, nor is there any regarding the preliminary steps taken by the plaintiffs to perfect their right to sue. The sole question is whether upon the evidence before the court at the time the motion for nonsuit was made the respective plaintiffs were entitled to damages, or whether the cases were within the old rule that damages are never recoverable without a showing of legal injury. The old rule of damnum absque injuria is the foundation of the Code provisions that "every person who suffers detriment from the unlawful act or omission of another, may recover from the person in fault a compensation therefor in money, which is called damages." (Civ. Code, § 3281), and that "detriment is a loss or harm suffered in person or property" (Civ. Code, § 3282). In these cases it is claimed there was a loss or harm suffered in the property of the appellants, but unless this detriment was the result of an unlawful act or omission, there is no right to damages. As has been stated, there is no question concerning the lawfulness of the work done by the municipality. None of the property of the respective plaintiffs abutted on any of the work done, and therefore there was no physical taking of or change in the respective properties. It is fundamental that private property cannot be taken for public use without compensation made, and in this state since the adoption of the present Constitution in 1879, compensation must also be made to the owner if his property is injured for the public benefit. The claims of the plaintiffs rest, therefore, solely upon the contention that their properties have been injured for the public benefit without compensation having been made.

[3] In reliance upon decisions of the highest courts of other states and isolated texts of able writers upon the subjects of highways and municipal corporations, the parties before the court argue for and against the adoption of a rule which in such cases as these would arbitrarily deny the right to damages to owners of property not directly abutting on or touched by the part of the highway graded or closed. This court is unwilling to give approval to such a rule, which in its opinion would denude the constitutional provision of much of the benefit and security intended to be guaranteed to the property owner on its adoption. That the rule contended for on the part of the municipality is too narrow this court has no doubt. On the other hand, the court is not of the opinion that every depreciation in value of property by reason of a public improvement in the neighborhood can be made the basis of an award of damages. For instance, the owner of a store or apartment house on a much-traveled street might lose the greater part of his trade, or the rental or sale value of his property might be cut in half, by the public grading and improving another and parallel street one or two blocks away, which, by giving more direct access to distant parts of the city, or by causing the adjoining property to be improved with newer and more attractive buildings, would cause the public to use the newly improved thoroughfare and largely to abandon the old, yet that indirect result of the lawful improvement would not give rise to damages. For any one of a multitude of reasons, or for no reason at all, traffic may swing from one street to another at any time, and when one buys property he buys with knowledge of such fortuitous changes.

The constitutional provision in question (article 1, § 14), is that—

"Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having first been made," etc.

It has been under consideration by the Supreme Court in a number of cases, but the exact question presented here has never been directly answered. In the first case where the right to compensation for damage to property arose after the adoption of the present Constitution, the court, adopting the language of Mr. Justice Thornton, said:

"To what kind of damage does this word 'damaged' refer? We think it refers to something more than a direct or immediate damage to private property, such as its invasion or spoliation. There is no reason why this word should be construed in any other than its ordinary and popular sense. It embraces more than the taking. If it did not refer to more than the damage above mentioned, the word 'damaged' in the clause relied on would be superfluous. [Page 501.] * * * The provision includes damage to private property, including land and whatever is attached to it. [Pages 505–506.] * * * We do not intend to say, nor do we think, it extends to such damage as the owner of the property injured sustains in common with the other abutters on the street or the general public, but only to that special injury which he receives over and above such common injury." Reardon v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. 492, 6 Pac. 317, 56 Am. Rep. 109.

In the Reardon Case there was physical injury to the plaintiff's land. Recovery for that injury might have been had as for a tort, upon a proper showing, regardless of the constitutional provision. The language of the decision was broad enough to reach a case where there was no physical injury. Suppose, for instance, one owned property on a street having an outlet in one direction only, and the municipality should grade the only cross street to a level so far above or so far below that of the street on which the property was located as to make access to the property practically impossible. If such a condition existed, the damage would be within the protection of the Constitution and the right of the owner to recover would in no way depend on the proximity of the injured lot to the actual work done, nor would the fact that the particular lot was not physically injured have any proper weight in the consideration of the case. There is nothing at variance with these views in the case of Eachus v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry., 103 Cal. 617, 37 Pac. 751, 42 Am. St. Rep. 149, where it is said:

"The Constitution does not, however, authorize a remedy for every diminution in the value of property that is caused by a public improvement. The damage for which compensation is to be made is a damage to the property itself, and does not include a mere infringement of the owner's personal pleasure or enjoyment. Merely rendering private property less desirable for certain purposes, or even causing personal annoyance or discomfort in its use, will not constitute the damage contemplated by the Constitution; but the property itself must suffer some diminution in substance, or be rendered intrinsically less valuable by reason of the public use."

In the case supposed of a lot on a cul-de-sac entirely cut off from access, while there would be no physical detriment to the lot itself, there would be a substantial diminution of its availability for any purpose, and it would be rendered intrinsically less valuable by reason of the public use. In such an instance, the rule of the Reardon Case would apply. In numerous later cases the salutary rules of the Reardon and Eachus Cases have been applied, and there is no great difficulty in applying them to these appeals, without laying down the rule contended for by the respondent municipality.

Stated most strongly for the appellants, at the time of the motion for nonsuit, the evidence showed that the lands of the respective appellants were situated at or near a street parallel with North Broadway. Another parallel street intervened between the two. The lands were near or abutted on a transverse street, known as California street, parallel to which, one block away, ran Temple street. The first block of California street between North Broadway and the lands of the appellants was necessarily graded, and the incline was increased, so that it was not so convenient for use as it had been. The grade on Temple street was not changed, and the lands in question were readily accessible by way of that street. There was less traffic along California street than formerly, but it did not appear that this was caused entirely by the grading of California street. Rentals were depreciated, but the witnesses for the respective plaintiffs differed greatly, both in regard to the degree of depreciation and the fractional part thereof which might have been caused by the grading, since it was admitted that rentals and sale values of all the land in the vicinity had been falling for a considerable time and extent by reason of local conditions in no way connected with the public improvement. The motion for nonsuit was general, and upon the ground that the plaintiffs had failed to prove any damage for which they were entitled to recover. The cases are clearly within the rule announced in Eachus v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry., supra.

The judgment is affirmed in each of the three appeals.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [4] Without committing ourselves to all that is said in the District Court of Appeal opinion, we think the opinion clearly shows that in this case there was no such damage shown as to warrant a recovery. The utmost that the evidence tends to show is that by reason of the grading of one block of California street, located a considerable distance from plaintiff's property and beyond another cross street, which in no way interfered with the easy and convenient access to plaintiff's property by other streets, the use of California street as a thoroughfare near plaintiff's property was not as extensive as before such grading. Assuming this to have been proven, it did not show that damage contemplated by the constitutional provision. This is sufficiently shown by the opinion of the District Court of Appeal.

The application for a hearing in this court is denied.

All concur.

CLARK v. JOHNSTON et al. SAME v. CAMPIN et al. SAME v. TAYLOR et al.

(Civ. 3211, S. F. 9636.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 20, 1920. Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank, Denying Hearing, Nov. 19, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸931(3) — To support order findings presumed to have been made.

No formal findings of facts having been filed, court must be presumed on appeal to have found to be true evidence and affidavits, filed in support of a motion to set aside satisfaction of judgment, in support of an order granting such motion.

2. Judgment ⟸898(2) — Satisfaction entered by fraud set aside on motion.

A party to the record may have a satisfaction of judgment entered in fraud of his rights set aside on motion in the immediate action in which the judgment is entered.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

3. Judgment ⟸898(4) — Satisfaction, fraudulently entered, set aside on motion of third person.

Where promissory notes were assigned to another for the sole purpose of a suit upon them, and defendants knew that plaintiff was merely a nominal party, a satisfaction, given pursuant to an arrangement between the nominal plaintiff and the judgment debtors, which was in actual fraud of the real party in interest in the judgment, will be set aside, on motion of such real party in interest, under Code Civ. Proc. § 385.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Actions by W. A. Clark against D. R. Johnston and A. B. Davis, against D. D. Campin and A. B. Davis, and against Ambrose Taylor and A. B. Davis, consolidated. Judgments for plaintiff. From orders, on motions by J. J. Rauer and by J. A. Miller, vacating satisfaction of judgments, the defendants appeal. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Fred C. Peterson, for appellants.

H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, for respondents.

BEASLY, Judge pro tem. These are appeals by the defendants in the several cases from identical orders vacating in each case a satisfaction of judgment theretofore entered in favor of the respective plaintiffs in the actions entitled as above. The orders were made upon the motion of the respondent Rauer, a stranger to the record. There are three cases similar in all respects, consolidated by stipulation and tried together in the superior court, and they are here upon a consolidated record under section 941a et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Avoiding so far as possible unnecessary detail the facts of the three cases may be stated as follows: Clark, the plaintiff, was a bookkeeper in the office of Rauer, a collector. Rauer held three promissory notes as indorsee or assignee against Davis and his codefendants. Rauer transferred these notes to Clark by assignments absolute in form. The purpose of the assignments was solely that Clark's name should be used as plaintiff in these actions, which were accordingly begun in his name, one against Johnston and Davis, another against Campin and Davis, and the third against Taylor and Davis. A fourth action not embodied in this record figured in the facts as they finally developed in the trial court. These cases went to judgment in favor of plaintiff, the amounts thereof and of the fourth judgment above enumerated aggregating about $3,500. In this state of the cases Clark, at the instance of Davis, satisfied the judgments by directions in writing to the clerk, which the latter obeyed by entering the satisfactions of record. For these satisfactions Clark took from Davis a check for $50 and a promissory note for $1,950. Clark made no profit personally from the transaction, as he turned over and delivered the check and the note to Rauer's attorney, who was also Clark's attorney in the case. In one of the actions a writ of attachment had been issued and levied, and to secure the release of the property taken under this writ the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland had, at the instance of Davis and his codefendant, executed an undertaking, and the surety company, in turn, in order to secure itself, had taken from the defendants in the action certain collateral. This was released upon presentation to the surety company of proof of satisfaction executed by Clark. The rights of the Fidelity & Deposit Company are not involved in this matter, as no attempt was made in the proceedings following the satisfaction to re-establish any rights of Rauer or Clark against it. Davis by securing the satisfaction of the several judgments, if it is permitted to stand, will profit to the extent of having settled judgments in about the sum of $3,500 for a promissory note of problematical value and $50 in cash, and also by having procured the release of the collateral held by the surety company as security for its undertaking given upon the release of the levy of the writ of attachment.

[1] Following this satisfaction proceedings were instituted by Rauer upon which this appeal is predicated. Rauer in each action noticed a motion to set aside the satisfaction. This motion was based upon the ground that the satisfaction of judgment "was made and entered without right and without consideration." In support of his motion Rauer filed certain affidavits of himself and his attorney, showing that Clark had no interest whatever in the notes or in the judgment; that the assignments to him had been made solely for purposes of collection, and only with the intent upon his part and upon that of Rauer that he should nominally be plaintiff in the action; that he was not permitted to conduct or manage the litigation in any way; that he paid none of the costs, and that he was in short a mere figurehead in the case, and that Clark had nothing whatever to do with the actions except that they were prosecuted in his name; that at all times Rauer was the owner of the notes and judgments, and that all these facts were at all times known to Davis; that Rauer had never authorized Clark to adjust, compromise, or settle the actions or to satisfy the judgments therein; and that Clark had no authority to do any of these things. Certain counter affidavits were filed in the matter, but the trial court found in accordance with the facts above stated, or at least it must be presumed to have so found in support of the order which it subsequently made; no formal findings upon the matter having been filed. Certain oral testimony was presented at the hearing, and, among other things, Rauer testified that he had told Davis distinctly that Clark had no interest whatever in the judgments. Upon this state of the record the trial court vacated the satisfaction of judgment in each case.

[2] Upon this record it is contended by appellants that Rauer, being a stranger to the record, could not be heard to move to vacate the satisfaction. Of course, a party to the record may have a satisfaction, entered in fraud of his rights, set aside on motion in the immediate action in which the judgment is entered. Haggin v. Clark, 61 Cal. 1. This case takes us so far in the controversy upon firm ground. The Court of Appeals of the state of New York went a step further in the case of McGregor v. Comstock, 28 N. Y. 237. The case involved facts so nearly like those of the case before us as to be indistinguishable in principle. Comstock, a tenant of Winthrop, was sued in ejectment by McGregor and others. Comstock had judgment for his costs. The plaintiffs and their attorneys knew from the beginning of the action that Comstock was not the real defendant in the case, but that Winthrop was the person in whose interest the defense was being made. The judgment was satisfied by Comstock unknown to and without consultation with Winthrop, after the latter had procured an execution and its levy against property of some of the defendants. The Court of Appeals, affirming an order vacating the satisfaction, said:

"The order appealed from should be affirmed, whether the application for the order be regarded as made by defendant's attorney on his own behalf to enforce his lien as attorney, or on behalf of his client, who was the real party in interest, and defended the action in the name of the nominal defendant for his own benefit."

After a further discussion the writer of the opinion continues:

"I am also of the opinion that under the circumstances Winthrop is to be regarded as the equitable assignee of the judgment as between him and Comstock, and that the giving of the satisfaction piece by Comstock was a fraud upon the rights of Winthrop. Winthrop had assumed the whole defense of the action, and incurred all the expenses of the litigation. Comstock paid nothing, and was liable for nothing to the attorney employed to defend. He had no equitable or legal right to the fruits of the judgment. The payment of the judgment to Comstock with knowledge of the facts was a fraud upon Winthrop. The facts disclosed in the affidavit show conclusively that a fraud was intended to be perpetrated. It would be a reproach to the law if such purpose could not be defeated."

In a case of similar import, but where the facts differed in this, that the judgment was assigned after it was entered, the Supreme Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey said:

"Where there has been a cancellation of judgment procured by fraud and mistake, * * * this court has the power to vacate such cancellation, and restore the lien of the judgments, saving the rights of intervening creditors, who have in good faith and without notice, given credit and obtained liens upon belief that such judgments have been legally satisfied." Keogh v. Delaney, 40 N. J. Law, 97.

The case presented the following facts: At the request of Delaney and his son, who was his surety, one Bonnell paid Keogh his judgment and took an assignment thereof. Delaney gave Bonnell a note for the amount, for which it was agreed that the judgment should stand as collateral. Delaney applied to Keogh's attorney for a satisfaction, which was given him inadvertently and procured without Bonnell's knowledge. This act on the part of Delaney was held to be fraudulent, and upon motion of Bonnell the satisfaction was set aside.

Potter v. Hunt & Sloane, 68 Mich. 242, 36 N. W. 58, presents from a somewhat different standpoint the same principle. Potter sued Hunt and Sloane on two promissory notes. Hunt successfully defended to judgment for his costs. Potter knew that Hunt had defended the case alone; that Sloane was insolvent and friendly to Potter and desired his success in the litigation, Sloane's action in satisfying the judgment was set aside by the court on the ground that it was a fraud upon Hunt. It will be noted that, while Sloane was a nominal party to the action, he had taken absolutely no part in the defense of the cause, and had apparently given all the aid and comfort possible to the plaintiff in the case.

It was held in Henry v. Traynor, 42 Minn. 234, 44 N. W. 11, that the entry of satisfaction of judgment may be vacated when it operates to the disadvantage of a third party having a lien on the judgment or entitled to be protected or secured by it.

In our own state there is no direct authority upon the point at issue. The nearest approach to it, aside from the case of Haggin v. Clark, supra, is the provision of the Code of Civil Procedure (section 385) that in case of certain transfers of interest the action or proceeding may be continued in the name of the original party, or the court may allow the person to whom the transfer is made to be substituted in the action or proceeding. Under that section if Rauer had taken an assignment from Clark upon the entry of judgment, or of the notes before judgment, the case could have proceeded under Clark's name, and satisfaction by Clark would have been open to attack by Rauer; and if, as was suggested by the Court of Appeals of New York in the case of McGregor v. Comstock, supra, the real owner be regarded as the equitable assignee of the judgment, then we see no reason why the proceeding by motion of Rauer is not appropriate. No one is injured by this proceeding. It has been invited by the bad faith of Clark and Davis in satisfying the judgment and attempting to settle the same in fraud of the rights of Rauer.

It is argued that Davis was under no obligation to consult Rauer at all; that the assignment for collection vested legal title to the notes in Clark as assignee, which was sufficient to entitle him to recover; and that, although Rauer retained an equitable interest in the claim as between him and Clark, this was no concern of Davis; and general language can be found to this effect in Kelly v. Hampton, 22 Cal. App. 68, 133 Pac. 339; Gradwohl v. Harris, 29 Cal. 150; Toby v. Oregon Pacific R. R. Co., 98 Cal. 490, 33 Pac. 207, and perhaps in other cases. But the general language quoted in appellant's argument, to the effect that Rauer's interest was no concern of Davis, cannot be fairly stretched to cover a fraud perpetrated by Davis and Clark upon Rauer. None of these cases was decided in contemplation of such a situation, as has arisen in the case before us.

If we be correct in the conclusion reached upon the point already discussed in this opinion, it is not necessary to discuss other questions raised by the parties to this appeal.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, P. J.; RICHARDS, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [3] In denying a rehearing we deem it well to say, in order to avoid any possible misapprehension, that, as we understand the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, the order setting aside the satisfaction is upheld and justified, because the evidence shows, as it amply does, that the satisfaction was given pursuant to an arrangement between the nominal plaintiff and the judgment debtor, which was in actual fraud of the real party in interest in the judgment. We do not take the opinion as intending to decide that where a judgment debtor in good faith secures by way of settlement a satisfaction of the judgment from the nominal judgment creditor, the settlement and resulting satisfaction can be set aside upon proof merely that the judgment creditor was a nominal party only, and that the judgment debtor knew that fact. The question which would be presented by such a case would be quite different from that actually presented here, and there is no necessity for expressing any opinion concerning it, and we do not understand the District Court of Appeal to have done so.

All concur.

SIMPSON et al v. HOSIN. (Civ. 2216.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 16, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 13, 1920.)

1. Venue ⟹67—Affidavit for change need not expressly show nonresidence in county from which change is sought.

An affidavit by a sole defendant for a change of venue from S. county to Y. county, alleging that defendant resides and has resided continuously for three years in Y. county, is sufficient without stating expressly that defendant is not a resident of S. county.

2. Venue ⟹66—Affidavit of merits on application for change held sufficient.

An affidavit of merits in support of a motion for a change of venue, stating that defendant had retained E. as his attorney and counsel and had fully and fairly stated the facts of the case to "my said attorney and counsel and said E." and was advised by "said attorney and counsel" and believed that he had a good and substantial defense, was sufficient, notwithstanding the use of the word "and" between "attorney and counsel" and the name of the attorney, especially as it might be rejected as surplusage.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Action by Clarence Simpson and another against Mohammad Hosin. From an order changing the place of trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellants.

J. E. Ebert, of Marysville, for respondent.

PREWITT, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an unusually frivolous appeal. The defendant, on motion, procured an order changing the place of trial from the county of San Joaquin to the county of Yuba, on the ground that he resides in the latter county. The appellants appeal from this order. The record is utterly barren of debatable questions. Only two points are made by the appellants.

[1] 1. It is claimed that the affidavit does not show affirmatively that the defendant was not a resident of the county of San Joaquin. But the Code does not require this negative showing. Section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an action must be tried in the county in which the defendant resides at the commencement of the action. The moving party in his affidavit states:

"At the time of the commencement of the action I did reside, and do now reside and continuously for more than three years immediately last past I have resided, in the county of Yuba, etc."

Certain authorities are cited by the appellants, but these authorities are not in point; in fact, they have no application to the case of a sole defendant.

[2] 2. Objection is made that the affidavit of merits does not state that the defendant was advised by his counsel that he had a good defense to the action on the merits. The portions of the affidavit of the defendant material to this point are as follows:

"I have employed and retained J. E. Ebert * * * as my attorney and counsel in said action, * * * that I have fully and fairly stated all the facts of the case in said action, and that I have fully and fairly stated the case in this action to my said attorney and counsel and said J. E. Ebert and under such statement I am advised by my said attorney and counsel, and I verily believe I have a good and substantial defense on the merits to said action."

The use of the word "and" following the words "attorney and counsel" is manifestly a mere scrivener's mistake. The court may reject this word as surplusage, but even as the affidavit is written there exists no ambiguity. The affiant states that he has stated the facts of the case to said attorney and counsel and that he is advised by said attorney and counsel, etc.

The order is affirmed with $100 damages for a frivolous appeal.

PEOPLE v. BACA et al. (Cr. 504.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 16, 1920.)

Assault and battery ⊂=96(3)—Instruction on self-defense not required under evidence.

In a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, where defendant in his testimony denied that he had a weapon or that he cut any one, he was not entitled to an instruction on the law of self-defense as concerns the cutting.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Ralph Baca and Angel Lopez were convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and from the judgment of conviction and an order denying their motion for a new trial, they appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

Frank A. Henning, of Stockton, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. Defendants were charged by information of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon, committed in the county of San Joaquin, and upon a trial they were convicted of the offense charged. They moved for a new trial, which motion was denied, and judgment was pronounced that each defendant pay a fine of $360.

Appellants contend that on account of the trial court's refusal to give any instructions on self-defense they are entitled to have the judgment reversed and a new trial granted. It appears from the evidence that the defendants entered the restaurant of the prosecuting witness Aurelio Torres, in the city of Stockton, at about 11:30 p. m., on the 3d day of November, 1919. The defendant Baca placed a nickel in the slot of the piano, and no music followed. He complained about the failure of the piano to play, and Aurelio Torres returned a nickel to him, and ordered him and his companion Angel Lopez out of the place. They remained inside and commenced to call Torres a robber, whereupon Torres ejected them from the room. They returned, each with a knife in his hand, and the defendant Baca cut Torres on the right arm. The testimony of Baca shows that there was no claim whatever that he was acting in self-defense, and was therefore not entitled to any instruction on the law of self-defense. People v. Turley, 50 Cal. 469. He testified as follows:

"Q. Well did you come back at any time? A. No, sir. Q. Did you cut anybody? A. I went across and fell down. Kind of in the middle of the street; then I went across and looked for help, for an officer, over to the Main street. Q. Who were you looking for? A. Looking for an officer. Q. Did you ever at any time that evening take a knife out of your pocket? A. No, sir. Q. Are you positive of that? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you at any time cut any one? A. No, sir. Q. Did you at any time ever have a knife open that evening? A. No, sir. * * * Q. But you are positive you never cut any one that night? A. I am sure not."

By this testimony the defendant Baca denies that he had a knife in his hand that night, or that he cut any one, and therefore there is nothing in his testimony on which to base any claim that he was acting in self-defense as concerns the cutting.

As to the defendant Angel Lopez there is also nothing to show that he, as an aider and abettor of Baca, was acting in self-defense. No showing of self-defense appears, and there is nothing in the testimony or evidence in the case as to either defendant which called for instructions on self-defense.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HERMAN. (Cr. 516.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 18, 1920.)

1. Criminal law ⊂=406(7)—Conversation with defendant prior to theft held admissible as showing preparation.

In a prosecution for theft of wool, alleged to have been stolen by defendant's employé and sold in defendant's name, defendant giving the employé a certain amount per pound, a conversation between defendant and the purchaser prior to the theft, as to the price the purchaser would pay for wool, was admissible as bearing upon the question of defendant's preparation to commit the crime charged.

2. Criminal law ⊂=386 — Conversation over telephone with man giving defendant's name held admissible.

In a prosecution for grand larceny, where it was charged that defendant and an employé stole wool, and that the employé sold it at a certain place in the name of defendant, the court did not err in permitting a bookkeeper for the purchaser to testify that on the morning of the delivery of the wool she had a telephone conversation with a man who said his name was H. (the name of the defendant), and that he was expecting his man to come in there with some wool and not to give him the price, etc.

3. Criminal law ⊜406(7)—Offer of defendant to third person of chance to make money held admissible.

In a prosecution for theft of wool, testimony that on a date prior to the theft defendant asked witness if he "wanted to make a little change," to which the witness replied, "Sure," and defendant said to "go out with G. some night and help him to haul in some stuff. He did not say what stuff"—was admissible as bearing upon the question of preparation of defendant to commit the crime charged; G. and another actually taking the wool.

4. Larceny ⊜70(1)—Instruction as to defendant's knowledge of taking of property by employé held properly refused.

In a prosecution for theft of wool, taken by defendant's employé and sold to a reduction works in the name of defendant, who was afterwards paid the money and paid the employé a certain amount, the court did not err in refusing to instruct, "Even if you find that after the wool had been delivered to the S. reduction works by the witness G. and his associate, and before the payment of any money by defendant, he learned or had reasonable grounds to believe that the wool had in fact been stolen by said G. and his associate, but notwithstanding this, if you should not be satisfied that the defendant had any knowledge of or anything to do with the removal of said wool to said destination in S., then you must find the defendant not guilty," for the reason that if the evidence showed the felonious connection of defendant with the taking of the wool at any time before it was delivered in S., the effect of such evidence should not be destroyed by the giving of such instruction.

5. Criminal law ⊜829(2)—Requested instruction held properly refused, in view of charge given.

In a prosecution for grand larceny, there was no error in the refusal of instructions that defendant "is on trial charged with the crime of grand larceny and for no other crime or offense," and "that the defendant in this action is not on trial for the crime of receiving or dealing in stolen property," where the court fully instructed the jury that the defendant was on trial upon the charge of grand larceny.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

M. Herman was convicted of grand larceny and appeals from the judgment of conviction and an order denying his motion for new trial. Judgment and order affirmed.

W. H. Carlin and W. P. Rich, both of Marysville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. The defendant, with one Venice Gibbons, was accused of having, on the 17th day of November, 1919, stolen four sacks of wool from one W. F. Hoke in Sutter county. The said Gibbons pleaded guilty, and this defendant was tried, and, on the 14th day of January, 1920, was convicted of the crime of grand larceny. From the judgment and order denying motion for new trial defendant prosecutes this appeal.

It appears from the evidence that on the 17th day of November, 1919, the defendant was, and for some time prior thereto had been, engaged in conducting a junk business in the city of Marysville, under the name of American Junk Company. The said Venice Gibbons was on this day working for him, and for some time prior thereto he had been in defendant Herman's employ, going out in the country and gathering up junk, which he hauled to defendant's junk yard. The wool belonging to the said W. F. Hoke was stored in a shed in the usual wool sacks on his ranch in Sutter county, about 12 miles from the city of Marysville. Some time prior to the 17th day of November, the said Gibbons and the defendant had been out in the vicinity of the shed and had seen the wool, but no conversation was had between them at that time about the wool. On the afternoon of the 17th of November, 1919, Gibbons and another man were seen in the vicinity of this wool shed, at which time there were 16 sacks of wool piled upon a wagon preparatory to hauling it to market. On the night of November 17th the said Gibbons and another party took from this wagon 4 sacks of wool (weighing 962 pounds) upon a small truck belonging to the defendant, and hauled it to Marysville, thence to Sacramento, where they arrived some time before morning, and about 7 o'clock in the morning of November 18th they went to the "Sacramento Reduction Works," conducted by one Frank Repetta, where they left the wool in the name of the American Junk Company, and received from Repetta a tag showing the number of pounds. With this tag they returned to Marysville, where Gibbons saw the defendant and gave him the tag. The other party was not seen by the defendant. Defendant then called up the "Sacramento Reduction Works," and inquired the number of pounds of wool which had been stored, and, not being satisfied with the answer, went to Sacramento the forenoon of the said 18th of November, and saw Repetta, and from him learned it to be a fact that the number of pounds of wool reported had been in fact delivered, and he then returned to Marysville and saw Gibbons and paid him for the wool at the rate of 20 cents per pound.

Before this wool was stolen, according to the testimony of Venice Gibbons, he was given encouragement and assistance by defendant in the theft. Gibbons used the defendant's truck to take and transport the stolen wool to Sacramento, and after its delivery at

Sacramento he reported to and delivered the weight tag to the defendant, which tag was found on the defendant's person by the sheriff of Yuba county at the time of his arrest, and the check in payment of the wool was forwarded by the "Sacramento Reduction Works" to the "American Junk Company."

The testimony of Venice Gibbons clearly shows the facts connected with the larceny and the defendant's knowledge of the same and his connection with the asportation and the disposition of the wool at Sacramento, and the testimony of the said Gibbons as to the defendant's connection with this larceny is sufficiently corroborated.

[1] It is claimed by the appellant that the court erred in allowing the witness Frank Repetta to testify, over defendant's objection that some three or four days before the 17th day of November, 1919, he had a conversation with the defendant, in which he told defendant that if he could buy the wool he would pay him 35 cents a pound for it f. o. b. Sacramento. We do not think that the court erred in overruling defendant's objection to this evidence. It appears from the testimony of Venice Gibbons that prior to the 17th day of November, 1919, the defendant was with him out in the vicinity of the shed where the wool of W. F. Hoke was then stored, and that they saw the wool; that several days afterwards the defendant told him to go ahead and get some wool and he would pay him 20 cents a pound for it. In view of this testimony, we are of the opinion that the above conversation of Repetta with the defendant as to the price Repetta would pay for wool was admissible as bearing upon the question of defendant's preparation to commit the crime charged, and whether this testimony was full and complete, or only partial, would have reference merely to its weight and not to its admissibility.

[2] Complaint is made of the court's action in permitting the witness Mary Koewler, the bookkeeper for the "Sacramento Reduction Works," to testify, over defendant's objection, that on the morning of the 18th day of November, 1919, being the morning of the delivery of the wool, she had a telephone conversation with a man who said his name was Herman (the name of defendant) of the American Junk Company who said "he was expecting his man to come in there with some wool and not to give him the price, and I told him the gentleman had been there, and that I didn't give him the price." This testimony was admissible, and it was a matter for the jury to determine what weight should be given to the same.

[3] The objection of the defendant to the testimony of the witness J. W. Riley was properly overruled. This testimony was to the effect that the defendant, on or about the 15th day of November, 1919, asked him if he "wanted to make a little change," to which the witness replied, "Sure," and he said to "go out with Venice Gibbons some night and help him to haul in some stuff. He didn't say what stuff." This evidence was admissible as bearing upon the question of preparation of defendant to commit the crime charged, and the jury had the right to consider this evidence in connection with the other evidence and circumstances in the case, and to determine whether or not the defendant in so speaking to the said Riley was asking him to go with the said Venice Gibbons and steal the particular wool which was thereafter stolen.

[4] Complaint is made of the trial court's refusal to give certain instructions requested by the defendant. In our opinion the court did not err in refusing the following proposed instruction:

"I instruct you that even if you should find that after the wool had been delivered to the Sacramento Reduction Works by the witness Gibbons, and his associate, and before the payment of any money by defendant, he learned or had reasonable grounds to believe that the wool had in fact been stolen by said Gibbons and his associate, but notwithstanding this, if you should not be satisfied that the defendant had any knowledge of, or anything to do with the removal of said wool to said destination in Sacramento, then you must find the defendant not guilty."

We think the court properly refused this proposed instruction for the reason that if the evidence in the case showed the felonious connection of the defendant with the taking of the wool at any time before it was delivered in Sacramento to the "Sacramento Reduction Works," the effect of such evidence should not be destroyed by the giving of this proposed instruction.

[5] There was no error in the refusal of the instructions to the effect that the defendant "is on trial charged with the crime of grand larceny, and for no other crime or offense," and "that the defendant in this action is not on trial for the crime of receiving or dealing in stolen property," as the court in its instructions fully instructed the jury that the defendant was on trial upon the charge of grand larceny.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. TAYLOR. (Cr. 921.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 16, 1920.)

1. Criminal law ⟸1159(4) — Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

In a prosecution for rape on a girl of the age of 13, the appellate court will not reverse a conviction, although the story of the complaining witness on the record seemed to be rather improbable.

2. Criminal law ⟸1160—Appellate court cannot substitute judgment for that of jury and trial court.

An appellate court cannot substitute its judgment for that of the jury, or for that of the trial court, expressed in denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

David G. Taylor was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. N. Young and P. A. Fontaine, both of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of the defendant upon the charge of rape. The sole point urged by the appellant is that there was no sufficient evidence to justify the verdict against him or the judgment rendered thereon. In support of this contention the appellant quotes largely from the evidence in the case, which he insists sustains his claim that he was convicted upon the unsupported testimony of the complaining witness, who not only related an improbable story, and one which was unsupported by the facts and circumstances surrounding the alleged rape, but was contradicted by strong and clear testimony in favor of the defense.

We do not deem it necessary or profitable to relate in detail the sordid story which the complaining witness, a colored girl of the age of 13 years, has told with respect to her ravishment by the defendant, who is also of colored extraction and of the age of 54 years at the time of the trial The story which the complaining witness related upon said trial, it must be conceded, appears to be quite improbable upon the face of the record presented to us; but the jury in the case saw both the accused and the complaining witness, his accuser, and heard the stories told by each, and also saw and heard the witnesses whom the defendant produced to support his denials of any criminal intercourse with the complaining witness, and whose statements, if believed, would render not only improbable, but practically impossible, the story which the complaining witness related. The jury had also before it certain facts and circumstances which cast much doubt upon the truth of the statements made by the accused and his supporting witnesses. Some of these facts and circumstances may be briefly referred to:

The defendant produced as one of his witnesses a colored woman named Reeves, who testified very strongly in his favor, stating that she was stopping in the defendant's house at the very times when the several acts of intercourse, according to the complaining witness' story, were committed; that she occupied the bed in which the complaining witness also slept, and from which the accused called her to his own bed in the adjoining room for the purpose of committing the criminal acts complained of; and that no such occurrences as those to which the complaining witness testified ever took place. The importance of this witness and her testimony to the accused is apparent, and yet the record shows that upon his preliminary examination, wherein he and his son and daughter testified fully, no mention was made by any of them of the presence of this vital witness in his house at the very time the acts complained of were alleged to have been committed. The entire omission of any reference to this witness by the defendant and his other witnesses at the time of the preliminary examination, if she was where she testified she was upon the trial of the case, called for a credible explanation, and the attempt of the accused to explain away this omission was lame and unsatisfactory to a degree that would have justified the jury in believing that her story, related upon the trial, was a tissue of falsehoods.

Again, a letter was produced at the trial, purporting to have been written by the defendant to the mother of the complaining witness after the condition of the latter became known, showing solicitude for his own safety and expressing a willingness to marry the girl. While it is true that this letter also contains a denial of any improper relations with the daughter, it is such a letter as apparently required some explanation as to the circumstances under which it was written. The defendant testified that he did not write the letter himself, but gave its substance in a dictation to his daughter, who wrote and signed the letter on his behalf, and that he did not instruct her to insert the clause in the letter expressing his willingness to marry the girl. This letter was produced upon the trial, and in connection with it there were also produced certain exhibits in the handwriting of the son of the accused. A comparison of these exhibits with the letter shows indubitably that the letter in question was written by the defendant's son, and not by his daughter, as testified to by him, and also by the daughter. Why the defendant and his witnesses sought so studiously to becloud the authorship of this letter may not be very clear; but one thing is clear, and that is that their stories with reference to its origin and authorship are false. The jury, perceiving this, may well have made application of the instruction given them by the trial court to the effect that, if they believed a witness to have sworn falsely in any material part of his testimony, he was to be distrusted in other parts of it.

[1, 2] There are certain other particulars, not necessary to be detailed, wherein much doubt was thrown upon the truth of the testimony offered by the accused and his witnesses; and this leaves the case in a condition where, conceding the story of the complaining witness to be, upon the cold record before us, rather improbable, it is not such a story as we are prepared to say was unbelievable; and, this being so, since the jury with all of the parties before it believed her story, and disbelieved the contradicting testimony of the accused and of his witnesses, we are unable to say that the evidence was insufficient to warrant his conviction. To do so would be to substitute our judgment for that of the jury, and for that of the trial court expressed in denying the defendant's motion for a new trial, and this, under the jurisdiction upon appeal committed to us, we have no authority to do. People v. Fitzgerald, 138 Cal. 40, 70 Pac. 1014; People v. Burke, 18 Cal. App. 80, 122 Pac. 435; People v. Preston, 19 Cal. App. 685, 127 Pac. 660.

CLINE v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (L. A. 6465.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 18, 1920. Rehearing Denied Dec. 16, 1920.)

1. Officers ⟸74—Accusation may be made by another officer in private capacity.

Under Pen. Code, § 772, authorizing summary proceedings for removal of an officer on accusation verified by the oath of any person, the court acquires jurisdiction by an accusation by an individual, though it was shown that that individual was chairman of the board of supervisors of the county, and had been instructed to present the accusation by vote of the board.

2. Officers ⟸66—Crimes or corrupt acts may be made basis of accusation for removal.

Proceedings for removal of an officer on charges presented by the grand jury under Pen. Code, § 758, and on accusation by an individual under section 772, are cumulative remedies, so that acts which constitute crimes, or which have been willfully or corruptly done, may be the subject of an accusation under section 772, though they may be also the subject of charges under section 758.

3. Jury ⟸19(12)—Jury trial not authorized on accusation for removal of officer.

Pen. Code, § 772, providing for removal of an officer after summary trial on accusation verified by an individual does not authorize a trial by jury.

4. Constitutional law ⟸42—Officers ⟸74 — Hold office subject to statute authorizing proceedings for removal.

Though in an ordinary controversy between a civil officer and a private citizen or between the officer and the state or any other officer, the right to the office is treated as a property right, the office is nevertheless held subject to the statutory proceedings provided for removal of the officer, so that an officer cannot object to the proceeding prescribed for his removal or to the jurisdiction of the tribunal to which an accusation for removal is presented in accordance with the law of the state.

5. Officers ⟸61—Proceeding for removal authorized by Constitution.

Proceedings under Pen. Code, § 772, for the removal of an officer for misconduct are not in effect prosecutions for crime, but are under the authority granted the Legislature by Const. art. 4, § 18, to provide for trials for misdemeanor in office which is part of the provisions for impeachment contained in that and the preceding section, especially since that section of the Penal Code is embraced in the part of the Code whose title and chapter headings indicate that the Legislature was intending to act under the authority of the impeachment provisions.

6. Jury ⟸19(12)—Right to jury trial on accusation for removal of officer not guaranteed.

The provision of Const. art. 1, § 7, that the right of jury trial shall remain inviolate, refers to the right to jury trial as it existed at common law, and does not guarantee to an officer the right to trial by a jury on trial of an accusation against him for his removal under Pen. Code, § 772.

7. Officers ⟸74 — Accusation for removal must be presented within county.

Under Pen. Code, § 772, providing that, when an accusation in writing is presented to the superior court, charging an officer within its jurisdiction with misconduct, the court shall hear the charges and remove the officer if guilty, the officers within the jurisdiction are those within the county in which the court is sitting so that the section is not subject to the objection that it discriminates against an officer accused thereunder because it might be brought in any county of the state, whereas the proceeding by the grand jury under section 758 could be brought only in the county in which the officer held office.

8. Constitutional law ⟸211 — Provision for judgment for private accuser in proceeding to remove officer does not establish discrimination.

The provision of Pen. Code, § 772, for judgment against an accused officer on removal in favor of the accuser, does not render that section invalid as discriminatory, though there is no similar provision in case proceedings are instituted against the officer by the grand jury under section 758, since the grand jury is charged with the duty of inquiring into such misconduct by Pen. Code, §§ 923, 928, and the provision for reward to accuser may be necessary to induce private accuser to make accusation if the grand jury fails to do so.

9. Officers ⟸74 — Proceedings for removal should be made in name of people.

Proceedings under Pen. Code, § 772, for the removal of an officer on accusation by a private individual, should be entitled as proceedings by the people on accusation of the accuser under Const. art. 6, § 20, requiring all prosecutions to be conducted in the name of the people, and by their authority.

10. Officers ⟸74 — Prohibition ⟸10(2) — Erroneous title does not defeat jurisdiction in proceeding for removal.

Error in that proceedings to remove an officer under Pen. Code, § 772, were entitled in the name of the accuser, instead of in the name of the people, being amendable, does not defeat jurisdiction so as to entitle the officer to a writ of prohibition, which under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1102, 1103, lies only when the tribunal to which it is addressed is about to act in excess of its jurisdiction.

In Bank.

Petition by John C. Cline for writ of prohibition, against the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and Charles Monroe, as judge thereof, originally begun in the District Court of Appeal, and transferred to the Supreme Court for rehearing. Writ denied.

George E. Cryer, W. I. Foley, Ingall W. Bull, and Henry T. Gage, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, Paul Vallee and J. Allan Davis, all of Los Angeles, for respondents:

SHAW, J. This is a proceeding in prohibition, originally begun in division 2 of the District Court of Appeal of the Second District. The decision of that court thereafter made was vacated, and a rehearing in this court was granted.

Petitioner seeks to prevent the superior court from proceeding to trial and judgment upon an accusation presented against him, under section 772 of the Penal Code by Jonathan S. Dodge, charging the petitioner with refusing and neglecting to perform certain duties of the office of sheriff of Los Angeles county, of which office petitioner was then and still is the incumbent. Section 772 is as follows:

"When an accusation in writing, verified by the oath of any person, is presented to a superior court, alleging that any officer within the jurisdiction of the court has been guilty of charging and collecting illegal fees for services rendered, or to be rendered, in his office, or has refused or neglected to perform the official duties pertaining to his office, the court must cite the party charged to appear before the court at a time not more than ten nor less than five days from the time the accusation was presented, and on that day, or some other subsequent day not more than twenty days from that on which the accusation was presented, must proceed to hear, in a summary manner, the accusation, and evidence offered in support of the same, and the answer and evidence offered by the party accused, and if, on such hearing, it appears that the charge is sustained, the court must enter a decree that the party accused be deprived of his office, and must enter a judgment for five hundred dollars in favor of the informer, and such costs as are allowed in civil cases."

Prohibition lies only when and because the court or tribunal to which the writ is addressed is acting, or is about to act, in excess of its jurisdiction, and there is no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. Code Civ. Proc., §§ 1102, 1103.

The claim of the petitioner that the superior court has no jurisdiction is based on the following grounds:

(1) That Jonathan S. Dodge, who verified and presented the accusation, was then and still is chairman of the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county, and that he verified and is prosecuting the accusation in pursuance of instructions from said board. The claim is that section 772 does not authorize the prosecution of such accusation by any officer of the state in his official capacity.

(2) That the accusation contains charges of willful and corrupt official misconduct, which, it is claimed, are cognizable only upon an accusation presented by the grand jury under section 758 of the Penal Code, and, further, that it charges the commission of certain crimes which can be presented only by indictment or information.

(3) That if any of the charges are proper under section 772, the defendant is entitled to a trial by jury, and that the court is about to proceed to trial without a jury.

(4) That section 772 is unconstitutional.

We will take up these points in their order.

[1] 1. It is a sufficient answer to this objection to point out that the accusation does not purport to be made by Dodge in his official capacity as member or chairman of the board of supervisors. The allegation therein that he had been instructed to verify and present the accusation has not the effect of making this an accusation presented by the board of supervisors or by any member thereof in his official capacity. The section authorizes the accusation to be "verified by the oath of any person." Under this provision any citizen may make and present the accusation, and the fact that he is an officer is immaterial so far as the jurisdiction of the court is concerned.

[2] 2. We can perceive no substantial reason for the claim that acts which constitute crimes or which, because of having been willfully or corruptly done, are the subject of charges under section 758, may not also be the basis of charges under section 772 as a foundation for the removal of the party guilty thereof from office. These remedies are all authorized on behalf of the public, and they are cumulative, distinct, and separate. The fact that one of them may be pursued does not prevent the pursuit of any of the others. If all of them were prosecuted at the same time, it would not deprive the court of jurisdiction of either, but would, at most, be nothing more than a foundation for a plea of another action pending or a plea of former adjudication. It is not necessary here to decide whether it would support such plea or not.

[3] 3. The section does not by its terms provide for or contemplate a trial by jury. It declares that when the accusation is presented "the court must cite the party charged to appear before the court," not less than 5 nor more than 10 days thereafter, and then or within 20 days from the time of presentation "must proceed to hear, in a summary manner, the accusation," and if the charge is sustained "must enter a decree" that the party be deprived of his office. No provision is made for summoning a jury, and, as the trial must take place in a summary manner, and must be begun within 20 days, it is evident that the delays incident to the drawing, summoning, and impaneling of a jury were not contemplated. If the petitioner is entitled to a jury trial of the proceeding, the authority therefor must be found in some other portion of our law than the terms of section 772. We deem it necessary to say that the petitioner has not alleged that the court below is threatening to deny a jury trial. The briefs, however, discuss the question as if the matter was in issue, and, inasmuch as it may arise upon the trial, we have concluded to treat it as in issue. It is also proper to say that there may be some doubt whether the question can be raised in a proceeding in prohibition. In Powelson v. Lockwood, 82 Cal. 613, 23 Pac. 143, it was held that the refusal of a jury trial by a justice of the peace was mere error which could not be reached in a proceeding in prohibition. In that case, however, an appeal was provided for. In proceedings under section 772 there is no appeal. It may be that this would give cause for a distinction between the two cases if a trial by jury were required by section 772 or by the Constitution.

[4] 4. The claim that the section is unconstitutional is based on several different, and to some extent inconsistent, grounds.

At the outset we may appropriately state a fundamental principle of law concerning the relations between the state and its officers and the nature of the right to public office, a principle which has an important bearing upon this branch of the case.

In any ordinary controversy between a civil officer and a private citizen, or between such officer and the state or any other officer thereof, the right or title of such officer to his office is treated as a property right, and is not subject to attack, except in a direct proceeding for that purpose, and instituted by the authority of the state. But such officer takes and holds his office subject to the conditions that may be imposed upon it by the laws of the state whose agent or servant he is, and if a cause of removal and a mode of enforcing it is provided by law, he is deemed to have accepted his office on the condition that he may be removed for that cause and in the manner so provided. In the case of Carter, 141 Cal. 320,[1] the charter of San Diego provided, so it was held, that city officers could be removed by the city board of trustees at any time without notice or hearing. Upon the objection that this summary power of removal was invalid, the court, after citing numerous authorities on the subject, said:

"In creating an office the government can impose such limitations and conditions with respect to its duration and termination as may be deemed best, and in such a case the incumbent takes the office subject to the conditions which accompany it. It may always be terminated in such manner and by such means as are prescribed by the law which created it."

In such a controversy the office is not considered as property. Mechem on Officers, § 464; Throop on Officers, § 345.

It follows that the officer cannot successfully object to a proceeding for his removal or to the jurisdiction of the tribunal to which an accusation for removal is presented, if the law of the state provides that such proceeding may be prosecuted in that manner, before that tribunal, and for the cause alleged. The law, as we have shown, does so provide, and we are of the opinion that it is authorized by the Constitution.

[5] The argument that it is unconstitutional is mainly founded upon the assumption that the proceeding is in effect a prosecution for a crime, or is so far criminal in its nature that the officer accused is entitled to all of the rights and safeguards given by the Constitution to persons charged with crime. The case is not of that character. The purpose of this section is to provide a procedure in the nature of an impeachment to afford a means for the removal of a derelict officer. The legislation embraced in the section is an exercise of the power referred to and conferred on the Legislature by sections 17 and 18 of article 4 of the Constitution. These sections relate to the impeachment and removal of public officers. Section 17 declares that "the assembly shall have the sole power of impeachment, and all impeachments shall be tried by the Senate." Section 18 declares that the Governor and other state officers, including all judicial officers down to the judges of the superior court, "shall be liable to impeachment for any misdemeanor in office; but judgment in such cases shall extend only to removal from office, and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the state; but the party convicted or acquitted shall nevertheless be liable to indictment, trial and punishment according to law. All other civil officers shall be tried for misdemeanor in office in such manner as the Legislature may provide." These provisions were also a part of the Constitution of 1849, and are there numbered as sections 18 and 19 of article 4. In the decision in the Matter of John J. Marks, 45 Cal. 217, a case which arose under the Constitution of 1849, the court said concerning these provisions:

"The Constitution of this state (article 4) undertook to distribute this power to remove public officers for misdemeanor in office—of which, as we have said, neglect of official duty was one. It, for this purpose, placed the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, secretary of state, controller, treasurer, Attorney General, surveyor general, Justices of the Supreme Court, and district judges in one class, and placed all other civil officers in another class; it then provided that those of the first class should be liable to impeachment * * * for any misdemeanor in office, * * * and that those of the second class should 'be tried for misdemeanor in office in such manner as the Legislature may provide.'"

The court there held that the act of 1853, section 4 of which is substantially identical with section 772, was an exercise by the Legislature of the power given by the clause last quoted, which is identical with the final clause of section 18 of article 4 of the present Constitution. The question again arose in Woods v. Varnum, 85 Cal. 645, 24 Pac. 844. In that case, after referring to section 18, article 4 of the Constitution of 1879, and quoting the last clause, the court said:

"The manner of such a trial is therefore clearly within the power of the Legislature, and it is equally clear that the 'summary manner' mentioned in said section 772 of the Penal Code excludes the right of trial by jury."

These cases would appear to be decisive of the question concerning the constitutionality of the section.

Moreover, the proposition that both section 772 and 758 of the Penal Code were enacted in pursuance of the authority of section 18, article 4 of the Constitution is clearly shown by the title and chapter headings of the Penal Code. Part 1 is devoted to the subject of crimes and punishments; part 2 to the subject of criminal procedure. Part 1 embraces the sections defining crimes and fixing punishment therefor, and ends with section 681. Title 2 of part 2 has the subhead: "Judicial Proceedings for the Removal of Public Officers by Impeachment or Otherwise." Chapter 1 of this title is headed "Impeachments," and prescribes the procedure for impeachments by the assembly before the Senate for the officers first mentioned in the constitutional provision. Chapter 2 has the subhead, "Removal of Civil Officers Otherwise Than by Impeachment." Section 772 is the last section of this chapter. Section 758, as we have seen, provides for accusations by the grand jury for the removal of officers, and section 772 provides for such removal upon a verified accusation presented by any person to the superior court. The subheadings relate directly to the language of the Constitution, and they clearly show that it was that power that the Legislature had in mind when enacting these provisions. It is clear from all these provisions that the prosecution of an accusation under section 772 is not an ordinary prosecution for a crime or a public offense.

[6] The contention that the case comes under section 7 of article 1 of the Constitution, providing that "the right of trial by jury shall be secured to all, and remain inviolate" cannot be maintained. It is a settled proposition of law in this state that the right of trial by jury there referred to is the right as it existed at common law, and that it does not secure the right to a trial by jury in any case which was not triable by a jury, as of right, under the common law of England. Cassidy v. Sullivan, 64 Cal. 266, 28 Pac. 234; Woods v. Varnum, supra; Koppikus v. Commissioners, 16 Cal. 253; Grim v. Norris, 19 Cal. 140, 79 Am. Dec. 206. The general principle applicable has been thus stated:

"Unless expressly prohibited by the Constitution, the Legislature may, without violating the right to trial by jury, provide a summary mode of procedure for the removal of public officers for incompetency or misdemeanor in office." 24 Cyc. 135.

It is clear therefore that under our Constitution, which not only contains no provision forbidding the denial of jury trial in such cases, but expressly authorizes the Legislature to provide for the trial thereof in any manner it chooses, the fact that a jury trial is not provided does not render the section unconstitutional.

The petitioner cites Ryan v. Johnson, 5 Cal. 87, claiming that it holds that a jury trial must be allowed in cases of this character, and that Woods v. Varnum, supra, which holds that a jury trial is not allowed, should be overruled. Ryan v. Johnson is not in conflict with Woods v. Varnum, nor with the views we have above expressed. The court was there considering an accusation under section 4 of the act of 1853 (Stats. 1853, p. 40), providing for the removal of civil officers upon a complaint filed by any person, which was to be heard "in a summary manner." The section is substantially the same as section 772. But section 6 of that act provided that the rules of practice in proceedings under the act should be the same as in civil cases under the Practice Act. Practice Act (St. 1851, p. 74) § 155, provided that all civil cases should be tried by a jury. There were no exceptions as now provided by the Code. Code Civ. Proc. § 592. To the objection that the act was unconstitutional because it denied the right of trial by jury to a person accused, the court merely said that "the defendant may, by virtue of the last section of the act (section 6) have a jury trial, as well in that as any other action." The court was not discussing the effect of the Constitution at all, but was merely calling attention to the fact that the statute itself provided for a jury trial, so that the question whether it was in violation of the Constitution on that point could not arise. We may add that if the point had been directly decided there, as petitioner claims, we are convinced, from the reasons which we have set forth, that that case should itself be overruled rather than Woods v. Varnum, supra.

We attach no importance to the statement in Kilburn v. Law, 111 Cal. 240, 43 Pac. 616, that a proceeding under section 772 is a proceeding "for the punishment of an offense in its nature criminal," and is "a criminal prosecution," or to the statement In re Curtis, 108 Cal. 662, 41 Pac. 793, that it "is a criminal proceeding in the nature of an impeachment," and similar statements in Wheeler v. Donnell, 110 Cal. 656, 43 Pac. 1, and Thurston v. Clark, 107 Cal. 289, 40 Pac. 435. They have no bearing upon the argument relating to the right to a jury trial. Doubtless it is of the character there stated. But as the Constitution expressly declares that such misdemeanors in office shall be tried in such manner as the Legislature may provide, the question whether it is a prosecution for a public offense is not determinative of the right to a jury trial. If it is a public offense, or a criminal prosecution, it is one of a class which the Constitution itself authorizes to be tried without a jury if the Legislature shall so declare.

In so far as anything said in the opinion in Fitch v. Board, 122 Cal. 288, 54 Pac. 901, may be inconsistent with what we have said on this subject, or may indicate that the Legislature could not authorize a private person to begin the proceeding, we disapprove of that opinion.

[7] Petitioner also suggests that section 772 authorizes an accusation against a county officer in the superior court of any county in the state, whereas an accusation under section 758 cannot be presented or tried in any other county than that which the accused officer serves, and this, it is argued, somehow deprives such accused officer of the equal protection of the law, contrary to the Constitution of the United States. Under the terms of the section the accused must be an "officer within the jurisdiction of the court." The word "jurisdiction," in the connection used in the phrase quoted, means the local jurisdiction; that is, the county. It does not refer to the power of the court to issue "process" to all parts of the state, given by section 5, article 6 of the Constitution. It follows that an accusation to the superior court of one county against an officer of another county could not be maintained unless brought there by a change of venue. There is therefore no basis for the argument on this point. It may be that an accusation against a "district" officer, if there are any such, could be brought in any county within the district if the district embraced more than one county. This would seem to be the effect of section 889 in its application to sections 758 and 772. Kilburn v. Law, supra. This question is not here involved.

[8] Discrimination is also predicated in the argument upon the fact that upon an accusation by the grand jury under section 758 no judgment for money can be given, whereas when the accusation is made by a citizen under section 772, judgment must be entered for $500 in favor of the accuser. The difference in this respect, however, is justified by the difference in the two methods of procedure provided. The Legislature had the power to provide more than one method. The grand jury is an official body, organized and charged with the duty of inquiring into willful or corrupt misconduct of public officers (Pen. Code, § 923), and generally to examine into the affairs of the county (Pen. Code, § 928), and it is authorized to bring accusations against officers for their removal under section 758. But that body might fail in its duty, and, as it is to the interest of the state that incompetent, negligent, or extortionate officers should not continue in office, the Legislature provided for removal upon an accusation by any citizen, and deemed it wise to reward the accuser in such case at the expense of the guilty officer; the purpose being doubtless to stimulate activity on the part of citizens and compensate the accuser in some manner for his trouble and expense on behalf of the public. We perceive no usurpation of power nor any unlawful discrimination nor anything contrary to any constitutional limitation in that provision. "A judgment imposing a fine, which in whole or in part shall go to the informer, is not such an anomaly in criminal practice as to require discussion." Kilburn v. Law, supra, 111 Cal. 241, 43 Pac. 617.

[9] Another objection is based on section 20 of article 6 of the Constitution, providing that—

> "The style of all process shall be the 'People of the State of California,' and all prosecutions shall be conducted in their names and by their authority."

[10] The document verified by Dodge and filed as an accusation and upon which the superior court assumed jurisdiction is entitled "Johnathan S. Dodge versus John C. Cline, Sheriff of the County of Los Angeles, State of California." The claim is that the title should have been the "People of the State of California, on the Accusation of Jonathan S. Dodge, versus John C. Cline, Sheriff," etc., or in some similar fashion. In every case which we have so far cited in which such an accusation was involved the cause was entitled in the same manner as the accusation in the present case. Nevertheless we believe that the contention of the petitioner is correct. The case is a prosecution of a criminal nature, and the Constitution requires that all prosecutions shall be in the name of the people of the state. See Kilburn v. Law, supra. The section itself is silent on the subject. But we are at a loss to perceive how this defect in the title affects the jurisdiction of the court. Jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such an accusation is given by section 772, beyond any doubt. We know of no authority, and none is cited, to the effect that it is essential to the jurisdiction of the court that the cause of which it assumes jurisdiction shall be set forth in a pleading having a correct title. Such a defect or misprision is of the kind that is deemed amendable and is not jurisdictional. At common law the caption of an indictment could be amended. 1 Ency.

of Pl. & Pr. 537, and note; State v. Creight, 1 Brevard, p. 169. It is well settled that an information is amendable in matters of form. 1 Bishop, Crim. Pro. § 714. An information will not be quashed for a defect in the title. Malone v. State, 14 Ind. 219. Our Constitution now declares that no judgment shall be reversed for any defect in the pleading. The public policy thus declared is that no formal defects which do not go to the merits of the case shall be considered fatal to the jurisdiction of the court or to the validity of the judgment. The document itself sets forth every fact necessary to show the nature of the accusation against the petitioner, and to bring the case within the scope of section 772. The defect in the title may be at any time amended on leave of the court if objection thereto is made. We do not think it deprives the court of jurisdiction. We find no ground upon which to sustain petitioner in his attack on the jurisdiction of the court.

The application for a writ is denied.

Wills ⇐87—Instrument held direction to insurance company and not testamentary.

Where decedent, who had a life policy, signed an instrument addressed to the insurance company, stating that she wished to name as beneficiary D. if she should die in Calexico or in the vicinity, as he was to care for her remains, the writing, though duly witnessed, was not a will, not being testamentary in character, but a direction to the insurance company; the last clause apparently making a designation of the beneficiary conditional on the place of death.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Mamie Wheatley. From an order refusing to admit to probate a document offered as the will of decedent, E. C. Dyer, proponent, appeals. Affirmed.

Robert G. Hill, of El Centro, for appellant.
J. S. Larew, of El Centro, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The proponent of a document claimed to be the will of the decedent, Mamie Wheatley, appeals from an order of the superior court refusing to admit the same to probate.

The document bore the date of July 28, 1918. The decedent died on December 14, 1919. There was evidence to show that on the date of the document, while the proponent was at the house of the decedent, she said to him that she had a Metropolitan life insurance policy and some money in the bank and some property in Los Angeles, and that she wanted to will the amount of money in the Metropolitan policy to said proponent, and gave him a paper and pencil to write it upon, whereupon he wrote at her dictation the following document:

"Calexico, California, July 28, 1918.

"To the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company:

"I wish to name as beneficiary, Rev. E. C. Dyer, if I should die in Calexico, or vec. as he is to care for my remains.

"Mamie Wheatley."

Said document was thereupon signed by five persons other than the proponent, as witnesses thereto. This is the paper which was offered for probate as the last will of the decedent. While it sufficiently appears that the decedent intended at that time to make a will, it is apparent from an inspection of the document that it is not testamentary in character. It is addressed to the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, and is nothing more than a statement to that company that she wished to name Rev. E. C. Dyer a beneficiary under the policy. It is unambiguous, and there is nothing in the language to indicate an intention other than that thus stated, or to characterize the same as a testamentary document. Indeed, the last clause appears to make the effect of the designation of Dyer as beneficiary conditional upon the event of the decedent dying in Calexico or vicinity. The case comes within the rule followed in Estate of Meade, 118 Cal. 430, 50 Pac. 541, 62 Am. St. Rep. 244, and Estate of Richardson, 94 Cal. 63, 29 Pac. 484, 15 L. R. A. 635.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Partnership ⟸95—Object and conduct of parties considered in construing oral contract for sale of partnership interest.

Where a contract for sale of partnership interest was not in writing, and its exact terms were not established, and it appeared that the parties did not at the time have in mind the distinction which subsequently determined their rights, the court in construing the contract must be guided largely by the object the agreement was intended to subserve and by the construction of the contract by the parties as manifested by their subsequent conduct.

2. Limitation of actions ⟸46(3)—Partnership ⟸95—Limitations began to run when debt was payable; price of interest in dissolved firm held not payable until money borrowed to pay a firm debt assumed by purchaser was paid by the latter.

The manifest object of an oral contract for the sale of plaintiff's interest in a dissolved partnership, in making the purchase price payable after a firm debt secured by mortgage on the firm property was paid, was to enable defendant, the purchaser, to pay secured firm debt first, and their subsequent conduct in not claiming or offering payment until after money borrowed to pay the obligation was repaid is sufficient to sustain the finding that the purchase price was payable when the defendant was relieved from the burden of the partnership debt, and not when he changed the form of that debt by paying the existing obligation with borrowed money, so that a cause of action for the price did not accrue until the borrowed money was paid by defendant.

3. Limitation of actions ⟸48(2), 66(2) — Claim for money payable on demand accrues at inception of obligation without demand.

A cause of action for money payable on demand accrues with the inception of the obligation and without the necessity for any demand.

4. Appeal and error ⟸1040(16) — Defective complaint held cured by amendment showing claim not barred.

A judgment for plaintiff will not be reversed for error in overruling a demurrer to the complaint which showed on its face that the claim was barred by limitations, where the complaint was amended before judgment to show that the claim sued on was not payable on demand, but became payable just before the action was begun.

5. Appeal and error ⟸1039(2) — Defective complaint held not to have misled defendant.

Though an amended complaint, which alleged, to avoid the statute of limitations, that the claim sued on was not payable until a partnership debt was paid, and failed to allege the payment of the debt, was defective, a judgment for plaintiff will not be reversed for that reason, where there was no dispute that the partnership debt had been paid, and defendant was not misled by the complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by John Miguel against Joe Miguel. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. Scott Jacobs, of Hanford, for appellant.
J. C. C. Russell, of Hanford, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him for $414. The findings of the court are that the plaintiff and defendant were partners in the dairy business on September 23, 1911; that on that day they dissolved partnership, the defendant purchasing the plaintiff's interest for $900, which was to be paid when the indebtedness of the partnership, which was secured by a mortgage, should be paid by the defendant; that such indebtedness was not paid until June 15, 1917; and that, after allowing certain credits, there remained due on the $900 the sum of $414. At the trial, the only substantial points in dispute were, first, as to the agreed amount of the purchase price, the defendant claiming that it was $600, instead of $900; and, second, as to when the indebtedness of the partnership had been paid off, and the plaintiff's cause of action had consequently accrued, the defendant claiming that the indebtedness had been paid in November, 1913, or nearly four years before the commencement of the action, so that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. There was plainly evidence to sustain the finding of the court as to the amount of the purchase price, but it is contended that the evidence does not sustain the finding as to the time of payment of the partnership debt.

The facts as to this latter point were that the indebtedness at the time of the dissolution of the partnership was owing to one Silva and was secured by a mortgage on the partnership property. In November, 1913, the defendant borrowed the necessary money from a bank upon his unsecured note and paid Silva; the mortgage to Silva, of course, being satisfied at the same time. It is this payment which the defendant claims was a payment of the partnership debt, so that the plaintiff's cause of action then and there accrued. On the other hand, the debt to the bank, incurred by the defendant in substitution, so to speak, for the debt to Silva, was not paid until June, 1917, a few months before the commencement of the action, and the plaintiff claims that his cause of action did not accrue until then. That the payment to Silva was the payment of the partnership debt in the legal sense, of course, admits of no question. But the real question in the case is: What was the understanding or agreement of the parties? Was it that the defendant should pay the plaintiff as soon as the particular partnership obligation was discharged, or was it that the defendant should pay the plaintiff as soon as the burden, so to speak, of the partnership debt, which he assumed, had been removed from the defendant? This burden, of course, was not removed by the mere substitution of the bank, instead of Silva, as the creditor.

[1] The understanding between the parties was not put in writing, so that its exact language could not be put before the court, and it is doubtful if either party at the time had clearly in mind the distinction we have made and upon which the case must turn. Under these circumstances, it was for the court to determine just what the agreement was, and in doing so it would properly be guided largely by the object which the agreement was intended to subserve, and even more largely by the view which the parties themselves subsequently took of their understanding as manifested by their conduct after the payment to Silva, when, of course, they would have to act one way or the other according as they understood their agreement to be one thing or the other.

[2] The finding of the court, which was in effect that payment was not to be made to the plaintiff until the defendant had been able to remove the burden of the partnership debt which he assumed, is sustained by both the considerations mentioned. The manifest object of the arrangement was to give the defendant time to work out the two obligations, the one to Silva and the one to the plaintiff, by making the latter not payable until the first had been paid. The case was one of a sale of an interest in a business which was in debt. It was a very natural understanding that the purchase price of the interest should not be payable until the debt to which the interest was subject had been worked out. This object would not be accomplished if the purchase price should become payable upon the substitution merely of another as the creditor of the defendant on his obligation to Silva. The essence of the purpose of the understanding must have been that the burden of that debt should be removed from the defendant before he was required to pay the plaintiff.

As to the conduct of the parties, the very pointed fact is that when the defendant borrowed the money from the bank and paid Silva, he did not pay or offer to pay the plaintiff, but immediately upon finally paying off the bank he did pay him the amount of the purchase price as he contends it was. Apparently the only real dispute between the parties before they got into court was over the amount of the purchase price whether it was $600 or $900. The defendant's conduct very strongly evidences that it was his view that he owed the plaintiff the purchase price, whatever it was, when he paid the bank, and not before. These considerations are fully sufficient to justify the conclusion of the trial court; in fact, it might well be claimed that it is the only reasonable conclusion that could be reached. This is decisive of the case upon the merits.

[3, 4] The defendant also contends that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint upon which the action went to trial for the reason that the cause of action stated appeared on the face of the complaint to be barred by the statute of limitations. The complaint was in fact demurrable for this reason. It alleged an obligation by the defendant made nearly six years before, and payable on demand. That a cause of action for money payable on demand accrues with the inception of the obligation and without the necessity for any demand hardly requires the citation of authority. But this particular defect was cured by an amended complaint, filed at the suggestion of the court before judgment, which alleged that the obligation of the defendant was payable when the indebtedness of the partnership was paid. With this allegation the complaint did not on its face show a barred cause of action.

[5] But the defendant also claims that this amended complaint fails to state a cause of action, because while it alleges that the defendant's obligation was payable only when the partnership debt was paid, it fails to allege that the partnership debt had ever been paid, and therefore fails to show that the plaintiff's cause of action had ever accrued. The mere statement of the defendant's objection to the complaint is sufficient to show that it was sound. The defect in the complaint, however, is not sufficient to warrant a reversal. The omitted fact, which the complaint should have stated, but did not, namely, that the partnership debt had been finally paid, was not in dispute. There is no question but that it was the fact, and it is found by the court. The defendant was not misled in any way, or prejudiced in the slightest, and there is no occasion for requiring a new trial because of the defect in the complaint.

Judgment affirmed.

GOUANILLOU v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 9396.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 30, 1920.)

1. Infants ⊂⊃111—Minor's right to disaffirm adjudication continues till barred by laches after majority.

The right of a minor to disaffirm an adjudication of his rights by a judicial tribunal obtained in a proceeding in which he has not been duly represented as provided by law continues until barred by laches after the minor has attained majority, the right not being dependent on statute, but on a general rule of law enforced as a necessary incident to the status of minority.

2. Master and servant ⊂⊃416 — Workmen's compensation award subject to disaffirmance by minor not represented.

The Industrial Accident Commission being a judicial body exercising judicial functions, its decisions and awards are subject to those general legal principles which circumscribe and regulate the judgments of all judicial tribunals, including the principle that a minor can disaffirm an adjudication obtained in a proceeding in which he has not been duly represented until barred by laches after reaching his majority.

3. Master and servant ⊂⊃416—Award to minor not represented by guardian subject to disaffirmance after majority.

If the injured employee was a minor under the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1913, as amended in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1086), at the time of first application for compensation and hearing thereon, wherein she was not represented by guardian, she had the right incident to her minority to disaffirm the award of the commission rendered in such proceeding within a reasonable time after reaching majority.

4. Infants ⊂⊃1—Age of majority a matter of legislative regulation.

The age of majority is a matter of legislative regulation, and the Legislature may prescribe a longer period of minority for some purposes than for others.

5. Master and servant ⊂⊃357 — Compensation Act prescribes status of minority for all persons under 21.

For the purpose of enforcing rights accruing under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1913, its section 16d, and section 11d of the act of 1917, which is identical in terms, prescribe the status of minority, with the privileges and disabilities incident thereto, for all persons, male and female, under the age of 21, despite Civ. Code, § 25, providing that females of 18 are not minors.

6. Master and servant ⊂⊃400 — "May" in Workmen's Compensation Act not permissive as regards right of infant to appear with or without guardian.

The word "may" in the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1913, § 16d, as amended in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1086), and in the act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 842) § 11d, identical in terms, is not permissive as regards an infant employee's right to appear with or without representation by guardian, but is intended as an enabling provision to give the guardian provided for by the section a standing before the Industrial Accident Commission in default of or supplementary to any other method designated by the commission.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, May.]

7. Master and servant ⊂⊃416 — Female employee under 21 a "minor" entitled to disaffirm award.

An injured female employee, who was under 21 at the time of her first application for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act and hearing thereon before the Industrial Accident Commission, was a "minor" for the purpose of enforcement of rights acquired under the act, and as an incident to her status of minority she possessed the right to disaffirm the award of the commission which deprived her of right to representation by guardian to which she was entitled by the act of 1913, § 16d, act of 1917, § 11d, and the fact that she became 21 before the award was rendered does not defeat her right of disaffirmance exercised within a reasonable time after reaching majority.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Minor.]

8. Master and servant ⊂⊃417(7)—Finding of Workmen's Compensation Commission that minor employee disaffirmed award within reasonable time conclusive.

The finding of the Industrial Accident Commission that the female employee, a minor when her first application was made, filed disaffirmance of award within reasonable time, and that there was no unequivocal act on her part affirming the decision prior to the disaffirmance proceedings, cannot be disturbed on certiorari.

9. Master and servant ⊂⊃416 — Failure of commission to enter order setting aside first award disaffirmed by minor did not invalidate second award.

Where second judgment and award of the Industrial Accident Commission, by virtue of the findings on which it was based, in effect set aside and superseded the commission's previous decision, disaffirmed by the injured female employee, a minor at the time of her first application, the failure of the commission to enter a separate order setting aside the first award is a mere informality not invalidating, in view of St. 1915, p. 1102, § 28, amending section 77a of St. 1913, p. 313, St. 1917, p. 871, § 60a, the second award under review on certiorari.

Angellotti, C. J., and Wilbur, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Application for certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation for injuries, by Cyprien Gouanillou, the employer, against the commission, A. J. Pillsbury and others, its members, and Marie Michaud, the employee.

Award affirmed, and cause remanded, with directions.

C. H. Patterson, of Oakland, for petitioner. A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, and Fred W. Fry, of Oakland (Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

LENNON, J. Certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to an employee of petitioner for injuries sustained November 25, 1917. An application by the employee for adjustment of the claim to compensation was denied by the commission on March 11, 1919, upon the ground that the proceeding was barred by the statute of limitations prescribed by the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279); the application having been filed on October 17, 1918, more than six months after the date of the injury. No steps to obtain a rehearing of this proceeding have ever been taken. Miss Marie Michaud, the injured employee, was 20 years of age at the date of the filing of her application for adjustment and at the date of the hearing of said application, becoming 21 on November 10, 1918, two days after the termination of the hearing. On April 25, 1919, by a new attorney, she filed a disaffirmance of the proceeding upon the ground of minority, a notice of motion to set aside all previous proceedings upon the claim to compensation, and a new application for adjustment of the same claim. A hearing was held, and on December 30, 1919, the commission entered an award granting compensation to the employee. A rehearing of this second proceeding and award was denied by the commission, and petitioner seeks a review thereof by this court.

[1-3] It is conceded that the decision of the commission rendered March 11, 1919, is valid and in full force and effect, and consequently that the second proceeding and award are in excess of the power of the commission, unless the employee possessed the right of disaffirming the first award on the ground of her minority. The right of a minor to disaffirm an adjudication of his rights by a judicial tribunal obtained in a proceeding in which he has not been duly represented as provided by law continues until barred by laches after the minor has attained the age of majority; the right is not dependent upon statute, but is a general rule of law enforced as a necessary incident to the status of minority. Joyce v. Joyce, 5 Cal. 161; Johnston v. S. P. Co., 150 Cal. 535, 89 Pac. 348; 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 818, 119 Am. St. Rep. 181; 22 Cyc. 641, 699. Since the Industrial Accident Commission is a judicial body exercising judicial functions, its decisions and awards are subject to those general legal principles which circumscribe and regulate the judgments of all judicial tribunals. Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 156 Pac. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390; Carstens v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 572, 158 Pac. 218; Smith v. Ind. Acc. Com., 26 Cal. App. 560, 147 Pac. 600. Therefore, if the employee was a minor, under the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, at the time of the first application and hearing, since she was not represented therein by a guardian, she had the right, incident to minority, of disaffirming the award of the commission rendered in such proceeding within a reasonable time after reaching the age of majority.

Section 16d of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 288), as amended in 1915 (Stats. 1915, pp. 1079, 1086), which was in force on the date the injuries were sustained, and section 11d of the present act (Stats. 1917, pp. 831, 842), provide:

"If an injured employee, or in the case of his death, one or more of his dependents, shall be under twenty-one years of age or incompetent at any time when any right or privilege accrues to such person under the provisions of this act, a general guardian, appointed by the court, or a guardian ad litem or trustee appointed by the commission or a commissioner may, on behalf of any such person, claim and exercise any such right or privilege with the same force and effect as if no such disability existed; and no limitation of time provided by this act shall run against any such person under twenty-one years of age or incompetent unless and until such guardian or trustee is appointed."

[4] It cannot be questioned that the age of majority is a matter of legislative regulation and that the Legislature may prescribe a longer period of minority for some purposes than for others. Magee v. Welsh, 18 Cal. 155; Moore v. Williams, 19 Cal. App. 600, 610, 611, 127 Pac. 509; Dwight, Law of Persons and Personal Property, p. 284; 22 Cyc. 511. Petitioner raises the question, however, as to whether the Legislature has, in fact, altered the age of majority of females for the purpose of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The contention of petitioner is that the above-quoted section of the Workmen's Compensation Act is to be construed with section 25 of the Civil Code, which provides, in effect, that females of the age of 18 are not minors, and therefore that the section of the act quoted above has a different effect and operation in its application to females between the ages of 18 and 21 than to males under 21 and females under 18. That is to say, it is contended that the effect of the act was not to place females between the ages of 18 and 21 in the category of minors, but merely to confer upon them certain specified rights in addition to those ordinarily accorded them as persons sui juris; that these rights, as to females between the ages of 18 and 21, do not carry with them the privileges ordinarily incident to minority, such as the right of disaffirmance, and may be waived by an election to proceed as a person sui juris.

[5] We are of the opinion that this contention cannot be sustained, and that, at least for the purpose of enforcing rights accruing under the Workmen's Compensation Act, the section of the act previously set forth prescribes the status of minority, with the privileges and disabilities incident thereto, for all persons under the age of 21. The language of the statute is general, providing for representation by a guardian ad litem, or a general guardian, and a suspension of the statute of limitations for all employees under 21. The right to appear by a guardian and the suspension of the running of the statute of limitations until the appointment of a guardian are not special privileges independent of minority. The conferring of such rights is a recognition of certain disabilities appertaining to the period of minority which require particular protection by the granting of special privileges. The period at which such privileges and disabilities shall cease cannot, logically, depend upon individual volition, and there would be no logic or purpose in permitting a female 20 years of age to adopt certain privileges of minority or to waive all such privileges and, at her own option, assert the rights of a person who has attained the age of majority. A provision for representation by a guardian for the enforcement of certain rights, and a provision for the suspension of the running of the statute of limitations until the appointment of such guardian for a person sui juris as to the enforcement of such rights, would be such an anomaly in our sytem of jurisprudence that it cannot be presumed to have been intended in the absence of express legislative declaration.

Moreover, the wording and history of the section of the act under consideration are prolific with proof that the intent of the Legislature was to adopt a uniform age of majority for the purposes of the section. This section of the Workmen's Compensation Act, as enacted in 1913, contained the words "a minor" in the place of "under twenty-one years of age"; the latter phrase being substituted by amendment in 1915. It is thus evident that the Legislature originally intended to adopt the respective ages of majority fixed by the Code for males and females, but altered the law in 1915 to put females upon an equal footing with males as regards the disabilities and privileges of minority. The following phraseology of the section is also significant:

"A * * * guardian * * * may, on behalf of any such person, claim and exercise any such right or privilege with the same force and effect as if no such disability existed." (Italics ours.)

The addition to this section of the following sentence, by amendment in 1917, indicates that all persons under 21 are considered minors within the purview of the section:

"The commission shall have power to determine the fact of the minority or incompetency of any injured employee and may appoint a trustee to receive and disburse compensation payments for the benefit of such minor or incompetent and his family." (Italics ours.)

Finally, the classification of females between the ages of 18 and 21 with persons ordinarily not sui juris, namely, females under 18, males under 21, and incompetent persons, is a strong indication of a legislative intent that they, likewise, are to be regarded as not sui juris.

[6] The fact that section 16d of the act of 1913 (section 11d of the act of 1917) provides that a guardian "may" appear for the persons specified is relied upon by petitioner in support of his argument that the statute is not mandatory, but merely permissive, and that a female over 18 may elect whether or not she will be represented as provided by the section. This section must be construed in the light of subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 75 of the act of 1913 (subdivision a of section 57 of the act of 1917), which give the commission general power to regulate the manner and by whom minors and incompetents are to be represented before the commission. The provisions of section 16d of the act of 1913 (section 11d of the act of 1917) were undoubtedly intended to prescribe a method for the representation of minors and incompetents before the commission in addition to and in default of any method adopted by the commission under the authority conferred by the subsequent sections of the act. It is clear, therefore, that the word "may" is not permissive as regards the right to appear with or without representation by a guardian, but is intended as an enabling provision for the purpose of giving the guardian provided for by the section a standing before the commission in default of or supplementary to any other method designated by the commission.

[7, 8] The employee, being under 21 at the time of the first application and hearing, was therefore a minor for the purpose of the enforcement of rights acquired under the terms of the act. As an incident to her status of minority she possessed the right of disaffirming the award of the commission, which deprived her of a right to which she was entitled, and the fact that she became 21 before the award was rendered would not defeat her right of disaffirmance if exercised within a reasonable time after reaching majority. Childs v. Lanterman, 103 Cal. 387, 37 Pac. 382, 42 Am. St. Rep. 121. She exercised this right by filing her disaffirmance and second application within six months after becoming 21 and within 1 month after the rendition of the first award. The finding of the commission that this was a reasonable time, and that there was no unequivocal act on the part of the employee affirming the decision prior to the disaffirmance proceedings, cannot be disturbed. Walker v. Ind. Acc. Com., 177 Cal. 737, 171 Pac. 954, L. R. A. 1918F, 212.

[9] The commission failed to specifically pass upon the motion of the employee to set aside the first award which motion was made at the time of the filing of the second application and upon stipulation, heard and considered together with and at the time of the hearing of the second application. Inasmuch as the second judgment and award itself, by virtue of the findings on which it was based, in effect set aside and superseded the previous decision, the failure of the commission to enter a separate order setting aside the first award is an informality which does not operate to invalidate the award under review. Stats. 1915, c. 607, § 28 (section 77a as amended) p. 1102; Stats. 1917, c. 586, § 60a, p. 871.

The second award is therefore affirmed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the commission to correct the irregularity above indicated by entering an order setting aside the first award.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. I dissent. To my mind the section of the Workmen's Compensation Act here involved does not purport to make a woman who has reached the age of majority by attaining the age of 18 years, a minor until she attains the age of 21, for the purposes of the act, or debar her from prosecuting a claim under the act without the interposition of a guardian. It simply purports to authorize the appointment by the commission or a commissioner of a guardian ad litem or trustee for any one under 21 years of age, or incompetent, and provides that no limitation of time provided by the act shall run against any person under 21 years of age or incompetent until a guardian or trustee is appointed.

In this case the first judgment was given in a proceeding brought by the woman herself. She was then nearly 21 years of age. She became 21 years of age two days after the termination of the hearing. Judgment was not given until four months after she had attained the age of 21. I think the judgment was a valid and binding one, not open to disaffirmance, and subject to review only in the manner and within the time provided in the act.

MARPLE v. JACKSON, Sheriff et al.
(L. A. 5884.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 29, 1920.)

1. Witnesses ⟸52(6)—Husband may not testify concerning delivery of deed to wife over her objection.

Where a wife sought to enjoin sale of property claimed by her under execution against her husband, he might not, against her objection, testify for defendants concerning delivery of deed by him to her, claimed to have been made to defraud creditors, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 1, forbidding husband to be examined for or against the wife without her consent.

2. Trial ⟸404(1) — Finding that allegations of complaint are true was finding of delivery of deed plaintiff set up.

Where a complaint by a wife alleged she owned premises by virtue of a described deed by her husband to her, a finding that all of the allegations of the complaint were true implied a finding that the deed was duly delivered.

3. Deeds ⟸194(3)—Deed presumed delivered on date it bears.

A deed, duly executed and acknowledged, will be presumed prima facie to have been duly delivered on the date it bears under Civ. Code, § 1055.

4. Deeds ⟸194(3)—Presumption of delivery at date held not overcome by evidence.

Court held justified in holding that the presumption of delivery at date of execution of a duly executed and acknowledged deed had not been overcome by the evidence.

5. Fraudulent conveyances ⟸215 — Wife not estopped to claim property against husband's subsequent tort judgment creditors.

Where a husband's creditor's judgment against him was for injuries from his automobile, and not through any reliance on his ownership of premises which they sought to sell under execution, his wife was not estopped to claim title under an old deed recently recorded.

6. Fraudulent conveyances ⟸299(12) — Evidence held to show no fraud in debtor's conveyance to his wife.

Evidence held sufficient to support a finding that a conveyance by a debtor to his wife was not in fraud of his creditors.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Suit by Ednah W. Marple against C. E. Jackson, Sheriff, Frederica L. Blackburn, and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants Frederica L. Blackburn and another appeal. Affirmed.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by the defendants Frederica L. Blackburn and Oliver V. Blackburn, her husband, from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, Ednah W. Marple, in an action to enjoin the sale under execution of certain real estate situated in Orange county, alleged to be the separate property of the plaintiff. The record on appeal is presented in typewriting.

On April 20, 1916, Mrs. Blackburn secured a judgment in the superior court of Los Angeles county against plaintiff's husband, R. S. Marple, in the sum of $1,028.95. On July 6, 1917, execution was issued on the judgment, directing C. E. Jackson, sheriff of Orange county, to levy execution upon these premises. It is the sale of the property under this execution which respondent here seeks to enjoin. She bases her claim of title on a deed from R. S. Marple to her, which recites that it is made in consideration of love and affection. This deed bears the date, May 12, 1906, and was acknowledged on that day, but was not recorded until February 14, 1916. Appellants denied that the premises were the separate property of respondent, and alleged that they were the separate property of R. S. Marple, basing their claim on the grounds (1) that the deed from Marple to respondent was void for want of delivery, and (2) that, as a voluntary transfer made without valuable consideration, it was made by Marple in contemplation of insolvency and with the intention of defrauding his creditors. The cause was tried by the court, which found inter alia that all the allegations of the complaint were true, and, as heretofore noted, rendered judgment in respondent's favor, adjudging that the premises were her separate property, and restraining appellants from proceeding with the levy of the execution upon them.

[1] 1. At the trial respondent introduced in evidence the gift deed and rested. Appellants thereupon called respondent and later her husband as witnesses. After the latter had answered some preliminary questions respondent objected to his examination regarding either the delivery of the deed or the surrounding circumstances, on the ground that, under subdivision 1 of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure, "a husband cannot testify against his wife." The objection was sustained, and appellants' first contention is that this ruling was erroneous.

Subdivision 1 of said section reads in part:

"A husband cannot be examined for or against his wife without her consent; nor a wife for or against her husband, without his consent; nor can either, during the marriage or afterwards, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage."

In People v. Langtree, 64 Cal. 256, 30 Pac. 813, the defendant was charged with burglary. In discussing the question whether the court erred in excluding the testimony of a Mrs. Brandon, which testimony tended to establish the innocence of the defendant and the guilt of the witness' husband, it was said, after quoting the above Code section:

"This is the provision of the Code upon the subject, and it must prevail. * * * 'A wife cannot be examined, for or against her husband, without his consent.' * * * If examined in an action or proceeding to which he was a party, she would undoubtedly be examined for or against him. Any witness examined in an action or proceeding is examined for one party and against the other therein. * * * If the husband of this witness had been a party to the action on trial, she could not have been examined at all without his consent."

We quote from Fitzgerald v. Livermore, 2 Cal. Unrep. 744, 13 Pac. 167:

"The wife of the plaintiff was called as a witness for the defendant, and gave testimony against the plaintiff without his consent. Her testimony was material. * * * We think the evidence * * * was incompetent."

In our opinion there was no error in the ruling complained of. While it is true that, as was said in People v. Langtree, supra, quoting from Schouler on Husband and Wife, 85, "The prevailing tendency * * * is to regard the domestic confidence or the ties of a spouse as of little consequence compared with the public convenience of extending the means of ascertaining the truth," yet, under the unequivocal language of the first sentence of the Code section, it is clear that, without respondent's consent, Marple was not a competent witness.

For this reason it will be unnecessary to consider whether the evidence of the circumstances surrounding the delivery of the deed falls within the privilege as to communications. The testimony was inadmissible, not because the communication was privileged, but because Marple was incompetent to testify against his wife, a party to the action.

Poulson v. Stanley, 122 Cal. 655, 55 Pac. 605, 68 Am. St. Rep. 73; People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, 13, 112 Pac. 720, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193, and Savings Union Bank, etc., Co. v. Crowley, 176 Cal. 543, 169 Pac. 67, are cited by appellants in support of this contention. But in each of those cases the question was as to the nature of the particular communications with regard to which testimony was sought to be elicited, and in none of them was the spouse, for or against whom the testimony was offered, a party.

Mitchell v. Superior Court, 163 Cal. 426, 125 Pac. 1061, is also cited by appellants on this point. That case, however, was a contempt proceeding which, as the court said, was "in its nature ancillary to the divorce action [previously instituted by the wife] and subject to the rules with reference to the competency of witnesses in that action." It was held, therefore, that, inasmuch as the wife was a competent witness against the husband in the divorce action, it was proper to allow her, upon her own affidavit, to institute contempt proceedings against him on account of his failure to comply with the court's direction to pay her alimony. The case is plainly distinguishable from the one at bar.

[2] 2. We shall next consider appellants' contention that "the facts clearly show that there was never any delivery of the deed." It is alleged in the complaint that respondent was the owner of the premises by virtue of the deed of May 12, 1906. From the finding that all of the allegations of the complaint are true it must be implied that the court found the deed was duly delivered. The appellants question the sufficiency of this evidence to support the finding.

[3] At the outset it is to be observed that the deed was duly executed and acknowledged, and hence, under section 1055 of the Civil Code, it must be presumed prima facie to have been duly delivered on the date it bears. Branson v. Caruthers, 49 Cal. 374, 380. The question then becomes, Was this presumption overcome by appellants?

The respondent testified that she could not remember the precise date of the delivery of the deed, but that it was "12 or 14 years ago"; that there were present at the time of the delivery, besides herself and her husband, a Mr. and Mrs. Sanborn, a Miss Hyatt, and Charles D. Ballard, a notary public; that prior to that occasion she had loaned her husband considerable sums, in return for which he had promised "to deed me property * * * as soon as he got hold of some"; that she knew nothing about the preparation of the instrument itself; that she "couldn't just remember," but thought she had received the deed from Ballard and had then laid it "up on the book case"; that the next morning she and her husband took the deed and deposited it in a safe deposit box; that the key to this box was sometimes in her husband's, and sometimes in her own custody; that they both frequently opened the box and examined its contents, but that she was always accompanied by her husband on such occasions; that just before the trial of the action in which appellants secured the judgment, which, according to the complaint, they threaten to enforce against these premises, she and her husband took the deed from the box, and she personally filed it for record on February 14, 1916; that the reason why the deed was not recorded prior to that time was that when it was executed her husband had expressed the desire not to have it recorded, saying, "I don't like to have it appear I haven't anything in my own name;" that it was after consulting an attorney that she did record the deed; and that at all times her husband had the management and control of the property.

Ballard, testifying for respondent, stated that he had prepared the deed at Mr. Marple's request, and, as to the circumstances surrounding the alleged delivery, that the only thing he could recall was "that my signature over here at the left of the signature of the grantor is a signal to me that this deed was delivered to the grantee in my presence or by me, because I never put my signature under the insignia, 'Signed, sealed and delivered,' unless it was either delivered by me * * * or by the grantor in my presence."

There were introduced in evidence an assessment "list" containing Marple's sworn statement that he was the owner of these premises, and two mortgages on the property, each executed by respondent and her husband.

It is declared in Devlin on Deeds, § 284, that—

"Where a grantor executed a deed * * * to his wife, the fact that she placed the deed after delivery where her husband equally with herself could have access to it does not change its legal effect as a conveyance."

And it was held in Lewis v. Burns, 122 Cal. 358, 55 Pac. 132:

"The presumption is that a deed duly executed was delivered at its date; and the fact that it was not recorded until after the death of the grantor does not render the deed insufficient evidence of its delivery at its date."

Stone v. Daily, 185 Pac. 665, was a case where the question before the court was as to the delivery or nondelivery of two deeds. We quote:

"The retaking of possession and subsequent retention of the instrument by Mrs. Daily is not conclusive, even though it appear that it was not an afterthought, but was contemplated by her from the beginning. It is a very strong circumstance indicating that she did not intend such delivery as would put the deed beyond her control and power of recall, and would ordinarily be controlling. But the final question always is, What was the intent with which the formality of a delivery was gone through with? And if it appear indubitably that it was gone through with for the purpose of conveying the property then and there, and that the grantor desired to retain, and did retain, the instrument, not that she might control or suspend its taking effect, but for the purposes of custody and safe-keeping merely, as, for instance, to insure its not being recorded because she did not wish her husband to know of it, any contrary inference as to her intent arising from her continued possession of the instrument is of necessity overcome, and the fact of such continued possession becomes immaterial. * * *

"The case, then, is one where the formality of a delivery is gone through with with the intent of making an immediate effective conveyance, but after delivery the grantor retains possession of the deed for purposes of safe-keeping. That such a delivery is valid and is not affected by the fact that the instrument subsequently remains in the possession of the grantor is well established. * * *"

[4] In the light of these authorities we think it clear that the finding must be upheld.

As has been shown, the production of the deed raised a disputable presumption that it had been duly delivered. It is true the grantor continued to manage and control the property, and that at his request the deed was not recorded. But we have respondent's statement that she had received the deed. It may well be the court concluded, from Marple's request not to record the deed, that both parties intended that title should pass, and that they desired not to make known the transaction because it might injure Marple's credit. The court may also have inferred that the placing of the instrument in the deposit box was for safe-keeping. And, under the ruling in Bias v. Reed, 169 Cal. 33, 42, 145 Pac. 516, 519, "the force of an executed conveyance is not to be impaired by subsequent acts or declarations of the grantor." In any event, we are not prepared to hold the court was not justified in finding that appellants had not overcome the presumption in favor of delivery. Appellants' contention is without merit.

3. Nor, in our opinion, can appellants' contention that the transaction involving the execution and delivery of the deed was fraudulent as to creditors be sustained. On this point the court found it was not true that, as alleged in the answer, the transaction was tainted with fraud. As already stated, respondent testified that it was in return for loans which she had made to her husband that the latter executed and delivered this deed. It cannot be held that appellants have advanced any sums in reliance upon the facts that the record title stood in the name of Marple, or that he continued to manage and control the property. Nor is there any showing that the grantor was insolvent or even financially embarrassed at the time the deed was executed and delivered. Appellants did not secure their judgment against Marple until after the deed had been recorded.

[5] It should be noted, moreover, that the action in which appellants' judgment was recovered was an action, not upon any contractual obligation, but for personal injuries sustained through having been struck by Marple's automobile, and was prosecuted against both Marple and respondent, so that the obligation which is the basis of appellants' claim was not incurred upon the faith that Marple was the owner of these premises, and respondent cannot be estopped, as against appellants at least, to claim that this is her separate property. In each of the cases cited by appellant on this point the transfer was held fraudulent because the complaining creditors had advanced funds to the grantor in reliance on the fact that the record title stood in his name. As we have seen, such is not the case here.

[6] It must be held that the evidence is sufficient to support the finding that there was no fraud either in the execution and delivery or in the recordation of the conveyance in question.

The judgment is affirmed.

REVERT v. HESSE et al. (L. A. 6040.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 13, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂=640—No dismissal for delay in notice for transcript, where relief therefrom granted below.

That notice to the clerk to prepare a transcript was not filed in the time prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, is not ground for dismissing appeal; relief from the delay having been applied for and obtained in the trial court.

2. Pledges ⊂=40—Pledgee may not sell or discharge pledged debt.

While a pledgee of evidence of indebtedness may assign his interest in the collateral, the assignee then having his rights, or may collect it when due, he, under Civ. Code, § 3006, may not without the assignor's consent sell, compromise, or otherwise discharge the pledged debt or its security.

3. Pledges ⊂=31(4)—Pledgee selling or releasing pledged security may be held for conversion.

If a pledgee of evidence of indebtedness sells or releases the pledged debt or its security, otherwise than on collection, the pledgor may set aside the sale or release, if other circumstances permit, or hold the pledgee for conversion.

4. Pledges ⊂=31(4) — It is conversion for pledgee to release pledged mortgage.

There is a conversion of pledged mortgages, they being released without the consent of the pledgor and without foreclosure or other collection of the debt immediately secured by them.

5. Principal and agent ⊂=159(1)—Principal liable for conversion through agent.

One for whom and subject to whose direction assignees of pledged mortgages act as trustees in taking the assignment of and releasing the mortgages is liable for the conversion thus accomplished through his agents.

6. Conspiracy ⊂=6—Wrong resulting in damage, the cause of action.

Where several are sued for a civil wrong, it is such wrong resulting in damage, and not the conspiracy to commit it which constitutes the cause of action.

7. Conspiracy ⊂=14 — Makes each liable as joint tort-feasor for all damages.

The result of a conspiracy pursuant to which a civil wrong is done is to render each conspirator responsible as a joint tort-feasor for all damages, regardless of the degree of his activity and though he was not a direct actor.

8. Conspiracy ⟸14—Joint recovery against all conspirators.

Joint recovery of damages may be had against all parties to a conspiracy pursuant to which a civil wrong is done.

9. Conspiracy ⟸19—Finding of conspiracy to defraud by conversion of pledged mortgages warranted.

Circumstances, including relations and interest of parties, held to warrant finding of conspiracy to defraud, by conversion of pledged mortgage, between one taking a qualified assignment thereof by way of pledge, and immediately, without consideration, assigning it absolutely to one who released it, and the grantee, subject to the mortgage, of the mortgaged property, and her husband, as trustee for whom she had taken title.

10. Conspiracy ⟸13—Persons participating as agents liable for damages.

Persons are liable for participating in a conspiracy to do a civil wrong, though acting merely as agents, and though unacquainted with the details of the scheme.

11. Conspiracy ⟸13—Receipt or expectation of benefit not necessary for civil liability.

To make a conspirator liable for damages for the wrong done pursuant to the conspiracy, it is not necessary that he should have received or expected benefit from the wrongful act.

12. Trover and conversion ⟸50—Damages for conversion of note, face value.

Prima facie the measure of recovery for conversion of a note or other money security is its face value, with interest.

13. Pledges ⟸36—Damages for conversion of pledged mortgage, its value, less debt to pledgee.

Where a pledged debt is converted by the pledgee, the amount due him is to be deducted from the value of the debt converted in determining the damages.

14. Pledges ⟸36—Relative to damages for conversion of pledged mortgage held water stock was to be regarded as held for benefit of the land.

Relative to damages for conversion of a mortgage by release thereof by its pledgee, water stock, appurtenant to the mortgaged land and owned by the landowner at time of giving the mortgage, is to be regarded as held for the benefit of the land at the time of the release; one who had bought the land and water stock from the mortgagor, and was a party to the conspiracy for the conversion, though defaulting in payment of assessments on the stock and allowing it to be sold therefor, having at the sale bought it in the name of another and thereafter to the time of the release having continued to so hold it, and having treated it as appurtenant to the land in the matter of a subsequent mortgage and a later sale of the land.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by Amanda J. Revert against Arthur T. Hesse and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John B. Haas and Earl Daniels, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

John E. Daly, James H. Daly, and Daly & Daly, all of Long Beach, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Action for damages for fraudulent conversion in securing the possession of and releasing of record two mortgages on premises consisting of 80 acres of land in Imperial county, Cal.

[1] The motion to dismiss this appeal, which was made upon the ground that appellants' notice to the clerk to prepare a transcript was not filed within the time prescribed by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, is without merit. In the cases relied upon by respondent in support of the motion there was no transcript on file in the Supreme Court, either for the reason that no transcript was prepared because no notice was given to the clerk, or for the reason that the trial judge refused to certify the transcript after it was prepared, on the ground that, while the notice to the clerk was filed, it was not filed within the time specified by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. Under such circumstances it was held that the Supreme Court was without power to aid the appellant, because the granting of relief from failure to file such notice within the requisite time lay solely within the jurisdiction of the trial court. Estate of Keating, 158 Cal. 109, 110 Pac. 109; Fiske v. Gosbey, 168 Cal. 334, 143 Pac. 611; Brown v. Superior Court, 175 Cal. 141, 165 Pac. 429. In the instant case, however, relief from the delay in filing the notice was not sought in the Supreme Court, but was applied for and obtained in the lower court, and, the transcript having been certified by the trial judge and filed in the Supreme Court before the motion to dismiss the appeal was made, the case must be considered upon its merits.

Beginning with the execution of the two mortgages in question by Simon F. Flink in May, 1915, the complaint recounts the sequence of events culminating in the alleged conversion as follows: The mortgages in question were executed as security for two promissory notes of $2,000 each, given by said Simon Flink in part payment of the purchase price of the land hypothecated by the mortgages. The notes and mortgages were made in favor of Amanda J. Revert, the plaintiff, and one Isaac Bordner, as joint tenants with right of survivorship, and, upon the death of the latter in September, 1915, plaintiff became the sole owner thereof. Plaintiff subsequently transferred and assigned these notes, together with the mortgages upon the property in question, to one Edwin R. Gurnsey, as collateral security for the payment of a promissory note in the sum of $489.31, payable on demand, executed and delivered by plaintiff to said Gurnsey. On September 7, 1916, after the recording of the above-mentioned assignment, plaintiff's promissory note for the sum of $489.31 and the notes and mortgages held as collateral security therefor were assigned by Edwin Gurnsey to the defendant Sidney Beach, who, in turn, on September 12, 1916, assigned the said notes and mortgages to Walter Niolon. On September 14, 1916, Walter Niolon released the two Flink mortgages without notice to plaintiff or demand upon her for the payment of her note for $489.31, for which, as above stated, the mortgages were held as collateral security. Plaintiff has never received any of the money secured by the Flink mortgages.

Prior to the assignment of the notes and mortgages by Edwin Gurnsey to defendant Sidney Beach, to wit, on June 6, 1916, Simon Flink, the mortgagor, sold and conveyed the premises described in said mortgages, subject to the two mortgages aforesaid and to a prior mortgage in the sum of $1,500 in favor of Margaret Paine, to defendant Arvilla Hesse. About September 23, 1916, on which date the release of the Flink mortgages was recorded, defendant Arvilla Hesse and her husband, defendant Arthur Hesse, borrowed the sum of $2,500 from one Charles Spitly, securing the payment of the same by the execution of a trust deed to the property described in the Flink mortgages. The premises were subsequently sold by defendants Arvilla and Arthur Hesse.

Arthur Hesse, Arvilla Hesse, and Sidney Beach were made defendants; plaintiff attempted to join Walter Niolon as defendant, but was unable to obtain personal service. The complaint further alleges that the assignment of the Flink mortgages by defendant Sidney Beach to Walter Niolon and the release by the latter were executed without consideration, and that this assignment and release, together with the acts subsequent thereto, were had and done with the full knowledge and consent of each and all of said defendants with the fraudulent intent of defrauding plaintiff by depriving her of her rights and privileges in and to the two mortgages and in pursuance of a conspiracy among all of the defendants to convert the notes and mortgages to their own use and to permit defendants Arthur and Arvilla Hesse to dispose of the premises freed from said incumbrances. It is further alleged, upon information and belief, that defendants Arthur and Arvilla Hesse agreed, upon the release of said mortgages, to place a new first mortgage or incumbrance upon the premises and "to divide any surplus derived from said new incumbrance after payment of said mortgage of Margaret N. Paine, and thereafter to sell said described premises, and divide the proceeds of such sale among said defendants." Damages are alleged in the sum of $3,606.17. The answer denies the allegations of conspiracy, conversion, and damages, and alleges, by way of an affirmative defense, that, at the time of the assignment to Sidney Beach, the notes of Simon Flink were worth no more than the amount for which they were assigned as collateral security, namely, $489.31. The trial court made its findings of fact in substantial accord with the allegations of the complaint, and gave judgment against the defendants Arthur Hesse, Arvilla Hesse, and Sidney Beach, jointly and severally, for the sum of $3,606.17, which was the face value of the mortgage notes, less the amount of the note for the payment of which they were held as collateral security, with interest thereon from September 23, 1916, from which judgment defendants appeal.

[2-5] While a pledgee to whom an evidence of debt has been pledged can collect the same when due, he cannot sell, compromise, or otherwise discharge the pledged debt, or the security therefor, without the consent of the pledgor. Civ. Code, sec. 3006. Such a pledgee may, of course, assign his interest in the collateral to an assignee, who thereupon acquires the rights of the pledgee (Pease v. Fitzgerald, 31 Cal. App. 727, 161 Pac. 506), but, aside from this right of assignment, his control over the debt is limited to the right to hold the same and collect at maturity; if he sells or releases the debt or security otherwise than upon collection, the pledgor may set aside the sale or release, if other circumstances permit, or hold the pledgee for conversion. Chester v. Hill, 66 Cal. 480, 6 Pac. 132; Kelly v. Matlock, 85 Cal. 122, 24 Pac. 642; Hunt v. Glassell, 30 Cal. App. 676, 159 Pac. 227; Traders' Bank, etc., v. Wilcox, 183 Pac. 256. It is not disputed that the assignment by plaintiff to Edwin Gurnsey of the notes and mortgages executed by Simon Flink and the subsequent assignment thereof by said Gurnsey were assignments by way of pledge. It also appears from the evidence that defendants Sidney Beach and Arthur Hesse were fully informed as to the nature of these assignments. There was an attempt on the part of the defendants to prove that the attorneys who arranged the assignment for Gurnsey were also the attorneys for plaintiff, and that these attorneys, at the time of the assignment by Gurnsey to Beach, were informed of and acquiesced in defendants' plan for releasing the mortgages. This attempt failed utterly, for not only was there no competent evidence that the attorneys in question were aware of defendants' purpose, but there was no proof that they were the attorneys for, or in any way represented, plaintiff at the time they arranged the assignment from Gurnsey to Beach. Inasmuch as the pledged mortgages were released without the consent of the pledgor and without foreclosure or other collection of the debt immediately secured by them, there was a conversion of the pledged property in the instant case. Moreover, inasmuch as it is admitted that the assignees Sidney Beach and Walter Niolon acted as trustees for defendant Arthur Hesse and subject to his directions in taking the assignments of the pledge and releasing the mortgages, defendant Arthur Hesse is liable for the conversion thus accomplished by him through his agents. Horton v. Jack, 126 Cal. 521, 58 Pac. 1051. This proposition appears not to be seriously questioned by appellants, who rely primarily upon the contention that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding of conspiracy on the part of defendants Sidney Beach and Arvilla Hesse, and therefore that said defendants cannot be held jointly and severally liable for damages. Appellants also rely upon an alleged failure on the part of plaintiff to prove damage from the conversion.

[8-9] It is a general and well-settled principle of law that, where two or more persons are sued for a civil wrong, it is the civil wrong resulting in damage, and not the conspiracy, which constitutes the cause of action. Herron v. Hughes, 25 Cal. 555; Davitt v. Bakers' Union, 124 Cal. 99, 56 Pac. 775; Dowdell v. Carpy, 129 Cal. 168, 61 Pac. 948; Manner v. Slater, 148 Cal. 284, 83 Pac. 35. In such an action, the major significance of the conspiracy lies in the fact that it renders each participant in the wrongful act responsible as a joint tort-feasor for all damages ensuing from the wrong, irrespective of whether or not he was a direct actor, and regardless of the degree of his activity. Cohen v. Fisher, 135 App. Div. 238, 120 N. Y. Supp. 546; White v. White, 132 Wis. 121, 111 N. W. 1116; Miller v. John, 208 Ill. 173, 70 N. E. 27. A plaintiff is entitled to a joint recovery of damages against such defendants as he can show have united or co-operated in inflicting a wrong upon him. Herron v. Hughes, supra; More v. Finger, 128 Cal. 313, 60 Pac. 933; Nevin v. Gary, 12 Cal. App. 1, 106 Pac. 422.

"The law recognizes the intrinsic difficulty of proving a conspiracy. The allegations with reference to conspiracy are treated as matters of inducement leading up to a more particular description of the acts from which conspiracy may be inferred. * * * The conspiracy may sometimes be inferred from the nature of the acts done, the relation of the parties, the interests of the alleged conspirators, and other circumstances." Woodruff v. Hughes, 2 Ga. App. 361, 58 S. E. 551; Jernigan v. Wainer, 12 Tex. 189.

In the present action, while plaintiff was unable to prove any formal agreement between defendants Arthur Hesse and Sidney Beach, nevertheless, there was before the court the entire transaction resulting in the consummation of a flagrant fraud upon the plaintiff, in which transaction defendant Sidney Beach participated as an intermediary. There was also the undisputed fact that, only five days after receiving from Gurnsey a qualified assignment of the Flink notes and mortgages by way of pledge, defendant Sidney Beach, without consideration, transferred the same notes and mortgages to Niolon, by an absolute assignment, and was unable to remember whether or not he also assigned plaintiff's note for $489.31, for the payment of which the other notes and mortgages were held by him as security. These circumstances, coupled with the further fact that defendants Sidney Beach and Arthur Hesse were not strangers, but were on more or less intimate terms, occupying the same office, were sufficient to warrant the inference drawn by the trial court that defendant Sidney Beach was a party to a conspiracy which had for its object the fraudulent conversion complained of by plaintiff. Likewise, as regards the defendant Arvilla Hesse, there are the facts that she took title to the premises, subject to the recorded mortgages in favor of plaintiff, in her own name for the benefit of her husband, and held the same for him at the time of the assignment and release of said mortgages by other agents of her husband. In addition, there is to be considered the part assumed by her in the various transactions subsequent to the release, by means of which her husband reaped the benefit of the conversion of the mortgages, the execution by her, together with her husband, of a new first incumbrance upon the property in order to obtain a loan of $2,500, and the joining by her in a conveyance of the property when the same was sold free from plaintiff's mortgages. In coming to a conclusion upon the question of the implication in the conspiracy of the defendant Arvilla Hesse, all these circumstances were to be weighed by the trial court against the only evidence offered by this defendant in her own behalf, namely, her own denial that she knew anything about the transaction in which her husband was involved.

[10, 11] The fact that defendants Sidney Beach and Arvilla Hesse acted solely as the trustees or agents of defendant Arthur Hesse does not constitute a valid defense, for a person is liable for his participation in a conspiracy, having for its object the commission of a wrongful act, even though he acts only as an agent for another, and is unacquainted with the details of the scheme. Brumley v. Speedway, etc., Co., 138 Tenn. 534, 198 S. W. 775.

"A number of persons may conspire to do an unlawful act, and each becomes responsible for acts done in furtherance of the conspiracy. It would be no defense as to any one of them to show that his participation was not necessary to the accomplishment of the ultimate purpose, and that it would have been consummated if he had not become a conspirator." Green v. Cochran, 43 Iowa, 544, 550.

Plaintiff's omission to prove that said defendants Sidney Beach and Arvilla Hesse received pecuniary compensation as a result of the conversion is immaterial. Those who aid in the commission of a wrongful act by another are liable for the resulting damages, although they expected no benefit from the wrongful act and in fact received none. Brumley v. Speedway, etc., Co., supra; Breedlove v. Bundy, 96 Ind. 319; Felsenthal v. Thieben, 23 Ill. App. 569. It follows that the finding of the trial court, to the effect that defendants Sidney Beach and Arvilla Hesse joined with defendant Arthur Hesse in a conspiracy whereby plaintiff was defrauded of her interest in the Flink notes and mortgages by a conversion thereof, cannot be disturbed, [12, 13] With regard to the question of damages, the general rule is that where a note or other money securities have been converted, "their owner is, prima facie, entitled to recover their face value with interest." Sutherland on Damages (4th Ed.) vol. 4, § 1132. Where the converted debt was held by way of pledge, the amount due the pledgee on the principal debt must be deducted from the value of the debt converted (Gay v. Moss, 34 Cal. 125), and this was done by the trial court in the instant case. Appellant sought to further mitigate the damages by attempting to prove that the Flink notes were not worth their face value, owing to the small value of the security and the insolvency of the maker.

[14] At the time the mortgages were executed, the mortgagor, Flink, owned 76 shares of wafer stock appurtenant to the mortgaged land. While there was a conflict of testimony as to the value of the land with the appurtenant water stock, there was uncontradicted testimony that the land without the water stock was practically worthless. Appellants contend that, in determining the value of the land as security for the notes in question, the water stock cannot be taken into consideration, for the reason that, prior to the conversion of the mortgages, the water stock had been sold for a default in the payment of assessments thereon. Upon an examination of the testimony of defendant Arthur Hesse on this phase of the case, it appears that, after purchasing the premises and water stock in question, said defendant made default in the payment of assessments on the water stock. The stock was thereupon sold to meet the delinquent assessments, and at the sale, which occurred June 30, 1916, defendant Arthur Hesse purchased said stock in the name of a third party acting in defendant's behalf. Defendant Arthur Hesse continued to hold the water stock in the name of this third party until after the release of the Flink mortgages. In view of the fact that defendant Arthur Hesse bought in the water stock with full knowledge of the circumstances and treated it as appurtenant to the land in question for other purposes, assigning the stock to Spitly at the time the trust deed to the property was executed as security for the $2,500 borrowed from Spitly, and transferring the ownership in the stock to the purchaser of the property when the latter was finally sold by defendants, said defendant cannot be permitted to take advantage of his own default in order to decrease the value of plaintiff's securities. The water stock must be regarded as held for the benefit of the land at the time of the release of plaintiff's mortgages, and the enhancement of the value of the land by the water stock was properly taken into consideration in determining the value of the converted securities. There was a conflict of testimony as to the value of the land with the water stock, from which the trial court was warranted in finding that said value was sufficient to protect the Flink notes to the extent of their face value. Therefore, conceding that appellants succeeded in proving the insolvency of Flink, the maker of the notes, which is doubtful, nevertheless, the finding of the trial court that the notes were worth their face value is sustainable upon the theory that the property hypothecated by the mortgages was ample security for the full value of the notes.

The judgment is affirmed.

SIMONS BRICK CO. v. WIGLESWORTH.
(L. A. 6063.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 20, 1920.)

1. Guaranty ⟸6—Acceptance of offer of guaranty limited to time parties reasonably had in mind.

Defendant's statement that, if plaintiff would employ a particular company to vaccinate its hogs with anti-cholera serum, he would personally warrant or guarantee the immunity of the hogs from cholera, was a proposal which had to be accepted within such time as the parties contemplated it would remain open, and, in the absence of express understanding, within such time as they reasonably had in mind under the circumstances.

2. Guaranty ⟸91—Finding that offer of guaranty was intended to remain open and was part of subsequent contract held warranted.

An implied finding that it was understood that defendant's offer to guarantee the immunity of plaintiff's hogs from cholera, if plaintiff would employ a certain company to vaccinate them, should remain open until plaintiff vaccinated the hogs, and that the employment of the specified company some months later was on an understanding of which the guaranty was a part, held supported by the facts shown.

3. Guaranty ⟸6—Guaranty of results of use of anti-cholera serum not binding when made after use.

Defendant's statement to plaintiff's president, after plaintiff had employed a company in which defendant was interested to vaccinate its hogs for cholera, that he guaranteed the results of the use of his serum was not a binding promise.

4. Frauds, statute of ⟸17—So-called guaranty need not be in writing unless a promise to answer for another's debt.

A promise which may be aptly termed a "guaranty" is not required to be in writing by Civ. Code, §§ 1624, 2787, 2793, 2794, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, unless it is a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another.

5. Animals ⟸23(1)—On vaccination of hogs there is implied warranty of skill but not of results.

Where a vaccine company was employed to vaccinate plaintiff's hogs for cholera, there was an implied warranty or agreement that reasonable skill and care would be exercised in the selection and application of the vaccine, but no implied warranty that the hogs would be rendered immune to cholera.

6. Animals ⟸23(1)—No express warranty of results of anti-cholera serum held to have been created.

Where the agent of a vaccine company employed to vaccinate plaintiff's hogs for cholera called on plaintiff's president some time prior to the employment and left an advertising pamphlet containing a form of warranty contract, but it was not read by plaintiff's president or executed and did not enter into the subsequent employment, there was no express warranty.

7. Frauds, statute of ⟸25—Guaranty of fulfillment of warranty by another within statute, though the other makes no warranty.

If defendant's statement that, if plaintiff would employ a certain company to vaccinate its hogs for cholera, he would warrant or guarantee their immunity from cholera, was only a promise to insure the obligation of the company warranting results of the vaccination assuming that such warranty would be made, it was a promise within the statute, and the fact that no warranty was made by the company did not change its nature or avoid the necessity for its being in writing.

8. Frauds, statute of ⟸23(1)—Direct guaranty of results of anti-cholera serum sold by another need not be in writing.

Where defendant's statement that, if plaintiff would employ a certain company to vaccinate its hogs for cholera, he would guarantee their immunity from cholera, was intended as a promise that he would directly guarantee the efficacy of the anti-cholera serum, and not merely as a promise to stand good for the fulfillment by the company of its guaranty or warranty, the promise was enforceable though not in writing.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by the Simons Brick Company against Ed Wiglesworth. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Alderson and K. A. Miller, both of Los Angeles, and Noyes & Heath, of Kansas City, Mo., for appellant.

Richard J. O. Culver, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him upon his alleged contract that, if the plaintiff would employ a certain company known as the Interstate Vaccine Company to vaccinate the plaintiff's hogs with anti-cholera serum, the defendant would personally warrant or guarantee that such vaccination would render the hogs immune from cholera, and he would pay for any hog vaccinated which subsequently died of that disease. The trial court found that a contract of the character stated was made; that the plaintiff in reliance upon it employed the Interstate Vaccine Company to vaccinate its hogs; that its hogs were so vaccinated; that a number thereafter died of cholera; and that the net loss to the plaintiff by the death of the hogs was $5,637.20, for which judgment was given the plaintiff. There are but two questions presented by the appeal: First, is the finding that there was a contract supported by the evidence? And, second, was the promise of the defendant upon which the claim of contract is based, and which admittedly was oral only, one which had to be in writing under the statute of frauds?

[1-3] As to the first question, the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding mentioned, there was direct evidence as to the making of a promise by the defendant. It also appears clearly that the promise when made was intended to be contractual in character; that is, was intended as the definite assumption of an obligation by the defendant in case it were accepted by the plaintiff. According to the evidence, the defendant, in the spring of 1916, called on the president of the plaintiff, stated that he was the president and principal stockholder of the Interstate Vaccine Company, endeavored to persuade the president of the plaintiff to have its hogs vaccinated by that company, and in that connection stated that, if his company were employed to do this, he personally would guarantee the immunity of the hogs from cholera for the balance of their natural lives, and would pay the value of any that might subsequently die of cholera. If this proposal had been accepted then and there by the plaintiff by the employment of the vaccine company, there could be no doubt as to the existence of the contract or as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding that there was a contract. The only doubt in the matter arises from the fact that the vaccine company was not employed at that time, was not in fact employed until the following fall. Then the plaintiff, through the local agent of the company and without any further dealings with the defendant, employed the vaccine company, and the hogs were vaccinated. The question on this branch of the case, therefore, is as to whether or not this employment can be related back to the defendant's promise of some months before. The defendant's statement to the president of the plaintiff was, of course, a proposal which had to be accepted within such time as the parties contemplated it would remain open, and, in the absence of any express understanding upon the point, within such time as it could be taken they reasonably had in mind under all the circumstances of the case. If nothing appeared other than that the defendant had made the proposal in the spring and the plaintiff months later had employed the vaccine company to vaccinate its hogs, it might well be taken that the employment of the vaccine company was an entirely new matter, not relating back in any manner to the conversation of the previous spring, so that if the defendant were to be held liable it would have to be on some new promise made at that time. But, according to the testimony for the plaintiff, which must be accepted in view of the court's findings, the further facts were that the conversation between the defendant and the plaintiff's president in the spring ended with the statement by the latter that he would keep in touch with the defendant and would call upon him when the plaintiff was ready to vaccinate. It also appears that during the summer the local agent for the vaccine company, who had been present at the original interview between the plaintiff's president and the defendant and had heard the latter's statement with regard to the guaranty, called upon the plaintiff's president and was informed that when the plaintiff was ready to vaccinate it would call upon him, and the guaranty was again spoken of as an inducing reason for the plaintiff to employ the vaccine company. This evidence is sufficient to justify the conclusion, implied in the court's findings, that it was understood that the defendant's proposal that he would guarantee the immunity of the hogs if the plaintiff employed the vaccine company, remained open until the plaintiff actually came to vaccinate and employed the vaccine company for that purpose, and that the employment was upon an understanding of which the guaranty of some months before was a part. This conclusion is strengthened by evidence that the following spring, when the defendant again personally met the plaintiff's president, he renewed his statement that he guaranteed the results of the use of his serum. Such a statement, of course, made after the vaccine company had been employed and the hogs had been vaccinated, would not itself be a binding promise; but it is of weight as showing what the parties understood were the terms upon which the vaccine company had been employed. There is evidence in the case which, perhaps, is sufficient to have justified a different conclusion as to the understanding, but there is no occasion for discussing it. The evidence stated is sufficient to justify the conclusion which the trial court reached, and that is final upon this branch of the case.

[4] As to the point that the promise of the defendant was not in writing, the witnesses called to prove the making of the promise, including the plaintiff's president himself, all speak of the promise as one to "guarantee" the immunity of the hogs. Stress is laid upon the use of this word as indicating or proving a promise which had to be in writing in order to be enforceable. But it is not every promise which may be aptly termed a "guarantee" that is required to be in writing. In this case, if the defendant had himself been selling his serum directly to the plaintiff and had stated to the latter that if it were used he would "guarantee" the results, the word would have been used in a customary and proper sense, and yet there could be no doubt that the promise would be a primary one and would not have to be in writing to be enforceable. It is only when the "guarantee" is a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another that it must be in writing. Sections 1624, 2787, 2793, and 2794, Civ. Code, and section 1973, Code Civ. Proc. The question in the present case is: Was the promise of the defendant one to answer for the obligation of another? The only obligation of another for which it can possibly be considered that the defendant intended to assume responsibility is an obligation on the part of the vaccine company warranting the results of the use of its serum. There is no other person and there is no other obligation to which the defendant's promise can possibly have related.

[5, 6] But it is plain from the evidence that no such obligation existed. Practically all that appears is that the plaintiff employed the vaccine company to vaccinate its hogs and paid it for so doing. There is no implied warranty in such an employment that the subject of the treatment will be rendered immune, any more than there is a warranty by a physician vaccinating for smallpox that the patient will be immune from that disease. There is in each case an implied warranty or agreement that reasonable skill and care will be exercised in the selection and application of the vaccine, but that is all. Nor is there anything in the present case from which an express warranty on the part of the vaccine company may be inferred. The utmost that appears is that, when the local agent of the vaccine company called on the plaintiff's president some time prior to the employment of the company to vaccinate, he left with the president an advertising pamphlet containing a form of warranty contract by the vaccine company. But the plaintiff's president testifies that he did not read it, and no such contract was executed, and there is nothing to show that it in any manner entered into the subsequent employment of the vaccine company. The situation is that, if the plaintiff had sued the vaccine company instead of the defendant for the loss of its hogs, it would have failed of recovery for want of proof of any obligation on the part of the company to make good that loss.

[7, 8] It is not, however, a wholly sufficient answer to the claim of the defendant to say that no obligation on the part of the vaccine company in fact existed. It might still be that the defendant's promise was only to insure such an obligation, assuming that it would be made. In such a case, it would still be a promise to answer for the obligation of another, and the fact that that obligation did not subsequently arise as it was contemplated it would, would not change the nature of the defendant's promise or avoid the necessity for its being in writing. As the conversation in which the defendant's promise was made is repeated in the evidence, the promise is given, in some instances, a form from which it might perhaps be inferred it was intended as a mere backing up of what the defendant assumed would be an obligation of the vaccine company. In other instances it has the form of an unqualified and primary promise by the defendant wholly without relation to any corresponding obligation on the part of the vaccine company. The view that the latter was its character and was reasonably taken by the plaintiff to be such is strengthened by the fact that the defendant represented that he made the promise because he was practically the vaccine company, owning 96 per cent. of its stock, so that it made little difference to him whether he assumed a primary obligation or only one to answer for the vaccine company. While perhaps a contrary finding would not be wholly without support in the evidence, we think it fairly clear, on the other hand, that the evidence cannot be said to be insufficient to sustain the implied finding of the trial court that the defendant's promise was intended by him as a promise that he would directly guarantee or warrant the efficacy of the serum which he was seeking to persuade the plaintiff to use, and was not intended merely as a promise to stand good for the fulfillment by the vaccine company of such guaranty or warranty by it. It follows that the promise was enforceable although not in writing.

MARTIN v. PALMER UNION OIL CO.
(L. A. 5638.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 20, 1920.)

Corporations ⇐175—Contract making certain stock nonassessable not authorized by articles invalid.

The plain purpose of Civ. Code, § 290, subd. 6, held to be to prohibit any distinction or preference of any nature, not expressly provided for in a corporation's articles of incorporation, between shares of its stock; so that provision of a contract under which it issued certain common stock that it shall be nonassessable, not being authorized by such articles, is invalid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by George A. Martin against the Palmer Union Oil Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lewis A. Hilborn and Roy A. Bronson, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Frank R. Wehe, of San Francisco, and John J. Squire, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against him rendered on demurrer to his complaint. The action is one to compel the defendant company to recognize the plaintiff as the owner of 3,200 shares of its capital stock, although such shares have been sold by the defendant to pay an assessment levied by it. The sole question is as to the validity of the assessment.

The assessment is attacked on the ground that it was levied in violation of an express contract by the defendant. It appears from the complaint that the stock of the defendant is divided into preferred and common shares; that stock of both kinds was issued; that in this situation the defendant sold 600,000 shares of its common stock, presumably treasury stock, under a contract that such shares should not be assessable, and caused an indorsement to that effect to be placed upon the certificates issued to evidence such shares; that the plaintiff bought his shares direct from the company under this contract and received a certificate indorsed in accordance with it; and that the company nevertheless subsequently levied an assessment, sold the plaintiff's stock under it, and has since refused to recognize him as a stockholder. The complaint also sets forth, undoubtedly for the purpose of presenting the question of law in dispute between the parties, that neither the articles of incorporation nor the by-laws of the company contain any provision for the issuance of nonassessable stock.

It is apparent at once that the validity of the assessment depends upon the invalidity of the company's contract that the stock it was selling and of which the plaintiff bought a part should be nonassessable. The plaintiff relies upon the authority of Lum v. American Wheel Co., 165 Cal. 657, 133 Pac. 303, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 816. It was there held that a contract between a corporation and a stockholder that the shares of the latter were not assessable was valid. It is not certain on the face of the opinion whether it was intended to hold that such a contract was valid when a provision permitting it is found in the articles of incorporation, or that it was valid even if such provision were not found in the articles of incorporation. An examination of the record in the case, however, discloses that it nowhere appears that the articles of the defendant corporation contained any such provision. The record likewise discloses that, so far as appears, the contract involved was particular to the plaintiff and not common to all the stockholders, so that the effect of it would be at once to make a distinction between the shares of the plaintiff and the other shares of the corporation. The case decided therefore, was exactly the one now presented.

Nevertheless, we believe the question is controlled by the provisions of subdivision 6 of section 290, Civil Code, reading:

"Corporations formed for profit, pursuant to the provisions of this Code, may, by their articles of incorporation, provide for the classification of their capital stock into preferred and common stock. In the event that the articles of incorporation shall provide for such classification the same must contain a statement of the number of shares of stock to which preference is granted, and the number of shares of stock to which no preference is granted. The articles of incorporation shall also state, in clear and succinct manner, the nature and extent of the preference granted, and except as to the matters and things so stated, no distinction shall exist between said classes of stock or the owners thereof."

The plain purpose of this provision is that there shall be no classification of shares by way of preference or distinction between them unless such classification, with the preference or distinction upon which it is based, be stated in the articles of incorporation. A contract that certain shares should be nonassessable would at once create a preference or distinction and would come within the prohibition of the statute. It is true that the statute purports to be dealing with the matter of issuing preferred and common stock, and that when preferred stock is spoken of, without any specification of the particulars in which it is preferred, it is ordinarily assumed that the preference consists in a preferred right to dividends or to share in the capital assets upon dissolution, or to both. But while this is the preference which preferred stock ordinarily has, there is nothing in the statute to indicate that the preference which the statute provides can only be made when expressly authorized by the company's articles, is limited to this particular kind of preference. The language of the statute is general, and we think it plain that it was intended, and very wisely, to prohibit any distinction or preference between shares of any nature whatever not expressly provided for by the company's articles of incorporation. The contract under present discussion comes directly within this prohibition—was in fact an attempt to create in the general class of the defendant's common stock a subclass, so to speak, of preferred stock, having a special privilege, that of nonassessability, not provided for in the defendant's articles. Such being its character, it was void.

The opinion in Lum v. American Wheel Co. makes no mention of the Code section, and an examination of the briefs in the case shows that it was not called to the attention of the court, except in a brief in reply to one by amici curiæ. It was undoubtedly overlooked by the court, as otherwise the court could hardly have failed to mention and discuss it. The case must be overruled, not as necessarily incorrect in the principles declared, but as inadvertently applying those principles to a case where they were not applicable because of a positive statutory provision to the contrary.

Appellant's counsel seek to escape the force of the Code section by advancing the proposition that a contract that all of the company's stock should be nonassessable would not be illegal, since in that case there would be no preference, and that the contract in the present case should be deemed such a contract, since by so treating it the taint of illegality can be avoided. The rule, of course, is that when a contract is equally capable of two constructions, one of which will make it illegal and the other not, the latter is to be preferred and adopted. But this is a rule of construction and has no application to a case where the intent of the parties is plain, and that intent is to do something which the law says shall not be done. Such is the present case. The intent to create a preference in the way of making 600,000 shares of the company's stock nonassessable, without similar provision as to the balance of the stock, is plain, and the statute says that no preference shall exist except as provided in the company's articles of incorporation.

Judgment affirmed.

BAILEY v. JOHN W. SWARD, Inc., et al. (L. A. 5162.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 22, 1920.)

Chattel mortgages ⇐138(1) — Lien of mortgage held superior to rights of lessees under prior lease in the nature of a cropping contract.

The lien of a chattel mortgage of a crop of rice, "subject to the outstanding crop leases on said described premises by which the lessees are entitled to two-thirds interest in the crops on harvest of the same," was superior, as respects the remaining one-third, to any rights of the lessees under a provision in the so-called lease, which was more in the nature of a cropping contract, whereunder the lessees advanced $2,000 to the lessor, and lessor agreed to refund such amount in gold coin or in rice at the prevailing market price when division of the crop should be made, the refunding agreement being a promise to pay, and not a pledge, and the lease contract providing that title to the crop should remain in the lessor until a division should be made.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Milton T. Farmer, Judge.

Action by A. W. Bailey against John W. Sward, Incorporated, Chin Sam & Co., and others. From an adverse judgment, the last-named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Emmons & Johnstone, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

N. E. Conklin, of Bakersfield, L. D. Manning, of Oakland, H. B. Griffith, and Ostrander & Cary, of Oakland, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendants, Chin Sam & Co. appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff.

The action was to foreclose a chattel mortgage executed by John W. Sward, Incorporated, to Dana Burks, and afterwards assigned to the plaintiff, covering the rice crop grown on certain 300 acres of land by Chin Sam & Co. in the year 1915. The case presents the question whether the right of Chin Sam & Co., a copartnership, to hold one-third of said crop as payment for money advanced by Chin Sam & Co. to Sward Company, was paramount to the right of the mortgagee of said part of the crop.

The crop was grown by Chin Sam & Co. under an instrument denominated a lease, dated January 14, 1915, executed by Sward Company to Chin Sam & Co. It provided that Chin Sam & Co. should have the land during the cropping season of 1914 for the purpose of raising and growing a crop of rice thereon. Sward Company was to plow and check the land, build the necessary irrigation ditches, furnish the lumber necessary to build a barn, house, and cookhouse, and for wiers and boxes for irrigating ditches, and survey the land. Chin Sam & Co. were to put in the necessary wiers and boxes for irrigation, sow and plant the land to rice, irrigate and cultivate the same in a proper manner, and, when ripe, harvest, thresh, and sack the same. The solution of the question depends upon the effect of the following provisions:

"It is hereby mutually agreed that when all of the foregoing provisions have been kept and performed by [Chin Sam & Co.] as herein provided, they shall be entitled to receive two-thirds of the crop so threshed, the same to be divided between the parties hereto in the field [Sward Company] taking one-third of the entire crop in the field, [Chin Sam & Co.] taking the remaining two-thirds, the title to the whole crop being and remaining in [Sward Company] until division is made. The one-third retained by [Sward Company] shall be its rental share, for the use and occupation of said premises by [Chin Sam & Co.], but nothing in the foregoing to be construed so as to prevent said [Chin Sam & Co.] hauling said crop to cover as soon as threshed. * * * [Sward Company] agrees to haul its share of the crop from the field. * * *

"In consideration of [Sward Company] agreeing to secure financial assistance to [Chin Sam & Co.] with which to harvest and market the rice crop [Chin Sam & Co.] hereby agree to advance to [Sward Company] in United States gold coin the sum of $2,000, payable $1,000 upon the execution of this agreement, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged by the first party, $1,000 on or before 30 days hereafter. Upon conclusion of the first harvest and threshing of the crop herein provided for to be grown [Sward Company] agrees to refund the $2,000 in gold coin of the United States, or in rice at the prevailing market price when division of the crop is made."

The mortgage held by the plaintiff was executed on June 18, 1915. It purported to mortgage to Burks the entire "crop of rice now being, standing, and growing upon that certain piece or parcel of land [describing the land leased to Chin Sam & Co.], subject to the outstanding crop leases on said described premises by which the lessees are entitled to two-thirds interest in the crops on harvest of the same, providing that they have fulfilled the terms of said crop leases." The mortgage was duly recorded in the office of the county recorder in the chattel mortgage record. The lease to Chin Sam & Co. was duly recorded in the recorder's office in the record kept for the recording of leases, but was not executed or recorded as a chattel mortgage. The finding of the court was that neither Burks nor Bailey had actual or constructive notice at the time of advancing the money secured by the chattel mortgage of any clause or clauses in the lease aforesaid other than was given by the statement in the mortgage that it was subject to the outstanding crop leases by which the lessees were entitled to two-thirds interest in the crops, but that before making the advances both Burks and Bailey had visited the premises and knew that Chin Sam & Co. were in the occupation thereof and were cultivating the crop thereon.

After the crop was harvested, threshed, and sacked by Chin Sam & Co., as provided in the lease, it was found that one-third thereof consisted of 1,080 sacks. The $2,000 mentioned in the last-quoted paragraph of the lease was advanced by Chin Sam & Co. to Sward Company, but had not been refunded to them in money. The 1,080 sacks which comprised the share of Sward Company was not enough to repay the $2,000 advanced to it by Chin Sam & Co. Thereupon, instead of delivering the 1,080 sacks to Sward Company or to the plaintiff as holder of the mortgage, Chin Sam & Co. kept the same in their possession, claiming that they were entitled to the share of Sward Company under that part of the lease which provided that Sward Company should refund the $2,000 in gold coin, "or in rice at the prevailing market price when division of the crop is made." The only point presented in the case is the question whether or not they are justified in making this claim.

While the instrument executed by Sward Company to Chin Sam & Co. is named a lease, yet, as the title to the crop was to be in the lessor from the time of planting until the division was made, it is more in the nature of a cropping contract. Whatever be its nature, however, the fact that under its provisions the title to the entire crop was to be in Sward Company until the division took place is a controlling factor in the case. The mortgage purporting to include the entire crop was expressly made subject to the crop lease "by which the lessees are entitled to two-thirds interest in the crops on harvest of the same." Consequently it did not cover the interest of Chin Sam & Co. in that two-thirds share, although the title to that part of the crop was, at the time of its execution, vested in Sward Company. Chin Sam & Co. could under no circumstances have or obtain title under the lease to the one-third of the crop going to Sward Company until the division was made. There is nothing in the lease which purports to create a lien on or pledge of that portion of the crop in favor of Chin Sam & Co. against Sward Company. The provision is, in effect, merely that at the time of the division Sward Company had the option either to pay the $2,000 in coin or to pay it in rice at the prevailing market price. It was a promise to pay, not a pledge. It is true Chin Sam & Co. were in possession of the rice, but in view of the fact that the title thereto was to remain in Sward Company until division and afterwards unless Sward Company failed to repay the advances in money, the possession of Chin Sam & Co. prior to that time was merely as bailee, and not as pledgee, and it gave them no right to withhold the rice as against the holder of said mortgage. It follows that the decision of the court below was correct.

In view of this conclusion, it is immaterial whether Burks or Bailey had or had not actual or constructive notice of the provision of the lease whereby Sward Company promised to repay the advances in rice.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Constitutional law ⇐38—Statutes ⇐174, 175—Constitutionality and construction not dependent on particular facts.

The constitutionality and construction of a statute are matters of law, and do not depend on the facts of any particular case.

2. Statutes ⇐191 — Applicable to all cases within its scope when constitutional.

If a statute violates no constitutional guaranty, it is necessarily applicable to all cases within its scope.

3. Statutes ⇐176—Application is a question for the courts.

If the scope of a statute is determined generally, it becomes the duty of the courts to determine whether or not particular cases are within its purview.

4. Constitutional law ⇐48—Statute not construed contrary to Constitution if avoidable.

A statute will neither be applied nor construed to render it obnoxious to the Constitution if this result may be avoided by any reasonable interpretation of its language.

5. Highways ⟸186—Purpose of statute, relative to duties of automobile drivers following collision, stated.

Motor Vehicle Act, § 21, relative to the duty of automobile drivers after a collision with another vehicle, was designed to prohibit negligent or wanton drivers from seeking to evade civil or criminal prosecution by escaping before their identity could be established, and to prohibit all drivers from leaving injured persons in distress and danger for want of proper medical or surgical treatment.

6. Highways ⟸166—Statute as to duties of automobile drivers after collision not designed to compel settlement of damages.

Motor Vehicle Act, § 21, relative to the duties of automobile drivers following a collision, was not designed to be used as a club to exact monetary settlement for injuries either to persons or property.

7. Highways ⟸186—Refusal to carry other party to collision to hospital or doctor not crime, when neither party injured.

Motor Vehicle Act, § 21, requiring the driver of an automobile colliding with another vehicle to render all necessary assistance, including the carrying of occupants of the vehicle to a physician or surgeon for treatment if required, or, if such carrying is requested, does not permit one of two automobile drivers, equally negligent in bringing about a collision in which neither is injured, by first demanding that he be carried to a hospital or surgeon, to put the stamp of felony on the other refusing the request.

8. Statutes ⟸241(1)—Criminal statutes to be reasonably construed.

Every statute must receive a reasonable construction, and this is particularly true of statutes defining crimes.

9. Witnesses ⟸378—Animus of complaining witness held without bearing on case except on question of credibility.

On the trial of a driver of an automobile colliding with another for refusal to carry the driver of the other automobile to a hospital, the animus of the complaining witness had no bearing on the case except on the question of his credibility.

10. Witnesses ⟸330(1) — Cross-examination of complaining witness which would have affected credibility improperly excluded.

On the trial of the driver of an automobile colliding with another for refusing to carry the driver of the other automobile to a hospital, cross-examination of the complaining witness as to a quarrel and scuffle with a third person shortly before the collision should have been permitted, as a proper means of testing the credibility of his testimony regarding his injuries, and incidentally his credibility regarding the entire matter.

On Petition for Rehearing.

11. Criminal law ⟸938(1)—New trial granted for newly discovered impeaching evidence in connection with other matters.

In a prosecution of a driver of an automobile colliding with another for refusing to transport the other driver to a hospital, where the state failed to show any essential element of criminality, and cross-examination of the prosecuting witness concerning injuries in a scuffle with a third person shortly before the collision was excluded, and on motion for new trial affidavits tending to show that the injuries of which he complained were received in such scuffle, the exercise of sound judicial discretion demanded a new trial, notwithstanding the rule against granting new trials solely for newly discovered evidence directed solely to the impeachment or contradiction of a witness.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Albert Kaufman was convicted of violating the Motor Vehicle Act, and he appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Lawlor and Wilbur, JJ., dissenting.

Louis Glickman, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BRITTAIN, J. On an information charging him with felony for violation of section 21 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 408), the defendant was tried, found guilty by the jury, and sentenced to pay a fine of $100, or in default of the payment to be confined in the Alameda county jail for a period of one day for each $2 of the fine imposed. His motion for a new trial, supported by affidavits regarding newly discovered evidence, was denied. On this appeal he contends the evidence was insufficient to sustain the conviction, that the court erred in limiting cross-examination of the complaining witness, and that the motion for a new trial should have been granted. Incidentally, he maintains that section 21 of the Vehicle Act should not be so strictly construed against one accused of felony as to make it applicable to the facts of this case, and that if it is to receive strict construction, it is violative of certain constitutional guaranties.

[1-4] The constitutionality and construction of a statute are matters of law. Neither depends upon the facts of any particular case. If the legislative enactment is violative of no constitutional guaranty, it is necessarily applicable to all cases within its scope. If the scope of the act is determined generally, it becomes the duty of courts to determine whether or not particular cases are within the purview of the statute. A statute will neither be applied nor construed to render it obnoxious to the Constitution, if this result may be avoided by any reasonable interpretation of its language. The constitutionality of section 21 of the Motor Vehicle Act was upheld in a case where it was attacked on grounds closely akin to those relied upon by the appellant. People v. Diller, 24 Cal. App. 799, 142 Pac. 797. The contention in this case is that if the section requires the driver of a motorcar which has collided with another to take any one who was riding in the other car to a surgeon, upon the mere request of such person, regardless of whether the person making the request is in need of the care of a physician or not, and makes a refusal to do so idle a thing punishable as a felony, the statute cannot be upheld. In the present case, at least, no such construction need be placed upon the act. The question of constitutionality is not involved, and it is unnecessary in this case even to analyze the able decision in People v. Diller.

Section 21 of the Vehicle Act, in so far as it is at all pertinent to the facts of this case, provides that—

"Whenever an automobile * * * collides with any vehicle containing a person, the driver of * * * such automobile * * * shall immediately cause such automobile * * * to stop and shall render * * * to the occupants of the vehicle collided with, all necessary assistance, including the carrying of such * * * occupant to a physician or surgeon for medical or surgical treatment, if such treatment be required, or if such carrying is requested by * * * any occupant of the vehicle struck."

It further provides that the driver shall give the number of the automobile and the names of the persons in it. Any violation of any of these provisions is in terms made punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years, or in the county jail not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding $5,000, or both such fine and imprisonment.

[5-7] The purpose and propriety of the act are apparent. It was designed to prohibit, under pain of severe punishment, negligent or wanton drivers of motorcars from seeking to evade civil or criminal prosecution by escape before their identity could be established, and similarly to prohibit all drivers, whether negligent or not, from leaving persons injured in collisions with cars driven by them, in distress and danger for want of proper medical or surgical treatment. It was not designed to be used as a club to exact monetary settlement for injuries either to persons or property. One of two automobile drivers who may have been equally negligent in bringing about a collision in which neither driver was injured, by first demanding that he be carried to a hospital or surgeon, could not by the expedition of his demand, put the stamp of felony upon the other, who might refuse the request made in the terms of the statute, but made in bad faith.

[8] In the present case the complaining witness was driving alone. With the appellant, in the car he was driving, were four other persons. If none of them was hurt or required medical or surgical treatment, any one of the five in the appellant's car might first have asked the complaining witness for transportation to a surgeon, and he might have been accused of felony if he had said "there is no reason why I should provide transportation for you." Upon no reasonable hypotheses can the criminality of either of two actors be made to depend entirely upon which of the two shall first make a request of the other. Every statute must receive reasonable construction, and this is particularly true of statutes defining crimes.

"It is to be remembered that the letter of a penal statute is not of controlling force, and that the courts, in construing such statutes, from very ancient times have sought for the essence and spirit of the law and decided in accordance with them, even against express language; and in so doing they have not found it necessary to overthrow the law, but have made it applicable to the class of persons or the kind of acts clearly contemplated within its scope." Ex parte Lorenzen, 128 Cal. 431, 61 Pac. 68, 50 L. R. A. 55, 79 Am. St. Rep. 47.

"General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to injustice or oppression or an absurd consequence." People v. Earl, 19 Cal. App. 69–72, 124 Pac. 887, 888; U. S. v. Kirby, 7 Wall. 482, 19 L. Ed. 278.

Shortly after 6 o'clock on the evening of January 3, 1920, the appellant, driving a touring car, in which were his wife and three of his employees, turned his car across East Twelfth street, in Oakland, near its junction with Lake Shore avenue. While the rear wheels of his car were still in or close to the car tracks in the center of the street, the Ford car, driven by the complaining witness, who was alone, crashed into the front of the car driven by the appellant. Both cars stopped and both drivers alighted. There was an altercation between them concerning which was at fault, the complaining witness asserting that the appellant had improperly driven his car across the street, and the appellant claiming that the complaining witness had been driving at a dangerous and excessive rate of speed, but for which the collision would have been avoided. A number of persons collected at the scene of the accident, among them a fellow employee of the complaining witness, who was driving his own car, and who a little later took the complaining witness from the scene of the accident. During the altercation the complaining witness walked to the rear of the car of the appellant, ostensibly to get its number, when the appellant said to him, "That is unnecessary," and at the same time handed the complaining witness his business card. The length of the conversation was placed by various witnesses at from 8 to 10 or 15 minutes. The complaining witness gave several versions of what was said during the conversation. He was described by the appellant and by those in the car with him as being violent and boisterous in manner, and in one of the versions of his conversation he testified:

"As I said a while ago, I asked Mr. Kaufman to take me to the receiving hospital; that was no place to argue; that I was hurt, and he said, 'I will not.' Then I said, 'You are in the wrong; you are on the wrong side of the street.' I said, 'You ought to be arrested,' and with that he said, 'Who are you?' and he was in a very fighty mood, I suppose because I struck his car, and I kind of stepped back, and I said, 'I am a deputy sheriff,' and I flashed a badge."

The words, "I suppose because I struck his car," on motion were stricken out. The complaining witness was employed as a collector for a water company, and had been given a badge as a deputy sheriff, although he was not paid as such. He stated that when he showed his badge, the appellant said, "I don't care for your badge, and if you are the sheriff of this county, I wouldn't care for you either." The appellant then reentered his own car and drove away. The front axle of the appellant's car was bent, and the radiator and fenders were crushed. He was able to drive the car, but had great difficulty in steering it. The car of the complaining witness was badly injured, and was pushed aside, but left with the lights burning. The complaining witness was then taken by his coemployee in his car to the receiving hospital. This was Saturday night. The complaining witness had no further medical attention until after he called on the appellant at his place of business on Monday afternoon. As to what occurred at that time the complaining witness testified:

"As I entered the store, Mr. Kaufman looked at me, and I had my face all bandaged up, and he says, 'Oh, you are the man that hit my car Saturday night.' I said, 'Very naturally,' and I says, 'I hit your machine when you cut the corner at night.' I says, 'I didn't see you coming,' and I says, 'The least thing you could do was to take me to the hospital.' 'Oh,' he says, 'you were not hurt.' 'Well,' I says, 'I was hurt, and I am still hurt, and badly hurt.' I don't know what else took place. Anyway, he said something and I says, 'Well, I ain't going to argue with you at all, Mr. Kaufman.' I did say, 'What are we going to do about it' or, 'what are you going to do about it,' something like that, and he said, 'There is nothing to be done; you were wrong; you were driving 45 miles an hour;' and as he said that I walked out."

Being asked if he did not tell the appellant something about having him arrested, he replied:

"I did say—when he said he wasn't going to do anything about it, I says, 'I am.'"

Again being asked if he had not said anything about having the appellant arrested, he replied:

"Not that I remember."

His attention being called to his evidence given at the preliminary examination, it was stipulated that he then testified that—

When he visited the appellant's store he asked the appellant what he intended to do about his car. "I said, 'the least you can do is to fix the car.' I said to him, 'You know you were in the wrong.'"

He was then asked if that was all that was said, and he replied on the preliminary examination:

"Well, he said he would not ask me anything for his damages; that I could pay my own; that I would never get a cent out of him, and I told him I would proceed."

[9] The animus of the complaining witness had no bearing on the trial of the case, except upon the question of his credibility. He testified he was thrown across the steering wheel of the car by the collision and was "knocked out," as he expressed it, for several minutes. Further, that his face struck the stanchion of the car and was cut. It was bleeding during the altercation, which took place immediately after the accident. There was no attempt on the part of the appellant to hide his identity, and he and those with him testified that the complaining witness did not ask to be taken to the hospital. The conviction of the appellant rests solely upon the acceptance by the jury of the version of the complaining witness that he made this request and their understanding of the instructions of the court in regard to the provisions of section 21 of the Motor Vehicle Act. There is no attack upon the instructions. Section 21 of the act was read to the jury, and apparently no request was made or instruction asked in any way limiting its language to the effect that if the occupant of the motorcar in a collision asks and is refused transportation to a physician or surgeon, the driver refusing the request is guilty of a felony.

[10] On cross-examination the complaining witness was asked if shortly before the collision he had not had a quarrel and scuffle with his son, in which his face was scratched. He sought to avoid interrogation upon this subject, and counsel for the appellant was not permitted to question him in regard to the details of that quarrel. In view of the entire character of the evidence given by the complaining witness, it appears that cross-examination upon that subject would have been proper as a means of testing the credibility of his statement in regard to his injuries, and incidentally his credibility regarding the entire matter. The error, however, would be inconsiderable if on the entire record it appeared justice had been done, but this does not appear.

The physician, to whom the complaining witness went after his visit to the store of the appellant, testified that at that time his face was cut and the portion of his trunk near the lower ribs appeared to be sore to the touch and was slightly discolored as from a bruise. He frankly admitted that except from the statements made to him by the complaining witness, he had no means of knowing how the injuries were caused. On the motion for a new trial the affidavits of the wife and son of the complaining witness were presented, together with the affidavits of persons in whose presence these affidavits were made. In substance the affidavits covered the same facts. From that of the son of the complaining witness it appears that between 4.50 and 5:15 o'clock in the afternoon of the day of the collision, the complaining witness left his son's house in Oakland, and that a few minutes before the complaining witness and his son were in a struggle and scuffle; that at that time the complaining witness threatened his son, who, in order to avoid being struck and injured by the complaining witness, was compelled to wrestle with him and to hold his hands; that during the scuffle the complaining witness struck his head against the corner of the building causing a gash from which the blood flowed freely; that when the complaining witness left his house the blood was actually flowing freely from the gash then cut, and that the complaining witness was then bruised, injured, and was in pain. It appeared further that the struggle was so violent and the complaining witness treated his son so roughly that the sleeve of the son's coat was completely torn out. When he left his house the complaining witness was in a most highly excited fighting, and threatening mood. In view of these statements and the effect they would have had upon the question of the credibility of the complaining witness, particularly in the matter of how he received his injuries, and in view of the palpable attempt to collect money from the appellant prior to any suggestion of arrest on this felony charge, this court is of the opinion that the motion for a new trial should have been granted. Upon retrial the jury should be instructed in regard to the proper limitations to be placed upon the express language of the highly penal statute upon which this prosecution is based. The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

On Petition for Rehearing.

LANGDON, P. J. [11] In denying the petition for rehearing filed on behalf of the people in this case it is proper to state that a reexamination of the record fails to disclose any divergence between the evidence and the statements in the original opinion. It is strongly urged that the decision is at variance with the salutary rules against granting new trials solely on the ground of newly discovered evidence directed solely to the impeachment of a witness, or solely, for the purpose of contradicting him. These rules are fully established, and ought to be maintained. There is nothing in the original opinion in conflict with them. The construction and application of the Motor Vehicle Act were properly before this court. In the trial of the case it was rigidly applied to a case perhaps within its letter, but wholly outside its spirit. This court interpreted the law. The state failed to show any essential element of criminality on the part of the defendant. The remarks of the trial court about the immateriality of the details of the quarrel between the prosecuting witness and his son, it was claimed, prevented the defendant from fully cross-examining the prosecuting witness upon the vital question of whether or not he was injured in the collision. On motion for new trial, affidavits before the court tended to show that the injuries of which the prosecuting witness complained were received during a brutal fight with his son shortly before, and were in no way connected with the collision. Under all these circumstances, the exercise of sound judicial discretion demanded that a new trial be granted, to the end that unless a crime had been committed the brand of a conviction of felony should not be stamped upon defendant to disgrace him and the members of his family in later years.

Rehearing is denied.

CANDEIAS v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR MERCED COUNTY et al.

(Civ. 2244.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 16, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 13, 1920.)

1. Mandamus ⊂=55—District Court of Appeal cannot substitute its discretion for that vested in trial judge to pass upon merits of application for stay of execution.

In a proceeding in the District Court of Appeal for a writ of mandate, the court cannot substitute its own discretion for the discretion vested by the law in the judge of the lower court to pass upon the merits of an application for a stay of execution made pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1176, it being for the trial court to determine whether without a stay the objects of the appeal would be defeated, or that a stay was reasonably necessary to protect appellant from irreparable or serious injury in case of a reversal, or whether with a stay respondent, in event of affirmance, will sustain an irreparable or disproportionate injury, and, in order to invoke a writ of mandamus, it must be shown from the records that there were no facts or circumstances to sustain the action in refusing the application for a stay, and that consequently the order refusing to grant the stay was made without jurisdiction.

2. Mandamus ⊂=55—Court did not act without semblance of cause in refusing to grant stay of execution.

A refusal to order a stay of execution upon a judgment of dispossession in an unlawful detainer suit in which an appeal was taken could not be said, on petition in the District Court of Appeal for a writ of mandate, to have been without semblance of cause, where there was a showing that injury to alfalfa on the land was willful and was continued even after the trial of the case and was progressive in its nature, and that the attempts of petitioner to restore it by replowing and reseeding were abortive by reason of his unfarmerlike methods.

Application by A. S. Candeias for a writ of mandate to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Merced, and Hon. E. N. Rector, Judge of such court. Writ discharged.

L. C. Pistolesi, of San Francisco, and O. F. Meldon, of Sausalito, for petitioner.

F. W. Henderson, of Merced, for respondent.

BUCK, Presiding Judge pro tem. Mandamus to compel respondent, as judge of the superior court of the county of Merced, to order a stay of execution upon a judgment of dispossession rendered against petitioner in an unlawful detainer suit now on appeal to this court.

From the petition and return it appears that petitioner was the tenant of one Pfitzer of an 80-acre dairy farm under a five-year lease, expiring in December of 1922. At the time of the lease, there were about 45 acres of the land planted to alfalfa, and by the terms of the lease petitioner agreed to "keep all stock off of the alfalfa land when the same is wet; to keep the hogs in a special field, and not to allow the same to run in any other field or fields; and in the event that any of the alfalfa is tramped out or damaged by stock, said party of the second part (petitioner) agrees to reseed the same at his own cost and expense." The petitioner had on the premises about 80 dairy cows, and the necessary implements and appliances for conducting a dairy business.

On April 21st of this year an action in unlawful detainer was commenced by the lessor against the petitioner wherein it was claimed that the petitioner had failed and refused to keep his stock off the said alfalfa land when it was wet, but had suffered it to run upon the land seeded to alfalfa while the same was wet, and that, by reason of its being wet, cattle pasturing thereon bogged into the same, tracked it up, and injured and destroyed to a great extent the alfalfa growing thereon. Upon a trial of the cause and the hearing of testimony the court found in accordance with the foregoing allegation, and further found that by reason of the pasturing of said land "that plaintiffs have been damaged in the sum of one hundred dollars, and that defendant has violated the covenants of his lease," and rendered judgment restoring to plaintiffs the possession of the property, and evicting defendant therefrom, and for a cancellation of the lease. That thereafter petitioner filed his notice of appeal and made application to the judge of the court, respondent herein, to fix the amount of the bond on appeal, pursuant to section 945, Code of Civil Procedure, and for an order directing a stay of execution upon the filing of the bond, pursuant to section 1176, Code of Civil Procedure. A hearing was had upon this application, and there was testimony to the effect that petitioner, since the trial of the action, had, by unfarmerlike methods, failed properly to irrigate and properly direct the irrigation water over the land seeded to alfalfa; had caused great injury to the land seeded to alfalfa, and to the crops growing thereon; that his work in the way of plowing and reseeding had been of no advantage to himself or the owner; that a portion reseeded in 1920 to alfalfa by the petitioner had failed to produce a fair stand of alfalfa; that the injury done by him to the premises was progressive in its nature, and that the further occupancy of the premises by him would be detrimental to the interests of the owners of the land; that a portion of the premises upon which there was a fair stand of alfalfa at the time petitioner entered into possession had been plowed up since the trial of the action, and that this work was of no benefit to the property; that the methods pursued by petitioner in the cultivation of the premises and the irrigation of the crop, the drainage of the irrigated land, and the care of the premises generally, were unfarmerlike; that upon the trial of said action testimony was adduced by the plaintiffs satisfying the court's mind that the pasturing of cattle upon said premises while wet was willful; that the field where the principal damage was done had deteriorated from a field which, when petitioner went into possession, produced from five to six tons of alfalfa hay per year, produced not more than one-half a ton to one ton a year, and that principally foxtail; that the evidence on the part of the plaintiff was also, in substance, that petitioner had plowed up certain portions of the land, and plaintiffs had furnished seed twice for the reseeding thereof; that the work so done proved of no value, and no stand was obtained; that, upon the third demand being made by petitioner upon plaintiffs, plaintiffs refused to furnish further seed because of petitioner's unfarmerlike methods and failure to get results.

Upon the hearing of the motion for a stay, counsel for petitioner represented that petitioner had stored upon said premises a quantity of hay, amounting to about 150 tons, and plaintiff stated in open court that a reasonable time would be allowed said petitioner to remove the hay.

From the testimony taken at the trial, and upon the hearing of the application for a stay, respondent was convinced:

"That if petitioner were permitted to continue in possession of said premises, the injury done by him thereto would be irreparable, and that the owners of said premises would not be protected by any bond given by him; that the damage done by petitioner, not only to the crops thereon, but also to the land itself, would be continuous."

Whereupon the respondent denied the application for a stay.

[1] In this proceeding for a writ of mandate this court cannot substitute its own discretion for the discretion vested by law in the judge of the lower court to pass upon the merits of the application for a stay. It was for that court to determine whether without a stay the objects of the appeal would be defeated, or that a stay was reasonably necessary to protect appellant from irreparable or serious injury in case of a reversal; or whether with a stay respondent, in event of affirmance, will sustain an irreparable or disproportionate injury. 3 Corpus Juris, pp. 1289 and 1290, and cases cited.

In order to invoke against the respondent herein the writ of mandamus, petitioner must show from the record that there were no facts or circumstances to sustain the action of the trial judge in refusing the application for a stay, and that consequently the order refusing to grant the stay was made without jurisdiction; or, as stated in the case of Raisch v. Board of Education, 81 Cal. 542, at page 546, 22 Pac. 890, at page 891, "there was no semblance of cause" for the action of the court; or, as stated by Mr. Justice Henshaw in the case of Newlands v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 741, at page 744, 154 Pac. 829, at page 831, petitioner should show "that discretion under the facts can be legally exercised in but one way," before he will be entitled to his writ of mandate. The case of Wood v. Strother, 76 Cal. 545, 18 Pac. 766, 9 Am. St. Rep. 249, relied upon by counsel, as cited in Hensley v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 541, at page 543, 44 Pac. at page 232, goes no furtner than to hold that where "the law affixes a right to specific relief from certain facts, and there is no question made as to the existence of such facts, the court has no discretion to refuse the relief. In such a case the limit of the discretionary power of the court has been reached, and nothing but a clear duty remains." See, also, Kaiser v. Hancock, 25 Cal. App. 323, 143 Pac. 614; Plummer v. Agoure, 20 Cal. App. 319, 128 Pac. 1014.

[2] Therefore, in view of the showing in this case that the injury to the alfalfa, which was a portion of the land, was willful, and was continued even after the trial of the case, and was progressive in its nature, and that the attempts of petitioner to restore the alfalfa by replowing and reseeding were abortive by reason of his unfarmerlike methods, this court cannot conclude that the respondent acted without semblance of cause in finding that irreparable injury would be caused plaintiff if the defendant were permitted to remain in possession of the premises, and that an appeal bond would not afford plaintiff full protection.

The petitioner, therefore, having failed to show that the respondent was acting outside of his duty in refusing to grant the stay, the writ should be discharged, and it is so ordered.

MURRAY v. CALIFORNIA CONSERVING CO. (Civ. 3538.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 19, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 16, 1920.)

1. Work and labor ⊂⊃14(1), 24(2)—Contract held properly introduced in evidence in action in form of common count.

Where full performance of a contract on part of plaintiff was prevented by acts of defendant, plaintiff could treat contract as abandoned, and bring action in form of a common count, and introduce thereunder the contract and show the acts amounting to an interference, and recover thereunder the amount specified in the contract, and the reasonable value of extra work done under a supplementary oral agreement.

2. Principal and agent ⊂⊃101(1)—Contract for extra work entered into within ostensible authority of agent binding.

Where superintendent of defendant's packing plant was so far in charge of the operation of the plant as to possess at least ostensible authority to make a supplemental contract for extra work, plaintiff was entitled to rely upon that fact in proceeding to do the work and to recover for the material furnished and the services rendered.

3. Contracts ⊂⊃303(5)—Defects in ventilating system no defense, when caused by defendant's neglect.

Where plaintiff guaranteed that ventilating system would exhaust superheated air and steam, he was entitled to recover the contract price, where such system, when first installed, did for a time accomplish its purpose, and only failed to do so when motors and material had been so affected by contact with the steam within the room as to refuse to function, which contact was due to lack of proper housing of the motors, which under the agreement it was the duty of the defendant to have provided.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by Michael F. Murray against the California Conserving Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wise & O'Connor and Altman & Goldman, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harrison S. Robinson and Harry L. Price, both of Oakland, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $2,305.23. The facts out of which the defendant's alleged liability arose were the following: In the month of September, 1917, the defendant had completed a building in connection with its packing plant in Haywards, which was to be used for packing and canning tomato products. On the top floor of this building was a room equipped with 25 large copper kettles, which were to be used in heating tomato pulp for the purpose of exhausting a certain quantity of water therefrom as to make the product fit for commercial purposes. It was found that when this portion of the plant was put in operation the said room became filled with steam so as to make it impossible for men to remain at work therein for any considerable length of time. It became necessary to remedy this condition immediately, and with that end in view the defendant's superintendent of the plant requested the plaintiff to call at the plant on the afternoon of September 27, 1917, for the purpose of a consultation as to how to effectually remove the practical difficulties of the situation. The plaintiff suggested a system of ventilation by the use of fans and motors, and it was agreed that he should investigate the matter and report with respect to such system and the cost of installing the same. A few days later the plaintiff submitted a proposition in writing, in which, representing the company with which he was connected, it was proposed to furnish and install certain fans and motors of specified sizes and power, together with the switch boxes, starting devices, belting and wires necessary to connect the same with the defendant's wiring system already installed in the building. By the terms of this proposition all necessary connecting, framing, carpenter work, housing, and the furnishing of all labor and material necessary for the installation of said motors and fans except that above specified was to be furnished by the defendant as the owner of the building. The plaintiff's proposition embraced the following statement:

"It is the intention and understanding that the three exhaust fans on the roof will exhaust the air and surplus steam from the room directly below and the 2–24" fans in the window spaces will deliver fresh air into the room, thus making the workroom as habitable as it is ordinarily expected of a room of its kind. Above work for the sum of $1,500."

The defendant, acting through its said superintendent, accepted the foregoing proposition, and the work of installing the ventilating system was at once entered upon, and, in so far as the plaintiff was concerned, was completed on or about October 4, 1917. The system was at once put in operation, and for a portion of the first day apparently accomplished the purpose for which it was installed, namely, that of clearing the room of steam. Toward the close of said day, however, it was found that the motors stopped and refused to further function. The cause of this stoppage was apparently due to the fact that the defendant had not properly or sufficiently done the work of constructing certain conduits and housings for the protection of the motors, and other material which the plaintiff had installed, from the effect of the steam arising from the boiling mixture. When this fact was discovered a further oral agreement was made between the plaintiff and the superintendent of the defendant by which certain additional work was to be done by the former for the purpose of remedying these discovered defects. The plaintiff proceeded to do this extra work at an expense to him of $805.23. In the meantime, however, the defendant had not done certain work which it was to do for the purpose of housing the motors, and the result was that they again refused to function, after a short period of trial, on account of their contact with the steam of the superheated room. Thereupon the defendant, without further consultation with the plaintiff, removed all the material used in the ventilating system installed by the plaintiff, and informed him that it did not wish him to do anything further in relation to the matter. The plaintiff demanded payment of the sum of $1,500 claimed to be due upon his accepted proposition, and the further sum of $805.23 for the extra work performed. These demands being by the defendant refused, the plaintiff instituted the present action.

The complaint filed herein was in the form of the common count for work and labor done and performed and material furnished by plaintiff to defendant, at the special instance and request of the latter, of the reasonable value of $2,305.23. The answer of the defendant consisted in specific denials of the averments of the plaintiff's complaint, and the cause went to trial upon the issues thus framed. At the time of trial the defendant presented and was permitted to file a further and separate answer, alleging, in substance, though not in express terms, the agreement between the parties with reference to the installation of said ventilating system, and then proceeding to aver that such ventilating system, so installed under said agreement, had proven unsatisfactory, and had failed to so exhaust the air and surplus steam from the premises, or to so deliver fresh air into the same, as to render the same habitable, or to make it possible for the workmen of defendant to continue their labors in the said room, and that for that reason the defendant had been compelled to remove and did remove, the plaintiff's ventilating system from the premises.

Upon the introduction of evidence pro and con upon the issues thus framed the cause was presented to the jury under the instructions of the court, and the jury presently returned a verdict in the plaintiff's favor for the full sum demanded in his complaint. From the judgment entered upon such verdict the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

The first contention of the appellant is that the trial court was in error in giving to the jury the following instruction:

"If you find from the evidence that a portion of the work incidental to the ventilating system was to be done by the defendant corporation, then there was an implied contract on the part of the defendant to perform its share of such work in such manner as to enable the plaintiff to complete his share of the work in the manner agreed upon. And if you find that the defendant failed to perform in a workmanlike manner its share of the work, and such failure prevented plaintiff from completing the work, then your verdict should be in favor of plaintiff and against defendant."

And again:

"If the ventilating apparatus failed to ventilate the building because of careless or unskillful installation by the employees of the defendant of the wiring system, or the failure to house, or the careless or unskillful housing, by the employees of the defendant of any of the motors which constituted part of such ventilating system, then the defendant, and not the plaintiff, is answerable for such failure."

The basis of the appellant's objection to these instructions is its claim that the plaintiff, having predicated his action upon performance on his part of the agreement for the installation of the ventilating system in question, and having failed to show performance on his part of that portion of said agreement which is above quoted, as expressing the intent and understanding that the ventilating system would so exhaust the steam-laden air from and so deliver fresh air into the workroom to be ventilated as to make the same habitable for the workmen employed therein, was not under such a pleading entitled to prove prevention of performance on the part of the defendant as a basis for his recovery under the common counts; and hence that the above-quoted instructions on the part of the court were erroneous.

[1] We find no merit in this contention. The plaintiff brought this action in the form of the common counts, upon the theory, well established in a long line of cases in this state, that where full performance on the part of the plaintiff has been prevented by acts of the defendant, the plaintiff may treat the contract as abandoned, and bring a suit under the common counts for the reasonable value of the materials furnished and services performed. Jones & L. Co. v. Doble Co., 162 Cal. 497, 123 Pac. 290; Brown v. Crown G. M. Co., 150 Cal. 376, 89 Pac. 86; Griffith v. Happersberger, 86 Cal. 605, 25 Pac. 137, 487. In accordance with the principle announced in these cases we are of the opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to bring this action in the form of a common count, and to introduce thereunder the contract entered into between the parties, and show the defendant's acts amounting to an interference with the full performance of the same upon the part of plaintiff, and to recover thereunder the amount specified in said contract and the reasonable value of such extra work as had been done under the supplementary oral agreement. The instructions of the court to which the defendant objected were therefore correct in their application to the facts of the case at bar. The cases cited by the defendant in support of his foregoing contention do not sustain it, and, when examined in the light of the facts to which they refer, are not in conflict with the authorities above cited.

[2] The next contention of the appellant is that the plaintiff, in so far as he relied upon his alleged right to recover for the extra work done under the oral agreement between him and the superintendent of the defendant, was not entitled to recover for the same, for the reason that he failed to establish authority on the part of said superintendent of defendant to enter into said oral supplementary agreement, and we find this contention also to be devoid of merit. The evidence, in our opinion, sufficiently shows that the superintendent of defendant was so far in charge of the operation of its packing plant as to possess at least ostensible authority to make both of the agreements in question, and that the plaintiff was entitled to rely upon that fact in proceeding to do the work performed by him under the supplemental oral agreement, and hence was entitled to recover for the same.

[3] The final contention of the appellant is that the plaintiff by his written agreement in substance guaranteed that the ventilating system to be installed by him thereunder would exhaust the superheated air and steam from the place in which it was to be installed, and would so introduce fresh air into the same as to render it habitable for workmen, and that, having failed to perform this condition of his contract, he is not entitled to recover. The difficulty with this contention consists in the fact that the evidence sufficiently shows that when the plaintiff's ventilating system was installed and put in operation it did for a time accomplish its purpose, and only failed to do so when its motors and material had been so affected by contact with the steam within said room as to refuse to function, which contact was due to the lack of proper housing, which, under the aforesaid agreement, it was the duty of the defendant to have provided. We find, therefore, that this final contention of the appellant is also untenable.

NEWARK TRUST CO. v. KRIEBEL et al.

(Civ. 3468.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. Oct. 18, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⊜863—Matters reviewable on appeal from order denying motion to vacate judgment.

Where plaintiff did not appeal from a judgment for defendant, but from an order denying its motion to vacate the judgment and to enter judgment for plaintiff on the findings, the only question before the reviewing court was whether or not the conclusions of law were consistent with and supported by the findings of fact.

2. Bills and notes ⊜291—Payee holding note in trust held not liable on indorsement merely for purpose of transferring legal title.

A payee of a note, holding the same as trustee for a corporation in process of organization, did not render himself liable as an indorsee, where the indorsement was made merely for the purpose of transferring legal title to one who had knowledge of the trust relation.

3. Corporations ⊜82—No obligation on purchaser of corporate stock under contract to demand resale at certain price within certain time.

Under a contract by a trustee for subscribers and a corporation in process of organization, reciting, "It is also understood I will personally sell for you 16,000 shares of stock in the new company at par, less 10 per cent., within three months of the organization of the company," there was no obligation on the part of defendant purchaser to make demand on the trustee to carry out such engagement, though defendant did not in terms agree to sell the stock; the consideration for such promise being a note given for the price of the shares of stock, as collateral to which the stock was left in the hands of the trustee.

4. Corporations ⊜82—Stipulation by corporation to repurchase stock not fraud on other subscribers.

A stipulation between a corporation and a purchaser of stock therein, whereby the corporation agrees to repurchase such stock on certain conditions, is not to be denounced as a fraud on other subscribers and creditors of the corporation, where it is not shown that any fraudulent invasion of the rights of stockholders or creditors has been attempted or would result.

5. Corporations ⊜82—Knowledge of an agent and trustee for subscribers of the terms of a conditional agreement made with a subscriber, imputed to them.

Knowledge of the terms of a conditional agreement with a subscriber for stock, made by an agent and trustee for other subscribers while acting as such, will be imputed to the other subscribers.

6. Bills and notes ⊜140—Execution of renewal note no waiver of defenses to original.

Where payee by her attorney upon executing a renewal note informed the holder thereof that she would defend any suit to enforce its collection, there was no waiver of such defenses as she might have had to the original note.

7. Estoppel ⊜52—"Waiver" is intentional relinquishment.

A "waiver" is the intentional relinquishment of a known right after knowledge of the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Waiver.]

8. Corporations ⊜83—No obligation on part of subscriber for stock, desiring to rescind, to return stock of no value.

To rescind a stock subscription contract under Civ. Code § 1689, it was not necessary to return the stock, where it was absolutely valueless, in view of section 1691, subd. 2.

9. Corporations ⊜117—When maker of note for stock may rescind on failure of consideration, or wait and defend on that ground.

Upon failure of consideration for a note, the maker could either rescind at once or wait and defend on that ground any suit that might be brought on the note; the consideration for the note being corporate stock which was deposited with the payee as collateral therefor.

10. Pleading ⊜93(1)—Inconsistent defenses may be set up without waiver.

It is permissible to set up inconsistent defenses without raising presumption that one is a waiver of the other.

11. Pleading ⊜92—Counterclaim based on breach of contract held not waiver of defense of rescission.

A counterclaim for damages for breach of contract was not a waiver of a defense of rescission; and, where defendant was not permitted to recover upon her counterclaim, the allegations regarding the recovery of damages may be treated as surplusage in support of the judgment, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §

441, providing defendant may set up as many defenses and counterclaims as he may have.

12. Appeal and error ⟹1039(1)—Reversal not warranted merely because of error in pleadings.

Where it plainly appears from the entire record that substantial justice has been done between the parties, a reversal is not warranted because of any error in the pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by the Newark Trust Company against Fred L. Kriebel and others. From an order denying plaintiff's motion to set aside a judgment for defendants, and enter judgment for plaintiff on the pleadings, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Irvin C. Louis and Rush M. Blodget, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Newlin & Ashburn, of Los Angeles (J. W. McKinley, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent Phillips.

W. E. Shelton, of Los Angeles, for respondent Kriebel.

LANGDON, P. J. [1] This is an appeal from an order denying plaintiff's motion to set aside the judgment for defendants and enter judgment for plaintiff on the findings. A jury was impaneled advisory to the court, and found certain facts which the court adopted in its findings, and also returned a general verdict in favor of the defendant Phillips, and the court gave judgment in her favor. Plaintiff did not appeal from this judgment, but now appeals from an order denying its motion to vacate the judgment in favor of defendant and to enter judgment for plaintiff on the findings. Consequently, the only question before this court is whether or not the conclusions of law are consistent with and supported by the findings of fact.

The action was brought upon a promissory note for $10,000, given by defendant Phillips in renewal of a note for the same amount. The original note was given in June, 1913, to defendant Kriebel, as trustee for the Rector Automatic Radiator Company, a corporation to be formed in the future. This note had attached to it a collateral agreement pledging certain stock as security therefor. The court submitted to the jury four special interrogatories, which were answered by the jury. The findings of the jury upon these questions were adopted by the court in its findings, and will be discussed in connection therewith. The findings of the court disclose the following facts:

On June 20, 1913, the defendant Jane M. Phillips executed and delivered to defendant Kriebel a promissory note for $10,000. This note was given in part payment for something over 16,000 shares of stock in a company thereafter to be formed and incorporated under the name of Rector Automatic Radiator Company, which company was later incorporated as planned. The defendant Kriebel, in selling the said stock to the defendant Phillips, and in taking said promissory note in part payment therefor, was acting as agent and trustee for the said corporation thereafter to be formed, and for the subscribers to the stock thereof, and he took the said promissory note in his own name, but in trust for the said corporation and its stockholders. Said defendant Kriebel also, contemporaneously with the execution of said promissory note, and while acting as such agent and trustee, and as a part of said transaction for the sale and purchase of said stock of the Rector Automatic Radiator Company and the execution of said promissory note for $10,000, and in order to induce the making of said note by said defendant Phillips, did execute and deliver, in his capacity as agent and trustee for the said corporation and its stockholders, a certain instrument reading as follows:

"In making this subscription, it is also understood I will personally sell for you 16,000 shares of stock in the new company at par, less ten per cent., within three months from the organization of the company."

The promise made by said Kriebel to sell said stock for defendant Phillips which was contained in said contemporaneous written agreement was a promise made by him in his capacity as agent and trustee, and was so understood by the defendants Kriebel and Phillips, and said promise constituted the substantial consideration for the said promissory note.

Kriebel did not, at any time, either in his individual capacity or as such agent and trustee, nor did the Rector Automatic Radiator Company, ever sell, or attempt to sell, for the defendant Phillips 16,000 shares of said stock, either at the price named in said agreement, or at any other price.

The court further found that by reason of the failure to perform the terms of said agreement to so sell 16,000 shares of said stock, there was a total failure of consideration for the said promissory note dated June 20, 1913. It was the note given as a renewal of said note on June 20, 1913, that was the basis of the present action.

The court also found that at the time of the execution and delivery of the said note dated June 20, 1913, by the defendant Phillips, and at the time of the receipt thereof by defendant Kriebel, and at the time of the receipt thereof by the defendant Rector Gas Lamp Company (the assignee of Kriebel, trustee), said company had full knowledge of the contents of said writing, wherein Kriebel as agent for the Rector Automatic Radiator Company, agreed to sell said stock; and that the Rector Automatic Radiator Company and its assignee, Rector Gas Lamp Company, fully acquiesced in and consented to the terms of said agreement at and before the time of the transfer of the said promissory note to one Waters B. Day, who was the real owner at the time of the commencement of this action; plaintiff being the assignee of said note merely for the purpose of collection.

The court further found that at the time of the commencement of this action, the stock agreed to be purchased by defendant Phillips under said stock subscription agreement was of no value whatsoever. It further appears from the record that the defendant Phillips is an incompetent, and was represented in this action by her general guardian.

[2] With reference to the judgment in favor of defendant Kriebel, it was found that the Rector Gas Lamp Company, the first assignee herein, knew, at the time the note was assigned to it, that the said Kriebel was not the owner of said note, but was holding the same as trustee for the Rector Automatic Radiator Company, and that the assignment by said Kriebel of said note and collateral agreement was merely for the purpose of transferring to the said Rector Gas Lamp Company the legal title to said note, and that said assignment and indorsement was not made for the purpose of guaranteeing personally the payment of said note. It was also found that said indorsement was made by the said defendant Kriebel, as agent and trustee, for the purpose of transferring said note. These findings, of course, warrant the denial of judgment in favor of the plaintiff as against defendant Kriebel.

[3] However, the real attack is made upon the judgment in favor of defendant Phillips. It is urged with reference to this, first: That defendant Kriebel was under no obligation to sell the stock in question under his agreement as trustee with defendant Phillips, unless defendant Phillips should, within the time specified in said agreement, request him to do so, and tender the stock to him. There is a finding of the court upon this point, that defendant Phillips did not make demand upon Kriebel to sell said stock within three months after the incorporation of the company, and did not offer him the stock. But there is also a finding that defendant Phillips did everything that was required of her under said agreement, and that she was not obligated to offer said stock to defendant Kriebel. Appellant contends that the force of this general finding of full performance on the part of defendant Phillips is overcome by the special finding that she did not offer the stock to Kriebel for sale. In the first place, it appears from the complaint and the findings that 40,000 shares of said stock of said Rector Automatic Radiator Company were deposited with defendant Kriebel as collateral security for the payment of the promissory note, in lieu of other security which was returned by Kriebel to defendant Phillips. It, therefore, appears that at all times the defendant Kriebel had in his possession more than the 16,000 shares of the stock which he had agreed to sell. But quite apart from this consideration, it appears from said agreement for the resale that there was no obligation on the part of defendant Phillips to make demand upon Kriebel to carry out his positive engagment. Kriebel contracted unconditionally to sell 16,000 shares of said stock, which was in his possession as collateral, within three months after the incorporation of the company. It is true defendant Phillips did not, in terms agree to sell the stock. It is immaterial to this inquiry whether she might have declined to sell after a purchaser had been found by Kriebel, as contended by appellant. For regardless of this, Kriebel was bound to make an offer of performance of his positive engagement. He had accepted a valuable consideration for his promise, the promissory note in question, as found by the court. If defendant Phillips then had the privilege of accepting or rejecting such offer, in this respect only the contract was an option contract, as contended by appellant. It was not optional with Kriebel whether he would perform or not. His positive undertaking to sell 16,000 shares of the stock at a certain price within a specified time, for which promise he had received a valuable consideration, coupled with the fact that 40,000 shares of said stock were in his possession as collateral security, certainly made it unnecessary for defendant Phillips to make demand upon him to do what he had contracted to do, irrespective of the question of whether or not she might have paid the note, released the collateral, and refused to sell at all. So long as she had not waived her rights, or released him from his duty under the agreement by refusing to sell, he was bound to sell within the time covered by the contract.

[4] Appellant also argues that the subscription contract for the stock and the note given therefor was a contract between defendant Phillips and the other subscribers to the stock, and such a contract cannot be varied by a separate writing such as this agreement to resell the stock. However, the answer to this objection appears in the findings that all parts of this contract—the subscription agreement, the note, the agreement to resell—were between Kriebel, as agent for the stockholders, and defendant Phillips; that the contract in all its parts and terms was known to said company and the subscribers to its stock. Such an agreement is, of course not void against the other stockholders. It is their contract, and assented to by them. A stipulation between a corporation and a purchaser of stock therein, whereby the corporation agrees to repurchase such stock upon certain conditions, is not to be denounced as a fraud on other subscribers and creditors of the corporation, where it is not shown that any fraudulent invasion of the rights of stockholders or creditors has been attempted or would result. Schulte v. Boulevard Gardens Land Co., 164 Cal. 464, 129 Pac. 582. In said last-cited case, at page 468 thereof (164 Cal.), at page 583 of 129 Pac., it is said:

"In the case at bar, however, we have something more than a mere attempt by a stockholder to sell, and by a corporation to buy, shares of stock. The plaintiff is seeking to enforce a part of an entire contract under which the stock was originally issued to him. The right to return the stock and to receive the sum agreed to be paid upon such return was a material and indivisible part of the consideration upon which the plaintiff agreed to become a stockholder. As between the parties it would be manifestly unjust to permit the corporation to retain the money paid by plaintiff, and at the same time to repudiate the promise which it gave in exchange for the money. The obligation to pay, upon a return of the shares, the sum agreed to be paid, is not to be viewed as a new undertaking, arising after the plaintiff * * * became a stockholder. The sale to plaintiff was conditional. He never became a stockholder except subject to the qualification that he might return his shares upon the stipulated terms."

[5] It is to be remembered that in the present case, as in the case from which quotation has just been made, the rights of creditors are not involved, and it appears from the findings that the assignee of this note from the Rector Automatic Radiator Company had full knowledge of and acquiesced in all the terms and conditions of the subscription contract. Nor does the case involve the question of the invalidity of secret stipulations limiting the apparent liability of certain subscribers. No facts appear to justify any inference of a fraudulent invasion of the rights of any stockholder, but on the contrary, it is found that the entire conditional agreement was made by Kriebel while he was acting as agent and trustee of the other subscribers. Knowledge of the terms of said conditional agreement with Phillips, made by their agent, will be imputed to such subscribers.

[6, 7] It is also claimed that defendant Phillips waived any defense she might have had to the original note given in 1913 by her renewal of the said note in 1914. The court found that upon this renewal of said note, defendant Phillips, by her attorney, informed the holder thereof that she would defend any suit to enforce its collection upon the ground that there had been a violation of the contract to resell the stock. This was correctly found by the trial court to amount to a reservation of all defenses to the original note, and to negative any waiver of such rights by a renewal thereof.

"Where a note is executed to a payee only in renewal of a prior note given to him, the real consideration for which it is given is that for which the prior note was given, and the failure of the consideration of the same may be pleaded in an action on the latter note." 8 Corpus Juris, p. 751, § 1022.

"The giving of a note, unexplained, is not conclusive evidence of a settlement of all the demands between the parties to such an instrument, but the question of the intent of the parties, in such case, is one of fact, to be determined by the jury from all the evidence relating to the transaction. * * * And so, also, whether a subsequent note is given in payment of, or only in renewal of, a prior note, is not a question of law, but one of fact, to be determined by the jury; and when it is given in renewal only of a prior note, the real consideration for which it is given is that for which the prior note was given, and it is, in a suit upon the subsequent note, competent to show that the consideration has failed." Wheelock v. Berkeley, 138 Ill. 153, 27 N. E. 942.

The jury found, and the court adopted such finding, that defendant Phillips did not waive her rights in renewing the note.

"Waiver is the intentional relinquishment of a known right after knowledge of the facts." Allen v. Mayfield, 164 Cal. 6, at page 11, 127 Pac. 45, at page 48.

The positive statement, therefore, of defendant Phillips to the holder of the note that she would enforce her rights as a defense against the note, negatives any intention to waive the same. The objection of the appellant that the renewal of the note was a waiver of the defenses against the original note is therefore without merit.

[8] Appellant contends that although the defendant Phillips might have rescinded the contract under section 1689, Civil Code, the aggrieved party must tender back what has been received under the contract as a condition precedent to a right to rescind. This is unquestionably the law, but the trial court found that the contract for resale which had not been performed by Kriebel was the only consideration for the promissory note, and that there was a total failure of consideration for the promissory note. Appellant argues that it appears from the other findings that the shares of stock in the Rector Automatic Radiator Company were also a consideration for the note, and that there is no finding they have been returned. The court found that at the time of the commencement of the action, the shares of stock were absolutely valueless. There is no obligation to return a consideration which is of no value whatever. Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 2; Gifford v. Carvill, 29 Cal. 593.

[9] It is claimed by appellant, however, that in the absence of a finding as to the value of the stock three months after the incorporation of the company—which is the time when performance of his obligation was due by Kriebel, and the time when he failed therein, and the time when Mrs. Phillips' right of rescission arose—it must be presumed that the stock was of some value at that time, and so should have been returned and rescission made at the proper time. It appears by the complaint and from the findings that 40,000 shares of this stock were in the hands of Kriebel or his assignees as collateral security for the note. Therefore defendant Phillips had not possession of the stock to give to the defaulting defendant, but the stock was actually in his own hands. She had the right, upon the failure of consideration for her note, either to rescind at once or to wait and defend upon that ground any suit that might be brought on her note, and she could not have recovered back these shares of stock deposited as collateral after successfully defending a suit upon the note given for their purchase price. It appears, therefore, that defendant Phillips has done everything required of her and everything that she could do.

There is one other matter urged by appellant which warrants consideration. It arises also in connection with the claim of waiver by defendant Phillips of her defenses to the note. Defendant Phillips, in addition to filing her answer in this cause, filed a cross-complaint against defendant Kriebel setting up the fact of the breach of his agreement to resell the stock for the price agreed upon therein, and asking damages for such breach of contract. She was not awarded such damages, but she was adjudged free from liability upon her note because of a failure of consideration therefor. Appellant points out that Mrs. Phillips had a choice of two remedies upon the failure of consideration—either the remedy of rescission and recovery of the consideration paid by her, or an affirmance of the contract, and a suit for damages. Therefore, it is argued, her cross-complaint in which she asked for damages for the breach was an affirmance of the contract; it was an election on her part not to rescind, and therefore the defense to her note based upon the theory of rescission of the contract should not have been permitted to her.

[10, 11] It is permissible to set up inconsistent defenses without raising a presumption that one is a waiver of the other. Billings v. Drew, 52 Cal. 565; Eppinger v. Kendrick, 5 Cal. Unrep. 295, at pages 300, 301, 44 Pac. 234; Snipsic Co. v. Smith, 7 Cal. App. 150, 93 Pac. 1035. We see no reason for a different rule when the allegations are set up in answer and counterclaim. Section 441, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that a defendant may set forth by answer as many defenses and counterclaims as he may have. As before stated, the defendant in the present case was not permitted to recover upon her counterclaim, and in support of the judgment we are of the opinion that the allegations regarding the recovery of damages may be treated as surplusage. In the case of Montgomery v. McLaury, 143 Cal. 83, 76 Pac. 964, a similar question was considered. At pages 87 and 88 thereof (143 Cal.), at page 966 of 76 Pac. it is said:

"It seems perfectly clear from the whole frame of the complaint, no less than from the specific relief which it prays, that the intention of the pleader was to state facts entitling him to the rescission which he prayed. But at the same time he stated facts showing that the plaintiffs had been damaged in the sum of $7,000, and since he prayed also for the recovery of that amount of damages, it would seem that the theory of the complaint was to set forth all the facts surrounding the transaction * * * and to pray for any and every kind of relief to which, upon the facts, the plaintiffs might be found entitled. In most cases this is a correct theory of pleading under our system of practice, which recognizes but one form of action—an action on the case. But it sometimes happens that a party seeking redress for an injury is obliged to make an election between two inconsistent positions, and planting himself firmly upon one to definitely renounce the other before he can claim relief in any form. Such, appellants contend, is the case here. The doctrine is well settled, they say, that one defrauded in a bargain is restricted to one of two remedies, between which he must make an election before he can institute an action. He may affirm the contract and have his action at law for damages for the deceit, or he may disaffirm the contract and sue in equity for a rescission, but he cannot pursue both remedies at the same time, nor either until he has affirmed or disaffirmed the contract; for until he affirms he has no cause of action for the deceit, and until he disaffirms, he has no right to a rescission. * * * There is no such rigid and inexorable rule as to election of remedies in cases of fraud as that for which the appellants contend. It is undoubtedly true that when one who has been defrauded in a contract elects to affirm it after discovery of the full extent of the fraud he cannot afterwards claim a rescission. This is simply a result flowing from the general doctrine of estoppel. But an election to disaffirm a contract induced by fraud, and an effort to obtain a rescission, will not, if resisted, * * * bar an action based upon a subsequent affirmance of the contract. * * * It is not denied that the complaint in this case contains every allegation necessary to sustain an action for deceit, but appellants contend that other allegations which it contains, as well as its specific prayer for relief, show that the contract has been disaffirmed, and therefore that it will not sustain a judgment based upon the theory of affirmance. * * * There does not seem to be any good reason why, after a trial of the issues and after findings by the court which show that a rescission has been made impossible by the acts of the appellants, those portions of the complaint which are framed with a view to rescission may not be treated as surplusage. * * * No injustice can then possibly result from treating as mere surplusage all such portions of the complaint and the prayer for relief as may have reference to a rescission."

[12] We think the facts in the present case present the same reason for the rule just quoted as the facts in the case from which the quotation was taken. We are also persuaded that the judgment should be sustained by the consideration that it plainly appears from the entire record before us that substantial justice has been done between the parties, and, under such circumstances, a reversal is not warranted because of any error in the pleadings. Nothing was awarded to defendant Phillips under the superfluous allegations contained in her pleadings, and no damage has resulted to the appellant by reason thereof.

The judgment is affirmed.
